BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE

PLATO c 428 B.C.–c 348 B.C.

PLATO, son of Ariston and Perictione, was born in 428 or 427 B.C. His family was, on both sides, one of the most distinguished of Athens Ariston is said to have traced his descent through Codrus to the god Poseidon on the mother's side, the family which was related to Solon, goes back to Dropides archon of the year 644 B.C. His mother apparently married as her second husband her uncle Pyrilampes, a prominent supporter of Pericles, and Plato was probably chiefly brought up in his house

Plato's early life coincided with the disastrous years of the Peloponnesian War the shattering of the Athenian Empire, and the fierce civil strife of oligarchs and democrats in the year of anarchy 404–403 B.C. He was too young to have learned anything by experience of the imperial democracy of Pericles, or of the full tide of the sophistic movement He must have known Socrates from boyhood for his relatives, Critias and Charmides, were old friends of the philosopher Aristotle also ascribes to him an early familiarity with the Heracleitean Cratylus. But Plato himself tells us in The Seventh Letter that his early ambitions were political Following the establishment of the Tyranny of the Thirty in 404 in which his relatives were leaders, Plato was invited to share in their doings "as something to which I had a claim" He held back until their policy was revealed and then was repelled by their violence particularly by their attempt to implicate Socrates in an illegal execution He hoped for better things from the restored democracy until the condemnation of Socrates convinced him that he could no more collaborate with the democrats than with the oligarchs Concluding that "public affairs at Athens were not carried on in accordance with the manners and practices of our fathers nor was there any ready method by which I could make new friends, Plato abandoned his intention of devoting himself to politics.

After the execution of Socrates in 399 B.C., Plato went on a series of travels It would seem that he then discovered his vocation to philosophy as he reflected on the life and teaching of Socrates Hermodorus, an immediate disciple is the authority for the statement that Plato and other Socratic men took temporary refuge at Megara with the philosopher Eucleides who is said to have taught the doctrines of Socrates and of Parmenides The Alexandrian Lives represent the next few years as spent in extensive travels in Greece, Egypt, and Italy Plato's own statement is only that he visited Italy and Sicily at the age of forty was disgusted by the gross sensuality of life there but found a kindred spirit in Dion brother in law of Dionysius I of Syracuse, who was to involve him again in politics twenty years later

On his return to Athens about 38, Plato founded the Academy He had presumably already completed some of his dialogues, in particular those celebrating the memory of Socrates For the rest of his life he presided over the Academy making it the intellectual center of Greek life its only rival was the school of Isocrates From the allusions of Aristotle it appears that Plato lectured without manuscript, and "problems" were propounded for solution by the joint researches of the students In addition to philosophy particular attention was given to science and law The most important mathematical work of the fourth century was done by friends or pupils of Plato Theatetus the founder of solid geometry was a member of the Academy and Eudoxus of Cnidus is said to have removed his school from Cyzicus to Athens for the purpose of cooperation with Plato The Academy was frequently called upon by various cities and colonies to furnish advisers on legislative matters Plutarch records that among others Plato sent Aristonymus to the Arcadians Phormion to Elis, Menedemus to Pyrrha"

In 36 when Plato was in his sixtieth year and renowned as the head of the Academy he was invited to intervene in the politics of Syracuse Dionysius II had just assumed power and Plato's friend Dion urged the philosopher to come and undertake the education of the young king and to strengthen him against the encroachment of Carthage in Sicily Plato's reluctance to make such an attempt was overcome only by his friendship for Dion and a feeling of shame lest I might someday appear to my self wholly and solely a mere man of words Plato started Dionysius on a program of philosophical education but in a few months found himself involved in the intrigues of the court against Dion and when Dion was finally forced into virtual banishment Plato returned to Athens Dionysius who prided himself on his philosophical accomplishments kept in correspondence with Plato and prevailed upon him to visit Syracuse again in 361 Plato renewed his attempt to persuade Dionysius not to enslave Sicily nor any other State to despots but to put it under the rule of laws But he again found that the tyrant refused to act righteously and allowed no opportunity for a rule in which philosophy and power really met together It was only after considerable personal danger that Plato reached Athens He never again attempted direct intervention in political affairs although several members of the Academy joined Dion s expedition against Syracuse in 357 which resulted in the overthrow of the tyranny

The Sicilian voyages are considered to mark a distinct break in Plato s literary activity The work of his last years is now usually held to consist of a group of seven dialogues Theaetetus Parmenides Sophist Statesman Timaeus Philebus and Laws The Academy was presumably well organized by that time and made fewer administrative demands upon Plato But we know from Aristotle who became a student there in 367 that Plato still continued to lecture and to take a leading part in the research problems Legislation seems to have b en given particular concern and the Laws is said to have been in the process of publication when Plato died in 348 or 347 B C

CHARMIDES, or Temperance

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: Socrates, who is the narrator; CHARMIDES; CHAEREPHON; CRITIAS. SCENE: The Palaestra of Taureas, which is near the Porch of the King Archon

[153] YESTERDAY evening I returned from the army at Potidaea, and having been a good while away, I thought that I should like to go and look at my old haunts. So I went into the palaestra of Taureas, which is over against the temple adjoining the porch of the King Archon, and there I found a number of persons, most of whom I knew, but not all. My visit was unexpected, and no sooner did they see me entering than they saluted me from afar on all sides; and Chaerephon, who is a kind of madman, started up and ran to me, seizing my hand, and saying, How did you escape, Socrates?—(I should explain that an engagement had taken place at Potidaea not long before we came away, of which the news had only just reached Athens.)

You see, I replied, that here I am.

There was a report, he said, that the engagement was very severe, and that many of our acquaintance had fallen.

That, I replied, was not far from the truth.

I suppose, he said, that you were present.

I was.

Then sit down, and tell us the whole story, which as yet we have only heard imperfectly.

I took the place which he assigned to me, by the side of Critias the son of Callaeschrus, and when I had saluted him and the rest of the company, I told them the news from the army, and answered their several enquiries.

Then, when there had been enough of this, I, in my turn, began to make enquiries about matters at home—about the present state of philosophy, and about the youth. I asked whether any of them were remarkable for wisdom or beauty, or both. Critias, glancing at the door, [154] invited my attention to some youths who were coming in, and talking noisily to one another, followed by a crowd. Of the beauties, Socrates, he said, I fancy that you will soon be able to form a judgement. For those who are just entering are the advanced guard of the great beauty, as he is thought to be, of the day, and he is likely to be not far off himself.

Who is he, I said, and who is his father?

Charmides, he replied, is his name; he is my cousin, and the son of my uncle Glaucon: I rather think that you know him too, although he was not grown up at the time of your departure.

Certainly, I know him, I said, for he was remarkable even then when he was still a child, and I should imagine that by this time he must be almost a young man.

You will see, he said, in a moment what progress he has made and what he is like. He had scarcely said the word, when Charmides entered.

Now you know, my friend, that I cannot measure anything, and of the beautiful, I am simply such a measure as a white line is of chalk; for almost all young persons appear to be beautiful in my eyes. But at that moment, when I saw him coming in, I confess that I was quite astonished at his beauty and stature; all the world seemed to be enamoured of him; amazement and confusion reigned when he entered; and a troop of lovers followed him. That grown-up men like ourselves should have been affected in this way was not surprising, but I observed that there was the same feeling among the boys all of them down to the very least child turned and looked at him as if he had been a statue

Chaerephon called me and said What do you think of him Socrates? Has he not a beautiful face?

Most beautiful I said

But you would think nothing of his face he replied if you could see his naked form he is absolutely perfect

And to this they all agreed

By Heracles I said there never was such a paragon if he has only one other slight addition

What is that? said Critias

If he has a noble soul and being of your house Critias he may be expected to have this

He is as fair and good within as he is without replied Critias

Then before we see his body should we not ask him to show us his soul naked and undisguised? he is just of an age at which he will like to talk

[155] That he will said Critias and I can tell you that he is a philosopher already and also a considerable poet not in his own opinion only but in that of others

That my dear Critias I replied is a distinction which has long been in your family and is inherited by you from Solon But why do you not call him and show him to us? for even if he were younger than he is there could be no impropriety in his talking to us in the presence of you who are his guardian and cousin

Very well he said then I will call him and turning to the attendant he said Call Charmides and tell him that I want him to come and see a physician about the illness of which he spoke to me the day before yesterday Then again addressing me he added He has been complaining lately of having a headache when he rises in the morning now why should you not make him believe that you know a cure for the headache?

Why not I said but will he come?

He will be sure to come, he replied

He came as he was bidden and sat down between Critias and me Great amusement was occasioned by every one pushing with might and main at his neighbour in order to make a place for him next to themselves until at the two ends of the row one had to get up and the other was rolled over sideways Now I my friend was beginning to feel awkward my former bold belief in my powers of conversing with him had vanished And when Critias told him that I was the person who had the cure he looked at me in such an indescribable manner and was just going to ask a question And at that moment all the people in the palaestra crowded about us, and O rare! I caught a sight of the inwards of his garment and took the flame Then I could no longer contain myself I thought how well Cydias understood the nature of love when in speaking of a fair youth he warns some one not to bring the fawn in the sight of the lion to be devoured by him for I felt that I had been overcome by a sort of wild beast appetite But I controlled myself and when he asked me if I knew the cure of the headache I answered but with an effort that I did know

And what is it? he said

I replied that it was a kind of leaf which required to be accompanied by a charm and if a person would repeat the charm at the same time that he used the cure he would be made whole but that without the charm the leaf would be of no avail

[156] Then I will write out the charm from your dictation he said

With my consent? I said or without my consent?

With your consent Socrates he said laughing

Very good I said and are you quite sure that you know my name?

I ought to know you he replied for there is a great deal said about you among my companions and I remember when I was a child seeing you in company with my cousin Critias

I am glad to find that you remember me I said for I shall now be more at home with you and shall be better able to explain the nature of the charm about which I felt a difficulty before For the charm will do more Charmides than only cure the headache I dare say that you have heard eminent physicians say to a patient who comes to them with bad eyes that they cannot cure his eyes by themselves but that if his eyes are to be cured his head must be treated and then again they say that to think of curing the head alone and not the rest of the body also is the height of folly And arguing in this way they apply their methods to the whole body and try to treat and heal the whole and the part together Did you ever observe that this is what they say?

Yes he said

And they are right and you would agree with them?

Yes he said certainly I should

His approving answers reassured me, and I began by degrees to regain confidence and the vital heat returned Such Charmides I said is the nature of the charm which I learned when serving with the army from one of the physicians of the Thracian king Zamolxis who are said to be so skilful that they can even give immortality This Thracian told me that in these notions of theirs wh ch I was just now ment oning the Greek physicians are quite right as far as they go but Zamolxis, he added our king who is also a god says further that as you ought not to attempt to cure the eyes without the head or the head without the body so neither ought you to attempt to cure the body without the soul and this he said is the reason why the cure of many diseases is unknown to the physicians of Hellas, because they are ignorant of the whole which ought to be stud ed also for the part can never be well unless the whole is well For all good and evil whether in the body or in human nature originates, as he declared in the soul and overflows from thence as if from the head into the eyes [157] And therefore if the head and body are to be well you must begin by curing the soul that is the first thing And the cure my dear youth, has to be effected by the use of certain charms, and these charms are fair words and by them temperance is implanted in the soul and where temperance is there health is speedily imparted not only to the head but to the whole body And he who taught me the cure and the charm at the same time added a special d rection Let no one he said, persuade you to cure the head unt l he has first given you his soul to be cured by the charm For this he sa d is the great error of our day in the treatment of the human body that physicians separate the soul from the body And he added with emphasis at the same time making me swear to his words Let no one, however r h or noble or fa r persuade you to give him the cure, without the charm. Now I have s vorn and I must keep my oath and therefore if you will allow me to apply the Thracian charm first to your so l as the stranger d rected I will afterwards proceed to ap ly the cure to your head B t if not, I do not know what I am to da w th you, my dear Charmides

Critias when he heard this said The head ache will be an unexpected gain to my young relation if the pa n in his head compels him to impro e his m nd and I can tell you Socrates, that Charm des is not only pre-eminent in beauty among h s equals, but also in that quality which is given by the charm and this as you say is temperance?

Yes I said

Then let me tell you that he is the most temperate of human beings and for his age inferior to none in any quality

Yes I said Charmides and indeed I think that you ought to excel others in all good qualities for if I am not mistaken there is no one present who could easily point out two Athenian houses whose union would be likely to produce a better or nobler scion than the two from which you are sprung There is your father s house, which is descended from Critias the son of Dropidas whose family has been commemorated in the panegyrical verses of Anacreon Solon and many other poets as famous for beauty and virtue and all other high fortune [158] and your mother s house is equally distinguished for your maternal uncle Pyrilampes is reputed never to have found his equal in Persia at the court of the great king or on the continent of Asia in all the places to whi h he went as ambassador for stature and beauty that whole family is not a whit inferior to the other Having such ancestors you ought to be first in all things and sweet son of Glaucon your outward form is no dishonour to any of them If to beauty you add temperance and if in other respects you are what Critias declares you to be then dear Charmides blessed art thou in being the son of thy mother And here lies the point for if as he declares you have this gift of temperance already and are temperate enough in that case you have no need of any charms whether of Zamolxis or of Abaris the Hyperborean and I may as well let you have the cure of the head at once but if you have not yet acquired this quality I must use the charm befo e I give you the medicine Please therefore to inform me whether you admit the truth of what Critias has been saying —have you or have you not this quality of temperance?

Charmides blushed and the blush heightened his beauty for modesty is becoming in youth he then sa d very ingenuously that he really could not at once answer either yes or no to the question which I had asked For said he, if I affirm that I am not temperate that would be a strange thing for me to say of myself and also I should give the lie to Critias, and many others who th nk as he tells you that I am temperate but on the other hand if I say that I am, I shall have to praise myself which would be ill manners and therefore I do not know how to answer you

I said to him That is a natural reply Charmides and I think that you and I ought together to enquire whether you have this quality about which I am asking or not and then you will not be compelled to say what you do not like neither shall I be a rash practitioner of medicine therefore if you please I will share the enquiry with you but I will not press you if you would rather not

There is nothing which I should like better he said and as far as I am concerned you may proceed in the way which you think best [159] I think I said that I had better begin by asking you a question for if temperance abides in you you must have an opinion about her she must give some intimation of her nature and qualities which may enable you to form a notion of her Is not that true?

Yes he said that I think is true

You know your native language I said and therefore you must be able to tell what you feel about this

Certainly he said

In order then that I may form a conjecture whether you have temperance abiding in you or not tell me I said what in your opinion is Temperance?

At first he hesitated and was very unwilling o answer then he said that he thought temperance was doing things orderly and quietly, such things for example as walking in the streets and talking or anything else of that nature In a word he said I should answer that in my opinion temperance is quietness

Are you right Charmides? I said No doubt some would affirm that the quiet are the temperate but let us see whether these words have any meaning and first tell me whether you would not acknowledge temperance to be of the class of the noble and good?

Yes

But which is best when you are at the writing master s to write the same letters quickly or quietly?

Quickly

And to read quickly or slowly?

Quickly again

And in playing the lyre or wrestling quickness or sharpness are far better than quietness and slowness?

Yes

And the same holds in boxing and in the pancratium?

Certainly

And in leaping and running and in bodily exercises generally quickness and agility are good slowness and inactivity and quietness are bad?

That is evident

Then I said in all bodily actions not quietness but the greatest agility and quickness is noblest and best?

Yes certainly

And is temperance a good?

Yes

Then in reference to the body not quietness but quickness will be the higher degree of temperance if temperance is a good?

True he said

And which I said is better—facility in learning or difficulty in learning?

Facility

Yes I said and facility in learning is learning quickly and difficulty in learning is learning quietly and slowly?

True

And is it not better to teach another quickly and energetically rather than quietly and slowly?

Yes

And which is better to call to mind and to remember quickly and readily or quietly and slowly?

The former

[160] And is not shrewdness a quickness or cleverness of the soul and not a quietness?

True

And is it not best to understand what is said whether at the writing master s or the music master s or anywhere else not as quietly as possible but as quickly as possible?

Yes

And in the searchings or deliberations of the soul not the quietest as I imagine and he who with difficulty deliberates and discovers is thought worthy of praise but he who does so most easily and quickly?

Quite true he said

And in all that concerns either body or soul swiftness and activity are clearly better than slowness and quietness?

Clearly they are

Then temperance is not quietness nor is the temperate life quiet —certainly not upon this view for the life which is temperate is supposed to be the good And of two things one is true —either never or very seldom do the quiet actions in life appear to be better than the quick and energetic ones or supposing that of the nobler actions there are as many quiet as quick and vehement still even if we grant this, temperance will not be acting quietly any more than acting quickly and energetically either in walkin or talking or in anything else nor will the qu et life be more temperate than the un qu et seeing that temperance is admitted by us to be a good and noble thing and the quick have been shown to be as good as the quiet

I think, he sa d Socrates that you are right

Then once more Charmides I said fix your attent on and look w thin cons der the effect which temperance has upon yourself and the nature of that which has the effect Think over all this, and like a brave youth tell me—What is temperance?

After a moment s pause in which he made a real manly effort to think he said My opinion i Socrates that temperance makes a man a hamed or modest, and that temperance is the same as modesty

Very good, I said and did you not admit just now that temperance is noble?

Yes, certainly he said

And the temperate are also good?

Yes

And can that be good which does not make men good?

Certainly not

And you would infer that temperance is not only noble but also good?

[161] That is my op n on

Well I said but surely you would agree with Homer when he says

M desty s not good for dy man?

Yes, he said I agree

Then I suppose that modesty is and is not good?

Clearly

But temperance whose presence makes men only good and not bad is always good?

That appears to me to be as you say

And the inference is that temperan e cannot be mod sty—if temperance is a good and if mode ty is as much an ev l as a good?

All that, Socrates appears to me to be true but I should l ke to know what you think about another defin tion of temperance w h ch I just now remember to have heard from some one who sa d "That temperance is doin our own bus ness W as he right ho affirmed that?

You m nster! I sa d this is what Crit as or some ph losopher has told you

Some one else, then said Cr tias for certain ly I have not

But w hat matter said Charmides from whom I heard this?

No matter at all I replied for the point is not who said the words but whether they are true or not

There you are in the right Socrates he re plied

To be sure I said yet I doubt whether we shall ever be able to discover their truth or falsehood for they are a kind of riddle

What makes you think so? he said

Because I said he who uttered them seems to me to have meant one thing and said an other Is the scribe for example to be regarded as doing nothing when he reads or writes?

I should rather think that he was doing some thing

And does the scribe write or read or teach you boys to write or read your own names only or did you write your enemies names as well as your own and your friends?

As much one as the other

And was there anything meddling or intem perate in this?

Certainly not

And yet if reading and writing are the same as doing you were doing what was not your own business?

But they are the same as doing

And the healing art my friend and build ing and weaving and doing anything what ever which is done by art —these all clearly come under the head of doing?

Certainly

And do you think that a state would be well ordered by a law which compelled every man to weave and wash his own coat and make his own shoes and his own flask and strigil and other implements [162] on this principle of every one doing and performing his own and abstaining from what is not his own?

I think not, he sai l

But, I said a temperate state will be a well orde ed state

Of course he replied

Then temperance I sa d w ill not be doing one s ov n busine s not at least in this way or doing things of this sort?

Clearly not

Then as I was just now saying he who de clared that temperance is a man doing his o vn business l ad another and a hidden meaning for I do not think that he could have been such a fool as to mean this Was he a fool who told you Charmides?

Nay he repl ed I certainly thought him a very wise man

Then I am quite certa n that he put forth his defin tion as a r ddle thinking that no one would know the meaning of the words doing his own business

I dare say he replied

And what is the meaning of a man doing his own business? Can you tell me?

Indeed I cannot and I should not wonder if the man himself who used this phrase did not understand what he was saying Whereupon he laughed slyly and looked at Critias

Critias had long been showing uneasiness for he felt that he had a reputation to maintain with Charmides and the rest of the company He had however hitherto managed to restrain himself but now he could no longer forbear and I am convinced of the truth of the suspicion which I entertained at the time that Charmides had heard this answer about temperance from Critias And Charmides who did not want to answer himself but to make Critias answer tried to stir him up He went on pointing out that he had been refuted at which Critias grew angry and appeared as I thought inclined to quarrel with him just as a poet might quarrel with an actor who spoiled his poems in repeating them so he looked hard at him and said—

Do you imagine Charmides that the author of this definition of temperance did not understand the meaning of his own words because you do not understand them?

Why at his age I said most excellent Critias he can hardly be expected to understand but you who are older and have studied may well be assumed to know the meaning of them and therefore if you agree with him and accept his definition of temperance I would much rather argue with you than with him about the truth or falsehood of the definition

I entirely agree said Critias and accept the definition

Very good I said and now let me repeat my question—Do you admit as I was just now saying that all craftsmen make or do something?

I do

[163] And do they make or do their own business only or that of others also?

They make or do that of others also

And are they temperate seeing that they make not for themselves or their own business only?

Why not? he said

No objection on my part I said but there may be a difficulty on his who proposes as a definition of temperance doing one s own business and then says that there is no reason why those who do the business of others should not be temperate

Nay said he did I ever acknowledge that those who do the business of others are temperate? I said those who make not those who do

What! I asked do you mean to say that doing and making are not the same?

No more he replied than making or working are the same thus much I have learned from Hesiod who says that work is no disgrace Now do you imagine that if he had meant by working and doing such things as you were describing he would have said that there was no disgrace in them—for example in the manufacture of shoes or in selling pickles or sitting for hire in a house of ill fame? That Socrates is not to be supposed but I conceive him to have distinguished making from doing and work and while admitting that the making anything might sometimes become a disgrace when the employment was not honourable to have thought that work was never any disgrace at all For things nobly and usefully made he called works and such makings he called workings and doings and he must be supposed to have called such things only man s proper business and what is hurtful not his business and in that sense Hesiod and any other wise man may be reasonably supposed to call him wise who does his own work

O Critias I said no sooner had you opened your mouth than I pretty well knew that you would call that which is proper to a man and that which is his own good and that the makings of the good you would call doings for I am no stranger to the endless distinctions which Prodicus draws about names Now I have no objection to your giving names any signification which you please if you will only tell me what you mean by them Please then to begin again and be a little plainer Do you mean that this doing or making or whatever is the word which you would use of good actions is temperance?

I do he said

Then not he who does evil but he who does good is temperate?

Yes he said and you friend would agree

No matter whether I should or not just now not what I think but what you are saying is the point at issue

Well he answered I mean to say that he who does evil and not good is not temperate and that he is temperate who does good and not evil for temperance I define in plain words to be the doing of good actions

[164] And you may be very likely right in what you are saying but I am curious to know whether you imagine that temperate men are ignorant of their own temperance?

I do not think so he said

And yet were you not saying just now that craftsmen might be temperate in doing another's work, as well as in doing their own?

I was he replied but what is your drift?

I have no particular drift, but I wish that you would tell me whether a physician who cures a patient may do good to himself and good to another also?

I think that he may

And he who does so does his duty?

Yes

And does not he who does his duty act temperately or wisely?

Yes he acts wisely

But must the physician necessarily know when his treatment is likely to prove beneficial and when not? or must the craftsman necessarily know when he is likely to be benefited and when not to be benefited by the work which he is doing?

I suppose not

Then, I said he may sometimes do good or harm and not know what he is himself doing and yet, in doing good, as you say he has done temperately or wisely Was not that your statement

Yes

Then as would seem in doing good, he may act wisely or temperately and be wise or temperate, but not know his own wisdom or temperance?

But that, Socrates, he said is impossible and therefore if this is, as you imply the necessary consequence of any of my previous admissions, I will withdraw them rather than admit that a man can be temperate or wise who does not know himself and I am not ashamed to confess that I was in error For self knowledge would certainly be maintained by me to be the very essence of knowledge, and in this I agree with him who dedicated the inscription Know thyself! at Delphi. That word if I am not mistaken is put there as a sort of salutation which the god addresses to those who enter the temple as much as to say that the ordinary salutation of Hail! is not right, and that the exhortation Be temperate! would be a far better way of saluting one another The notion of him who dedicated the inscription was as I believe that the god speaks to those who enter his temple, not as men speak but, when a worshipper enters, the first word which he hears is Be temperate!" This however like a prophet he expresses in a sort of riddle for Know thyself! and Be temperate! are the same as I maintain and as the letters imply and yet they may be easily misunderstood [165] and succeeding sages who added "Never too much or Give a pledge and evil is nigh at hand would appear to have so misunderstood them for they imagined that Know thyself! was a piece of advice which the god gave and not his salutation of the worshippers at their first coming in and they dedicated their own inscription under the idea that they too would give equally useful pieces of advice Shall I tell you Socrates, why I say all this? My object is to leave the previous discussion (in which I know not whether you or I are more right but at any rate, no clear result was attained) and to raise a new one in which I will attempt to prove if you deny that temperance is self knowledge

Yes, I said, Critias but you come to me as though I professed to know about the questions which I ask, and as though I could if I only would agree with you Whereas the fact is that I enquire with you into the truth of that which is advanced from time to time just because I do not know and when I have enquired I will say whether I agree with you or not. Please then to allow me time to reflect.

Reflect, he said

I am reflecting I replied, and discover that temperance or wisdom, if implying a knowledge of anything must be a science, and a science of something

Yes, he said the science of itself

Is not medicine I said the science of health?

True

And suppose I said that I were asked by you what is the use or effect of medicine, which is this science of health I should answer that medicine is of very great use in producing health which as you will admit, is an excellent effect.

Granted

And if you were to ask me what is the result or effect of architecture which is the science of building I should say houses, and so of other arts which all have their different results. Now I want you Critias to answer a similar question about temperance, or wisdom, which according to you is the science of itself Admitting this view I ask of you what good work worthy of the name wise, does temperance or wisdom, which is the science of itself effect? Answer me

That is not the true way of pursuing the enquiry Socrates he said for wisdom is not like the other sciences any more than they are like one another but you proceed as if they were alike For tell me he said what result is there of computation or geometry in the same sense as a house is the result of building or a garment of weaving [166] or any other work of any other art? Can you show me any such result of them? You cannot

That is true I said but still each of these sciences has a subject which is different from the science I can show you that the art of computation has to do with odd and even numbers in their numerical relations to themselves and to each other Is not that true?

Yes he said

And the odd and even numbers are not the same with the art of computation?

They are not

The art of weighing again has to do with lighter and heavier but the art of weighing is one thing and the heavy and the light another Do you admit that?

Yes

Now I want to know what is that which is not wisdom and of which wisdom is the science?

You are just falling into the old error Socrates he said You come asking in what wisdom or temperance differs from the other sciences and then you try to discover some respect in which they are alike but they are not for all the other sciences are of something else and not of themselves wisdom alone is a science of other sciences and of itself And of this as I believe you are very well aware and that you are only doing what you denied that you were doing just now trying to refute me instead of pursuing the argument

And what if I am? How can you think that I have any other motive in refuting you but what I should have in examining into myself? which motive would be just a fear of my unconsciously fancying that I knew something of which I was ignorant And at this moment I pursue the argument chiefly for my own sake and perhaps in some degree also for the sake of my other friends For is not the discovery of things as they truly are a good common to all mankind?

Yes certainly, Socrates he said

Then I said be cheerful sweet sir and give your opinion in answer to the question which I asked never minding whether Critias or Socrates is the person refuted attend only to the argument and see what will come of the refutation

I think that you are right he replied and I will do as you say

Tell me then I said what you mean to affirm about wisdom

I mean to say that wisdom is the only science which is the science of itself as well as of the other sciences

But the science of science I said will also be the science of the absence of science

Very true he said

[167] Then the wise or temperate man and he only will know himself and be able to examine what he knows or does not know and to see what others know and think that they know and do really know and what they do not know and fancy that they know when they do not No other person will be able to do this And this is wisdom and temperance and self knowledge—for a man to know what he knows and what he does not know That is your meaning?

Yes he said

Now then I said making an offering of the third or last argument to Zeus the Saviour let us begin again and ask in the first place whether it is or is not possible for a person to know that he knows and does not know what he knows and does not know and in the second place whether if perfectly possible such knowledge is of any use

That is what we have to consider he said

And here Critias I said I hope that you will find a way out of a difficulty into which I have got myself Shall I tell you the nature of the difficulty?

By all means he replied

Does not what you have been saying if true amount to this that there must b a single s ience which is wholly a science of itself and of other sciences and that the same is also the science of the absence of science?

Yes

But consider how monstrous this proposition is my friend in any parallel case the impossibility will be transparent to you

How is that? and in what cases do you mean?

In such cases as this Suppose that there is a kind of vision which is not like ordinary vision but a vision of itself and of other sorts of vision and of the defect of them which in seeing sees no colour but only itself and other sorts of vision Do you think that there is such a kind of vision

Or is there a kind of hearing which hears no sound at all but only itself and other sorts of hearing or the defects of them?

There is not

Or take all the senses can you imagine that there is any sense of itself and of other senses but which is incapable of perceiving the objects of the senses?

I think not

Could there be any desire which is not the desire of any pleasure but of itself and of all other desires?

Certainly not

Or can you imagine a wish which wishes for no good but only for itself and all other wishes?

I should answer No

Or would you say that there is a love which is not the love of beauty but of itself and of other loves?

I should not

[168] Or did you ever know of a fear which fears itself or other fears but has no object of fear?

I never did he said

Or of an opinion which is an opinion of itself and of other opinions and which has no opinion on the subjects of opinion in general?

Certainly not

But surely we are assuming a science of this kind which having no subject matter is a science of itself and of the other sciences?

Yes that is what is affirmed

But how strange is this if it be indeed true we must not however as yet absolutely deny the possibility of such a science let us rather consider the matter

You are quite right

Well then this science of which we are speaking is a science of something and is of a nature to be a science of something?

Yes

Just as that which is greater is of a nature to be greater than something else?

Yes.

Which is less if the other is conceived to be greater?

To be sure

And if we could find something which is at once greater than itself and greater than other great things but not greater than those things in comparison of which the others are greater then that thing would have the property of being greater and also less than itself?

That, Socrates he said is the inevitable inference

Or if there be a double which is double of itself and of other doubles these will be halves for the double is relative to the half?

That is true

And that which is greater than itself will also be less and that which is heavier will also be lighter and that which is older will also be younger and the same of other things that which has a nature relative to self will retain also the nature of its object I mean to say for example that hearing is as we say of sound or voice Is that true?

Yes

Then if hearing hears itself it must hear a voice for there is no other way of hearing

Certainly

And sight also my excellent friend if it sees itself must see a colour for sight cannot see that which has no colour

No

Do you remark Critias, that in several of the examples which have been recited the notion of a relation to self is altogether inadmissible and in other cases hardly credible—inadmissible for example in the case of magnitudes numbers and the like?

Very true

But in the case of hearing and sight or in the power of self motion and the power of heat to burn this relation to self will be regarded as incredible by some [169] but perhaps not by others And some great man my friend is wanted who will satisfactorily determine for us whether there is nothing which has an inherent property of relation to self or some things only and not others and whether in this class of self related things if there be such a class that science which is called wisdom or temperance is included I altogether distrust my own power of determining these matters I am not certain whether there is such a science of science at all and even if there be I should not acknowledge this to be wisdom or temperance until I can also see whether such a science would or would not do us any good for I have an impression that temperance is a benefit and a good And therefore O son of Callaeschrus as you maintain that temperance or wisdom is a science of science and also of the absence of science I will request you to show in the first place as I was saying before the possibility and in the second place the advantage of such a science and then perhaps you may satisfy me that you are right in your view of temperance

Critias heard me say this and saw that I was in a difficulty and as one person when another yawns in his presence catches the infection of yawning from him so did he seem to be driven into a difficulty by my difficulty But as he had a reputation to maintain he was ashamed to admit before the company that he could not answer my challenge or determine the question at issue and he made an unintelligible attempt to hide his perplexity In order that the argument might proceed I said to him Well then Critias if you like let us assume that there is this science of science whether the assumption is right or wrong may hereafter be investigated Admitting the existence of it will you tell me how such a science enables us to distinguish what we know or do not know which as we were saying is self knowledge or wisdom so we were saying?

Yes Socrates he said and that I think is certainly true for he who has this science or knowledge which knows itself will become like the knowledge which he has in the same way that he who has swiftness will be swift and he who has beauty will be beautiful and he who has knowledge will know In the same way he who has that knowledge which is self knowing will know himself

I do not doubt I said that a man will know himself when he possesses that which has self knowledge but what necessity is there that, having this he should know what he knows and what he does not know?

[170] Because Socrates they are the same

Very likely I said but I remain as stupid as ever for still I fail to comprehend how this knowing what you know and do not know is the same as the knowledge of self

What do you mean? he said

This is what I mean I replied I will admit that there is a science of science —can this do more than determine that of two things one is and the other is not science or knowledge?

No just that

But is knowledge or want of knowledge of health the same as knowledge or want of knowledge of justice?

Certainly not

The one is medicine and the other is politics whereas that of which we are speaking is knowledge pure and simple

Very true

And if a man knows only and has only knowledge of knowledge and has no further knowledge of health and justice, the probability is that he will only know that he knows something and has a certain knowledge, whether concerning himself or other men.

True

Then how will this knowledge or science teach him to know what he knows Say that he knows health —not wisdom or temperance but the art of medicine has taught it to him,—and he has learned harmony from the art of music and building from the art of building —neither from wisdom or temperance and the same of other things

That is evident

How will wisdom regarded only as a knowledge of knowledge or science of science ever teach him that he knows health or that he knows building?

It is impossible

Then he who is ignorant of these things will only know that he knows but not what he knows?

True

Then wisdom or being wise appears to be not the knowledge of the things which we do or do not know but only the knowledge that we know or do not know?

That is the inference

Then he who has this knowledge will not be able to examine whether a pretender knows or does not know that which he says that he knows he will only know that he has a knowledge of some kind but wisdom will not show him of what the knowledge is?

Plainly not

*Neither will he be able to distinguish the pre*tender in medicine from the true physician nor between any other true and false professor of knowledge Let us consider the matter in this way If the wise man or any other man wants to distinguish the true physician from the false how will he proceed? He will not talk to him about medicine and that as we were saying is the only thing which the physician understands

True

And on the other hand the physician knows nothing of science for this has been assumed to be the province of wisdom

True

[171] And further since medicine is science we must infer that he does not know anything of medicine

Exactly

Then the wise man may indeed know that the physician has some kind of science or knowledge but when he wants to discover the nature of this he will ask What is the subject matter? For the several sciences are distinguished not by the mere fact that they are sciences, but by the nature of their subjects Is not that true?

Quite true.

And medicine is distinguished from other sciences as having the subject matter of health and disease?

Yes.

And he who would enquire into the nature of medicine must pursue the enquiry into health and disease, and not into what is extraneous?

True.

And he who judges rightly will judge of the physician as a physician in what relates to these?

He will.

He will consider whether what he says is true, and whether what he does is right in relation to health and disease?

He will.

But can any one attain the knowledge of either unless he have a knowledge of medicine?

He cannot.

No one at all, it would seem, except the physician can have this knowledge, and therefore not the wise man; he would have to be a physician as well as a wise man.

Very true.

Then, assuredly, wisdom or temperance, if only a science of science, and of the absence of science or knowledge, will not be able to distinguish the physician who knows from one who does not know but pretends or thinks that he knows, or any other professor of anything at all; like any other artist, he will only know his fellow in art or wisdom, and no one else.

That is evident, he said.

But then what profit, Critias, I said, is there any longer in wisdom or temperance which yet remains, if this is wisdom? If, indeed, as we were supposing at first, the wise man had been able to distinguish what he knew and did not know, and that he knew the one and did not know the other, and to recognize a similar faculty of discernment in others, there would certainly have been a great advantage in being wise; for then we should never have made a mistake, but have passed through life the unerring guides of ourselves and of those who are under us; and we should not have attempted to do what we did not know, but we should have found out those who knew, and have handed the business over to them and trusted in them; nor should we have allowed those who were under us to do anything which they were not likely to do well; and they would be likely to do well just that of which they had knowledge; and the house or state which was ordered or administered under the guidance of wisdom, and everything else of which wisdom was the lord, would have been well ordered; for truth guiding, and error having been eliminated, [172] in all their doings, men would have done well, and would have been happy. Was not this, Critias, what we spoke of as the great advantage of wisdom—to know what is known and what is unknown to us?

Very true, he said.

And now you perceive, I said, that no such science is to be found anywhere.

I perceive, he said.

May we assume then, I said, that wisdom, viewed in this new light merely as a knowledge of knowledge and ignorance, has this advantage:—that he who possesses such knowledge will more easily learn anything which he learns; and that everything will be clearer to him, because, in addition to the knowledge of individuals, he sees the science, and this also will better enable him to test the knowledge which others have of what he knows himself; whereas the enquirer who is without this knowledge may be supposed to have a feebler and weaker insight? Are not these, my friend, the real advantages which are to be gained from wisdom? And are not we looking and seeking after something more than is to be found in her?

That is very likely, he said.

That is very likely, I said; and very likely, too, we have been enquiring to no purpose; as I am led to infer, because I observe that if this is wisdom, some strange consequences would follow. Let us, if you please, assume the possibility of this science of sciences, and further admit and allow, as was originally suggested, that wisdom is the knowledge of what we know and do not know. Assuming all this, still, upon further consideration, I am doubtful, Critias, whether wisdom, such as this, would do us much good. For we were wrong, I think, in supposing, as we were saying just now, that such wisdom ordering the government of house or state would be a great benefit.

How so? he said.

Why, I said, we were far too ready to admit the great benefits which mankind would obtain from their severally doing the things which they knew, and committing the things of which they are ignorant to those who were better acquainted with them.

Were we not right in making that admission?

I think not.

How very strange, Socrates!

By the dog of Egypt, I said, there I agree with you; and I was thinking as much just now when I said that strange consequences would follow and that I was afraid we were on the wrong track for however ready we may be to admit that this is wisdom [173] I certainly cannot make out what good this sort of thing does to us

What do you mean? he said I wish that you could make me understand what you mean

I dare say that what I am saying is nonsense I replied and yet if a man has any feeling of what is due to himself he cannot let the thought which comes into his mind pass away unheeded and unexamined

I like that he said

Hear then I said my own dream whether coming through the horn or the ivory gate I cannot tell The dream is this Let us suppose that wisdom is such as we are now defining and that she has absolute sway over us then each action will be done according to the arts or sciences and no one professing to be a pilot when he is not or any physician or general or any one else pretending to know matters of which he is ignorant will deceive or elude us our health will be improved our safety at sea and also in battle will be assured our coats and shoes and all other instruments and implements will be skilfully made because the workmen will be good and true Aye and if you please you may suppose that prophecy which is the *knowledge of the future will be under the con*trol of wisdom and that she will deter deceivers and set up the true prophets in their place as the revealers of the future Now I quite agree that mankind thus provided would live and act according to knowledge for wisdom would watch and prevent ignorance from intruding on us But whether by acting according to knowledge we shall act well and be happy my dear Critias—this is a point which we have not yet been able to determine

Yet I think he replied that if you discard knowledge you will hardly find the crown of happiness in anything else

But of what is this knowledge? I said Just answer me that small question Do you mean a knowledge of shoemaking?

God forbid

Or of working in brass?

Certainly not

Or in wool or wood or anything of that sort?

No I do not

Then I said we are giving up the doctrine that he who lives according to knowledge is happy for these live according to knowledge and yet they are not allowed by you to be happy but I think that you mean to confine happiness to particular individuals who live according to knowledge [174] such for example as the prophet who as I was saying knows the future Is it of him you are speaking or of some one else?

Yes I mean him but there are others as well

Yes I said some one who knows the past and present as well as the future and is ignorant of nothing Let us suppose that there is such a person and if there is you will allow that he is the most knowing of all living men

Certainly he is

Yet I should like to know one thing more which of the different kinds of knowledge makes him happy? or do all equally make him happy?

Not all equally he replied

But which most tends to make him happy? the knowledge of what past present or future thing? May I infer this to be the knowledge of the game of draughts?

Nonsense about the game of draughts

Or of computation?

No

Or of health?

That is nearer the truth he said

And that knowledge which is nearest of all I said is the knowledge of what?

The knowledge with which he discerns good and evil

Monster! I said you have been carrying me round in a circle and all this time hiding from me the fact that the life according to knowledge is not that which makes men act rightly and be happy not even if knowledge include all the sciences but one science only that of good and evil For let me ask you Critias whether if you take away this medicine will *not equally give health and shoemaking equal*ly produce shoes and the art of the weaver clothes?—whether the art of the pilot will not equally save our lives at sea and the art of the general in war?

Quite so

And yet my dear Critias none of these things will be well or beneficially done if the science of the good be wanting

True

But that science is not wisdom or temperance but a science of human advantage not a science of other sciences or of ignorance but of good and evil and if this be of use then wisdom or temperance will not be of use

And why he replied will not wisdom be of use? For however much we assume that wisdom is a science of sciences, and has a sway over other sciences, surely she will have this particular science of the good under her control, and in this way will benefit us.

And will wisdom give health? I said; is not this rather the effect of medicine? Or does wisdom do the work of any of the other arts,—do they not each of them do their own work? Have we not long ago asseverated that wisdom is only the knowledge of knowledge and of ignorance, and of nothing else?

That is obvious.

Then wisdom will not be the producer of health.

Certainly not.

The art of health is different.

Yes, different.

[175] Nor does wisdom give advantage, my good friend; for that again we have just now been attributing to another art.

Very true.

How then can wisdom be advantageous, when giving no advantage?

That, Socrates, is certainly inconceivable.

You see then, Critias, that I was not far wrong in fearing that I could have no sound notion about wisdom; I was quite right in depreciating myself; for that which is admitted to be the best of all things would never have seemed to us useless, if I had been good for anything at an enquiry. But now I have been utterly defeated, and have failed to discover what that is to which the imposer of names gave this name of temperance or wisdom. And yet many more admissions were made by us than could be fairly granted; for we admitted that there was a science of science, although the argument said No, and protested against us; and we admitted further, that this science knew the works of the other sciences (although this too was denied by the argument), because we wanted to show that the wise man had knowledge of what he knew and did not know; also we nobly disregarded, and never even considered, the impossibility of a man knowing in a sort of way that which he does not know at all; for our assumption was, that he knows that which he does not know; than which nothing, as I think, can be more irrational. And yet, after finding us so easy and good-natured, the enquiry is still unable to discover the truth; but mocks us to a degree, and has gone out of its way to prove the inutility of that which we admitted only by a sort of supposition and fiction to be the true definition of temperance or wisdom: which result, as far as I am concerned, is not so much to be lamented, I said. But for your sake, Charmides, I am very sorry—that you, having such beauty and such wisdom and temperance of soul, should have no profit or good in life from your wisdom and temperance. And still more am I grieved about the charm which I learned with so much pain, and to so little profit, from the Thracian, for the sake of a thing which is nothing worth. I think indeed that there is a mistake, and that I must be a bad enquirer, for wisdom or temperance I believe to be really a great good; and happy are you, Charmides, if you certainly possess it. Wherefore examine yourself, [176] and see whether you have this gift and can do without the charm; for if you can, I would rather advise you to regard me simply as a fool who is never able to reason out anything; and to rest assured that the more wise and temperate you are, the happier you will be.

Charmides said: I am sure that I do not know, Socrates, whether I have or have not this gift of wisdom and temperance; for how can I know whether I have a thing, of which even you and Critias are, as you say, unable to discover the nature?—(not that I believe you.) And further, I am sure, Socrates, that I do need the charm, and as far as I am concerned, I shall be willing to be charmed by you daily, until you say that I have had enough.

Very good, Charmides, said Critias; if you do this I shall have a proof of your temperance, that is, if you allow yourself to be charmed by Socrates, and never desert him at all.

You may depend on my following and not deserting him, said Charmides: if you who are my guardian command me, I should be very wrong not to obey you.

And I do command you, he said.

Then I will do as you say, and begin this very day.

You sirs, I said, what are you conspiring about?

We are not conspiring, said Charmides, we have conspired already.

And are you about to use violence, without even going through the forms of justice?

Yes, I shall use violence, he replied, since he orders me; and therefore you had better consider well.

But the time for consideration has passed, I said, when violence is employed; and you, when you are determined on anything, and in the mood of violence, are irresistible.

Do not you resist me then, he said.

I will not resist you, I replied.

LYSIS, or Friendship

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Socrates who is the narrator Menexenus Hippothales Lysis Ctesippus Scene A newly erected Palaestra outside the walls of Athens

[203] I WAS going from the Academy straight to the Lyceum intending to take the outer road which is close under the wall When I came to the postern gate of the city which is by the fountain of Panops I fell in with Hippothales, the son of Hieronymus and Ctesippus the Paeanian and a company of young men who were standing with them Hippothales seeing me approach asked whence I came and whither I was going

I am going I replied from the Academy straight to the Lyceum

Then come straight to us he said, and put in here you may as well

Who are you I said and where am I to come?

He showed me an enclosed space and an open door over against the wall And there he said is the building at which we all meet and a goodly company we are

And what is this building I asked and what sort of entertainment have you?

[204] The building he replied is a newly erected Palaestra and the entertainment is generally conversation to which you are welcome

Thank you I said and is there any teacher there?

Yes he said your old friend and admirer Miccus

Indeed I replied he is a very eminent professor

Are you disposed he said to go with me and see them?

Yes I said but I should like to know first what is expected of me and who is the favourite among you?

Some persons have one favourite Socrates and some another he said

And who is yours? I asked tell me that Hippothales

At this he blushed and I said to him O Hippothales thou son of Hieronymus! do not say that you are or that you are not, in love the confession is too late for I see that you are not only in love but are already far gone in your love Simple and foolish as I am the Gods have given me the power of understanding affections of this kind

Whereupon he blushed more and more

Ctesippus said I like to see you blushing Hippothales and hesitating to tell Socrates the name when if he were with you but for a very short time you would have plagued him to death by talking about nothing else Indeed Socrates he has literally deafened us and stopped our ears with the praises of Lysis and if he is a little intoxicated there is every likelihood that we may have our sleep murdered with a cry of Lysis His performances in prose are bad enough but nothing at all in comparison with his verse and when he drenches us with his poems and other compositions it is really too bad and worse still is his manner of singing them to his love he has a voice which is truly appalling and we cannot help hearing him and now having a question put to him by you behold he is blushing

Who is Lysis? I said I suppose that he must be young for the name does not recall any one to me

Why he said his father being a very well known man he retains his patronymic and is not as yet commonly called by his own name but, although you do not know his name, I am sure that you must know his face, for that is quite enough to distinguish him.

But tell me whose son he is, I said.

He is the eldest son of Democrates, of the deme of Aexone.

Ah, Hippothales, I said, what a noble and really perfect love you have found! I wish that you would favour me with the exhibition which you have been making to the rest of the company, and then I shall be able to judge whether you know what a lover ought to say [205] about his love, either to the youth himself or to others.

Nay, Socrates, he said, you surely do not attach any importance to what he is saying.

Do you mean, I said, that you disown the love of the person whom he says that you love?

No, but I deny that I make verses or address compositions to him.

He is not in his right mind, said Ctesippus; he is talking nonsense, and is stark mad.

O Hippothales, I said, if you have ever made any verses or songs in honour of your favourite, I do not want to hear them; but I want to know the purport of them, that I may be able to judge of your mode of approaching your fair one.

Ctesippus will be able to tell you, he said; for if, as he avers, the sound of my words is always dinning in his ears, he must have a very accurate knowledge and recollection of them.

Yes, indeed, said Ctesippus; I know only too well; and very ridiculous the tale is: for although he is a lover, and very devotedly in love, he has nothing particular to talk about to his beloved which a child might not say. Now is not that ridiculous? He can only speak of the wealth of Democrates, which the whole city celebrates, and grandfather Lysis, and the other ancestors of the youth, and their stud of horses, and their victory at the Pythian games, and at the Isthmus, and at Nemea with four horses and single horses—these are the tales which he composes and repeats. And there is greater twaddle still. Only the day before yesterday he made a poem in which he described the entertainment of Heracles, who was a connexion of the family, setting forth how in virtue of this relationship he was hospitably received by an ancestor of Lysis; this ancestor was himself begotten of Zeus by the daughter of the founder of the deme. And these are the sort of old wives' tales which he sings and recites to us, and we are obliged to listen to him.

When I heard this, I said: O ridiculous Hippothales! how can you be making and singing hymns in honour of yourself before you have won?

But my songs and verses, he said, are not in honour of myself, Socrates.

You think not? I said.

Nay, but what do you think? he replied.

Most assuredly, I said, those songs are all in your own honour; for if you win your beautiful love, your discourses and songs will be a glory to you, and may be truly regarded as hymns of praise composed in honour of you who have conquered and won such a love; but if he slips away from you, the more you have praised him, the more ridiculous you will look at having lost this fairest and best of blessings. [206] And therefore the wise lover does not praise his beloved until he has won him, because he is afraid of accidents. There is also another danger; the fair, when any one praises or magnifies them, are filled with the spirit of pride and vain-glory. Do you not agree with me?

Yes, he said.

And the more vain-glorious they are, the more difficult is the capture of them?

I believe you.

What should you say of a hunter who frightened away his prey, and made the capture of the animals which he is hunting more difficult?

He would be a bad hunter, undoubtedly.

Yes; and if, instead of soothing them, he were to infuriate them with words and songs, that would show a great want of wit: do you not agree.

Yes.

And now reflect, Hippothales, and see whether you are not guilty of all these errors in writing poetry. For I can hardly suppose that you will affirm a man to be a good poet who injures himself by his poetry.

Assuredly not, he said; such a poet would be a fool. And this is the reason why I take you into my counsels, Socrates, and I shall be glad of any further advice which you may have to offer. Will you tell me by what words or actions I may become endeared to my love?

That is not easy to determine, I said; but if you will bring your love to me, and will let me talk with him, I may perhaps be able to show you how to converse with him, instead of singing and reciting in the fashion of which you are accused.

There will be no difficulty in bringing him, he replied; if you will only go with Ctesippus into the Palaestra, and sit down and talk, I believe that he will come of his own accord; fo

he is fond of listening Socrates And as this is the festival of the Hermaea the young men and boys are all together and there is no separation between them He will be sure to come but if he does not Ctesippus with whom he is familiar and whose relation Menexenus is his great friend shall call him

That will be the way I said Thereupon I led Ctesippus into the Palaestra and the rest followed

Upon entering we found that the boys had just been sacrificing and this part of the festival was nearly at an end They were all in their white array and games at dice were going on among them Most of them were in the outer court amusing themselves but some were in a corner of the Apodyterium playing at odd and even with a number of dice which they took out of little wicker baskets There was also a circle of lookers-on among them was Lysis He was standing with the other boys and youths, [207] having a crown upon his head like a fair vision and not less worthy of praise for his goodness than for his beauty We left them and went over to the opposite side of the room where finding a quiet place we sat down and then we began to talk This attracted Lysis who was constantly turning round to look at us—he was evidently wanting to come to us For a time he hesitated and had not the courage to come alone but first of all his friend Menexenus leaving his play, entered the Palaestra from the court and when he saw Ctesippus and myself was going to take a seat by us and then Lysis seeing him followed and sat down by his side and the other boys joined I should observe that Hippothales when he saw the crowd got behind them where he thought that he would be out of sight of Lysis lest he should anger him and there he stood and listened

I turned to Menexenus and said Son of Demophon which of you two youths is the elder?

That is a matter of dispute between us he said

And which is the nobler? Is that also a matter of dispute?

Yes certainly

And another disputed point is which is the fairer?

The two boys laughed

I shall not ask which is the richer of the two I said for you are friends are you not?

Certainly they replied

And friends have all things in common so that one of you can be no richer than the other if you say truly that you are friends

They assented I was about to ask which was the juster of the two and which was the wiser of the two but at this moment Menexenus was called away by some one who came and said that the gymnastic master wanted him I supposed that he had to offer sacrifice So he went away and I asked Lysis some more questions I dare say Lysis I said that your father and mother love you very much

And they would wish you to be perfectly happy

Yes

But do you think that any one is happy who is in the condition of a slave and who cannot do what he likes?

I should think not indeed he said

And if your father and mother love you and desire that you should be happy, no one can doubt that they are very ready to promote your happiness

Certainly he replied

And do they then permit you to do what you like and never rebuke you or hinder you from doing what you desire?

Yes indeed Socrates there are a great many things which they hinder me from doing

What do you mean? I said Do they want you to be happy and yet hinder you from doing what you like? [208] For example if you want to mount one of your father s chariots and take the reins at a race they will not allow you to do so—they will prevent you?

Certainly he said they will not allow me to do so

Whom then will they allow?

There is a charioteer whom my father pays for driving

And do they trust a hireling more than you? and may he do what he likes with the horses? and do they pay him for this?

They do

But I dare say that you may take the whip and guide the mule-cart if you like —they will permit that?

Permit me! indeed they will not

Then I said may no one use the whip to the mules?

Yes he said the muleteer

And is he a slave or a free man?

A slave he said

And do they esteem a slave of more value than you who are their son? And do they entrust their property to him rather than to you? and allow him to do what he likes when they prohibit you? Answer me now Are you your own master or do they not even allow that?

Nay he said of course they do not allow it

Then you have a master?

Yes, my tutor there he is

And is he a slave?

To be sure he is our slave, he replied

Surely I said this is a strange thing that a free man should be governed by a slave And what does he do with you?

He takes me to my teachers

You do not mean to say that your teachers also rule over you?

Of course they do

Then I must say that your father is pleased to inflict many lords and masters on you But at any rate when you go home to your mother she will let you have your own way and will not interfere with your happiness her wool or the piece of cloth which she is weaving are at your disposal I am sure that there is nothing to hinder you from touching her wooden spathe or her comb or any other of her spinning implements

Nay Socrates, he replied laughing not only does she hinder me, but I should be beaten if I were to touch one of them

Well I said, this is amazing And did you ever behave ill to your father or your mother?

No indeed, he replied

But why then are they so terribly anxious to prevent you from being happy and doing as you like?—keeping you all day long in subjection to another and in a word, doing nothing which you desire [209] so that you have no good as would appear out of their great possessions, which are under the control of any body rather than of you and have no use of your own fair person which is tended and taken care of by another while you Lysis are master of nobody and can do nothing?

Why he said Socrates the reason is that I am not of age.

I doubt whether that is the real reason I said for I should imagine that your father Democrates, and your mother do permit you to do many things already and do not wait until you are of age for example, if they want anything read or written, you, I presume, would be the first person in the house who is summoned by them

And you would be allowed to write or read the letters in any order which you please or to take up the lyre and tune the notes and play with the fingers, or strike with the plectrum exactly as you please and neither father nor mother would interfere with you.

That is true he said

Then what can be the reason Lysis I said why they allow you to do the one and not the other?

I suppose, he said because I understand the one and not the other

Yes, my dear youth I said the reason is not any deficiency of years but a deficiency of knowledge and whenever your father thinks that you are wiser than he is he will instantly commit himself and his possessions to you

I think so

Aye, I said and about your neighbour too does not the same rule hold as about your father? If he is satisfied that you know more of housekeeping than he does, will he continue to administer his affairs himself or will he commit them to you?

I think that he will commit them to me

Will not the Athenian people too entrust their affairs to you when they see that you have wisdom enough to manage them?

Yes.

And oh! let me put another case, I said There is the great king and he has an eldest son who is the Prince of Asia —suppose that you and I go to him and establish to his satisfaction that we are better cooks than his son will he not entrust to us the prerogative of making soup and putting in anything that we like while the pot is boiling rather than to the Prince of Asia, who is his son?

To us, clearly

And we shall be allowed to throw in salt by handfuls whereas the son will not be allowed to put in as much as he can take up between his fingers?

Of course

Or suppose again that the son has bad eyes will he allow him or will he not allow him to touch his own eyes if he thinks that he has no knowledge of medicine

[210] He will not allow him

Whereas, if he supposes us to have a knowledge of medicine he will allow us to do what we like with him—even to open the eyes wide and sprinkle ashes upon them because he supposes that we know what is best?

That is true

And everything in which we appear to him to be wiser than himself or his son he will commit to us?

That is very true, Socrates, he replied

Then now my dear Lysis, I said you perceive that in things which we know every one will trust us—Hellenes and barbarians, men and women—and we may do as we please about them and no one will like to interfere with us we shall be free and masters of others and these things will be really ours for we shall be benefited by them But in things of which we have no understanding no one will trust us to do as seems good to us—they will hinder us as far as they can and not only strangers but father and mother and the friend if there be one who is dearer still will also hinder us and we shall be subject to others and these things will not be ours for we shall not be benefited by them Do you agree?

He assented

And shall we be friends to others and will any others love us in as far as we are useless to them?

Certainly not

Neither can your father or mother love you nor can anybody love anybody else in so far as they are useless to them?

No

And therefore my boy if you are wise all men will be your friends and kindred for you will be useful and good but if you are not wise neither father nor mother nor kindred nor any one else will be your friends And in matters of which you have as yet no knowledge can you have any conceit of knowledge?

That is impossible he replied

And you Lysis if you require a teacher have not yet attained to wisdom

True

And therefore you are not conceited having nothing of which to be conceited

Indeed Socrates I think not

When I heard him say this I turned to Hippothales and was very nearly making a blunder for I was going to say to him That is the way Hippothales in which you should talk to your beloved humbling and lowering him and not as you do puffing him up and spoiling him But I saw that he was in great excitement and confusion at what had been said and I remembered that although he was in the neighbourhood [211] he did not want to be seen by Lysis so upon second thoughts I refrained

In the meantime Menexenus came back and sat down in his place by Lysis and Lysis in a childish and affectionate manner whispered privately in my ear so that Menexenus should not hear Do Socrates tell Menexenus what you have been telling me

Suppose that you tell him yourself Lysis I replied for I am sure that you were attending

Certainly, he replied

Try then to remember the words and be as exact as you can in repeating them to him, and if you have forgotten anything ask me again the next time that you see me

I will be sure to do so Socrates but go on telling him something new and let me hear as long as I am allowed to stay

I certainly cannot refuse I said since you ask me but then as you know Menexenus is very pugnacious and therefore you must come to the rescue if he attempts to upset me

Yes indeed he said he is very pugnacious and that is the reason why I want you to argue with him

That I may make a fool of myself?

No indeed he said but I want you to put him down

That is no easy matter I replied for he is a terrible fellow—a pupil of Ctesippus And there is Ctesippus himself do you see him?

Never mind Socrates, you shall argue with him

Well I suppose that I must I replied

Hereupon Ctesippus complained that we were talking in secret and keeping the feast to ourselves

I shall be happy I said to let you have a share Here is Lysis who does not understand something that I was saying and wants me to ask Menexenus who as he thinks is likely to know

And why do you not ask him? he said

Very well I said I will and do you Menexenus answer But first I must tell you that I am one who from my childhood upward have set my heart upon a certain thing All people have their fancies some desire horses and others dogs and some are fond of gold and others of honour Now I have no violent desire of any of these things but I have a passion for friends and I would rather have a good friend than the best cock or quail in the world I would even go further and say the best horse or dog Yea by the dog of Egypt I should greatly prefer a real friend to all the gold of Darius [212] or even to Darius himself I am such a lover of friends as that And when I see you and Lysis at your early age so easily possessed of this treasure and so soon he of you and you of him I am amazed and delighted seeing that I myself although I am now advanced in years, am so far from having made a similar acquisition that I do not even know in what way a friend is acquired But I want to ask you a question about this for you have experience tell me then when one loves another is the lover or the beloved the friend or may either be the friend?

Either may I should think be the friend of either

Do you mean I said that if only one of them loves the other they are mutual friends?

Yes, he said that is my meaning

But what if the lover is not loved in return? which is a very possible case

Yes

Or is, perhaps, even hated? which is a fancy which sometimes is entertained by lovers respecting their beloved Nothing can exceed their love and yet they imagine either that they are not loved in return or that they are hated Is not that true?

Yes, he said quite true

In that case, the one loves and the other is loved?

Yes

Then which is the friend of which? Is the lover the friend of the beloved whether he be loved in return or hated or is the beloved the friend or is there no friendship at all on either side unless they both love one another?

There would seem to be none at all

Then this notion is not in accordance with our previous one We were saying that both were friends, if one only loved but now unless they both love neither is a friend

That appears to be true

Then nothing which does not love in return is beloved by a lover?

I think not.

Then they are not lovers of horses, whom the horses do not love in return nor lovers of quails, nor of dogs nor of wine nor of gymnastic exercises who have no return of love no nor of wisdom unless wisdom loves them in return Or shall we say that they do love them although they are not beloved by them and that the poet was wrong who sings—

Happy the man to whom his children are dear and steeds having single hoofs and dogs of chase and the stranger of another land?

I do not think that he was wrong

You think that he is right?

Yes

Then, Menexenus, the conclusion is, that what is beloved whether loving or hating may be dear to the lover of it for example very young children, too young to love or even hating their father or mother when they are punished by them [213] are never dearer to them than at the time when they are being hated by them

I think that what you say is true

And if so not the lover but the beloved is the friend or dear one?

Yes

And the hated one, and not the hater is the enemy?

Clearly

Then many men are loved by their enemies and hated by their friends and are the friends of their enemies, and the enemies of their friends Yet how absurd my dear friend or indeed impossible is this paradox of a man being an enemy to his friend or a friend to his enemy

I quite agree, Socrates, in what you say

But if this cannot be the lover will be the friend of that which is loved?

True

And the hater will be the enemy of that which is hated?

Certainly

Yet we must acknowledge in this, as in the preceding instance, that a man may be the friend of one who is not his friend or who may be his enemy when he loves that which does not love him or which even hates him. And he may be the enemy of one who is not his enemy and is even his friend for example when he hates that which does not hate him or which even loves him

That appears to be true.

But if the lover is not a friend nor the beloved a friend nor both together what are we to say? Whom are we to call friends to one another? Do any remain?

Indeed Socrates, I cannot find any

But, O Menexenus! I said may we not have been altogether wrong in our conclusions?

I am sure that we have been wrong Socrates said Lysis And he blushed as he spoke, the words seeming to come from his lips involuntarily because his whole mind was taken up with the argument there was no mistaking his attentive look while he was listening

I was pleased at the interest which was shown by Lysis, and I wanted to give Menexenus a rest, so I turned to him and said I think, Lysis that what you say is true and that, if we had been right, we should never have gone so far wrong let us proceed no further in this direction (for the road seems to be getting troublesome) but take the other path into which we turned and see what the poets have to say [214] for they are to us in a manner the fathers and authors of wisdom and they speak of friends in no light or trivial manner but God himself as they say makes them and draws them to one another and this they express if I am not mistaken in the following words —

God is ever drawing like towards like and making them acquainted

I dare say that you have heard those words

Yes he said I have

And have you not also met with the treatises of philosophers who say that like must love like? they are the people who argue and write about nature and the universe

Very true he replied

And are they right in saying this?

They may be

Perhaps I said about half or possibly altogether right if their meaning were rightly apprehended by us For the more a bad man has to do with a bad man and the more nearly he is brought into contact with him the more he will be likely to hate him for he injures him and injurer and injured cannot be friends Is not that true?

Yes he said

Then one half of the saying is untrue if the wicked are like one another?

That is true

But the real meaning of the saying as I imagine is that the good are like one another and friends to one another and that the bad as is often said of them are never at unity with one another or with themselves for they are passionate and restless and anything which is at variance and enmity with itself is not likely to be in union or harmony with any other thing Do you not agree?

Yes I do

Then my friend those who say that the like is friendly to the like mean to intimate if I rightly apprehend them that the good only is the friend of the good and of him only but that the evil never attains to any real friendship either with good or evil Do you agree?

He nodded assent

Then now we know how to answer the question Who are friends? for the argument declares That the good are friends

Yes he said that is true

Yes I replied and yet I am not quite satisfied with this answer By heaven and shall I tell you what I suspect? I will Assuming that like inasmuch as he is like is the friend of like and useful to him—or rather let me try another way of putting the matter Can like do any good or harm to like which he could not do to himself or suffer anything from his like which he would not suffer from himself? [215] And if neither can be of any use to the other, how can they be loved by one another? Can they now?

They cannot

And can he who is not loved be a friend?

Certainly not

But say that the like is not the friend of the like in so far as he is like still the good may be the friend of the good in so far as he is good?

True

But then again will not the good in so far as he is good be sufficient for himself? Certainly he will And he who is sufficient wants nothing—that is implied in the word sufficient

Of course not

And he who wants nothing will desire nothing?

He will not

Neither can he love that which he does not desire?

He cannot

And he who loves not is not a lover or friend?

Clearly not

What place then is there for friendship if when absent good men have no need of one another (for even when alone they are sufficient for themselves) and when present have no use of one another? How can such persons ever be induced to value one another?

They cannot

And friends they cannot be unless they value one another?

Very true

But see now Lysis, whether we are not being deceived in all this—are we not indeed entirely wrong?

How so? he replied

Have I not heard some one say as I just now recollect that the like is the greatest enemy of the like the good of the good?—Yes and he quoted the authority of Hesiod who says

Potter quarrels with potter bard with bard
Beggar with beggar

and of all other things he affirmed in like manner That of necessity the most like are most full of envy strife and hatred of one another and the most unlike of friendship For the poor man is compelled to be the friend of the rich and the weak requires the aid of the strong and the sick man of the physician and every one who is ignorant has to love and court him who knows And indeed he went on to say in grandiloquent language that the idea of friendship existing between similars is not the truth, but the very reverse of the truth, and that the most opposed are the most friendly; for that everything desires not like but that which is most unlike: for example, the dry desires the moist, the cold the hot, the bitter the sweet, the sharp the blunt, the void the full, the full the void, and so of all other things; for the opposite is the food of the opposite, whereas like receives nothing from like. [216] And I thought that he who said this was a charming man, and that he spoke well. What do the rest of you say?

I should say, at first hearing, that he is right, said Menexenus.

Then we are to say that the greatest friendship is of opposites?

Exactly.

Yes, Menexenus; but will not that be a monstrous answer? and will not the all-wise eristics be down upon us in triumph, and ask, fairly enough, whether love is not the very opposite of hate; and what answer shall we make to them—must we not admit that they speak the truth?

We must.

They will then proceed to ask whether the enemy is the friend of the friend, or the friend the friend of the enemy?

Neither, he replied.

Well, but is a just man the friend of the unjust, or the temperate of the intemperate, or the good of the bad?

I do not see how that is possible.

And yet, I said, if friendship goes by contraries, the contraries must be friends.

They must.

Then neither like and like nor unlike and unlike are friends.

I suppose not.

And yet there is a further consideration: may not all these notions of friendship be erroneous? but may not that which is neither good nor evil still in some cases be the friend of the good?

How do you mean? he said.

Why really, I said, the truth is that I do not know; but my head is dizzy with thinking of the argument, and therefore I hazard the conjecture, that 'the beautiful is the friend,' as the old proverb says. Beauty is certainly a soft, smooth, slippery thing, and therefore of a nature which easily slips in and permeates our souls. For I affirm that the good is the beautiful. You will agree to that?

Yes.

This I say from a sort of notion that what is neither good nor evil is the friend of the beautiful and the good, and I will tell you why I am inclined to think so: I assume that there are three principles—the good, the bad, and that which is neither good nor bad. You would agree—would you not?

I agree.

And neither is the good the friend of the good, nor the evil of the evil, nor the good of the evil;—these alternatives are excluded by the previous argument; and therefore, if there be such a thing as friendship or love at all, we must infer that what is neither good nor evil must be the friend, either of the good, or of that which is neither good nor evil, for nothing can be the friend of the bad.

True.

But neither can like be the friend of like, as we were just now saying.

True.

And if so, that which is neither good nor evil can have no friend which is neither good nor evil.

Clearly not.

Then the good alone is the friend of that only which is neither good nor evil.

[217] That may be assumed to be certain.

And does not this seem to put us in the right way? Just remark, that the body which is in health requires neither medical nor any other aid, but is well enough; and the healthy man has no love of the physician, because he is in health.

He has none.

But the sick loves him, because he is sick?

Certainly.

And sickness is an evil, and the art of medicine a good and useful thing?

Yes.

But the human body, regarded as a body, is neither good nor evil?

True.

And the body is compelled by reason of disease to court and make friends of the art of medicine?

Yes.

Then that which is neither good nor evil becomes the friend of good, by reason of the presence of evil?

So we may infer.

And clearly this must have happened before that which was neither good nor evil had become altogether corrupted with the element of evil—if itself had become evil it would not still desire and love the good; for, as we were saying, the evil cannot be the friend of the good.

in no light or trivial manner but God himself as they say, makes them and draws them to one another and this they express if I am not mistaken in the following words —

And is health a friend, or not a friend?

A friend.

And disease is an enemy?

Yes.

Then that which is neither good nor evil is the friend of the good because of the evil and hateful, and for the sake of the good and the friend?

Clearly.

Then the friend is a friend for the sake of the friend, and because of the enemy?

That is to be inferred.

Then at this point, my boys, let us take heed, and be on our guard against deceptions. I will not again repeat that the friend is the friend of the friend, and the like of the like, which has been declared by us to be an impossibility; but, in order that this new statement may not delude us, let us attentively examine another point, which I will proceed to explain. Medicine, as we were saying, is a friend, or dear to us for the sake of health?

Yes.

And health is also dear?

Certainly.

And if dear, then dear for the sake of something?

Yes.

And surely this object must also be dear, as is implied in our previous admissions?

Yes.

And that something dear involves something else dear?

Yes.

But then, proceeding in this way, shall we not arrive at some first principle of friendship or dearness which is not capable of being referred to any other, for the sake of which, as we maintain, all other things are dear, and, having there arrived, we shall stop?

True.

My fear is that all those other things, which as we say, are dear for the sake of another, are illusions and deceptions only, but where that first principle is, there is the true ideal of friendship. Let me put the matter thus: Suppose the case of a great treasure (this may be a son, who is more precious to his father than all his other treasures); would not the father, who values his son above all things, value other things also for the sake of his son? I mean, for instance, if he knew that his son had drunk hemlock, and the father thought that wine would save him, he would value the wine.

He would.

And also the vessel which contains the wine?

Certainly.

But does he therefore value the three measures of wine, or the earthen vessel which contains them, equally with his son? Is not this rather the true state of the case? All his anxiety has regard not to the means which are provided for the sake of an object, [220] but to the object for the sake of which they are provided. And although we may often say that gold and silver are highly valued by us, that is not the truth; for there is a further object, whatever it may be, which we value most of all, and for the sake of which gold and all our other possessions are acquired by us. Am I not right?

Yes, certainly.

And may not the same be said of the friend? That which is only dear to us for the sake of something else is improperly said to be dear, but the truly dear is that in which all these so-called dear friendships terminate.

That, he said, appears to be true.

And the truly dear or ultimate principle of friendship is not for the sake of any other or further dear.

True.

Then we have done with the notion that friendship has any further object. May we then infer that the good is the friend?

I think so.

And the good is loved for the sake of the evil? Let me put the case in this way: Suppose that of the three principles, good, evil, and that which is neither good nor evil, there remained only the good and the neutral, and that evil went far away, and in no way affected soul or body, nor ever at all that class of things which, as we say, are neither good nor evil in themselves;—would the good be of any use, or other than useless to us? For if there were nothing to hurt us any longer, we should have no need of anything that would do us good. Then would be clearly seen that we did but love and desire the good because of the evil, and as the remedy of the evil, which was the disease; but if there had been no disease, there would have been no need of a remedy. Is not this the nature of the good—to be loved by us who are placed between the two, because of the evil? but there is no use in the good for its own sake.

I suppose not.

Then the final principle of friendship, in which all other friendships terminated, those, I mean, which are relatively dear and for the sake of something else, is of another and a different nature from them. For they are called dear because of another dear or friend. But

Impossible

Further I must observe that some substances are assimilated when others are present with them and there are some which are not assimilated take for example the case of an ointment or colour which is put on another substance

Very good

In such a case is the substance which is anointed the same as the colour or ointment?

What do you mean? he said

This is what I mean Suppose that I were to cover your auburn locks with white lead would they be really white or would they only appear to be white?

They would only appear to be white he replied

And yet whiteness would be present in them?

True

But that would not make them at all the more white notwithstanding the presence of white in them—they would not be white any more than black?

No

But when old age infuses whiteness into them then they become assimilated and are white by the presence of white

Certainly

Now I want to know whether in all cases a substance is assimilated by the presence of another substance or must the presence be after a peculiar sort?

The latter he said

Then that which is neither good nor evil may be in the presence of evil but not as yet evil and that has happened before now?

Yes

And when anything is in the presence of evil not being as yet evil the presence of good arouses the desire of good in that thing [218] but the presence of evil which makes a thing evil takes away the desire and friendship of the good for that which was once both good and evil has now become evil only and the good was supposed to have no friendship with the evil?

None

And therefore we say that those who are already wise whether Gods or men are no longer lovers of wisdom nor can they be lovers of wisdom who are ignorant to the extent of being evil for no evil or ignorant person is a lover of wisdom There remain those who have the misfortune to be ignorant but are not yet hardened in their ignorance or void of understanding and do not as yet fancy that they know what they do not know and therefore those who are the lovers of wisdom are as yet neither good nor bad. But the bad do not love wisdom any more than the good for as we have already seen neither is unlike the friend of unlike, nor like of like. You remember that?

Yes they both said

And so Lysis and Menexenus we have discovered the nature of friendship—there can be no doubt of it Friendship is the love which by reason of the presence of evil the neither good nor evil has of the good either in the soul or in the body or anywhere

They both agreed and entirely assented and for a moment I rejoiced and was satisfied like a huntsman just holding fast his prey But then a most unaccountable suspicion came across me and I felt that the conclusion was untrue I was pained and said Alas! Lysis and Menexenus I am afraid that we have been grasping at a shadow only

Why do you say so? said Menexenus

I am afraid I said that the argument about friendship is false arguments like men are often pretenders

How do you mean? he asked

Well I said look at the matter in this way a friend is the friend of some one is he not?

Certainly he is

And has he a motive and object in being a friend or has he no motive and object?

He has a motive and object

And is the object which makes him a friend dear to him or neither dear nor hateful to him?

I do not quite follow you he said

I do not wonder at that I said But perhaps if I put the matter in another way you will be able to follow me and my own meaning will be clearer to myself The sick man as I was just now saying is the friend of the physician—is he not?

Yes

And he is the friend of the physician because of disease and for the sake of health?

Yes

And disease is an evil?

Certainly

And what of health? I said Is that good or evil or neither?

[219] Good he replied

And we were saying I believe that the body being neither good nor evil because of disease that is to say because of evil is the friend of medicine and medicine is a good and medicine has entered into this friendship for the sake of health and health is a good

True

They agreed to the latter alternative

Then my boys we have again fallen into the old discarded error for the unjust will be the friend of the unjust and the bad of the bad as well as the good of the good

That appears to be the result

But again if we say that the congenial is the same as the good in that case the good and he only will be the friend of the good

True

But that too was a position of ours which, as you will remember has been already refuted by ourselves

We remember

Then what is to be done? Or rather is there anything to be done? I can only like the wise men who argue in courts sum up the arguments —If neither the beloved nor the lover nor the like, nor the unlike nor the good nor the congenial nor any other of whom we spoke —for there were such a number of them that I cannot remember all—if none of these are friends I know not what remains to be said

[223] Here I was going to invite the opinion of some older person when suddenly we were interrupted by the tutors of Lysis and Menexenus who came upon us like an evil apparition with their brothers and bade them go home as it was getting late At first we and the by standers drove them off but afterwards as they would not mind and only went on shouting in their barbarous dialect, and got angry and kept calling the boys—they appeared to us to have been drinking rather too much at the Hermaea which made them difficult to manage —we fairly gave way and broke up the company

I said however a few words to the boys at parting O Menexenus and Lysis how ridiculous that you two boys and I an old boy who would fain be one of you should imagine ourselves to be friends—this is what the by standers will go away and say—and as yet we have not been able to discover what is a friend!

with the true friend or dear the case is quite the reverse for that is proved to be dear because of the hated and if the hated were away it would be no longer dear

Very true he replied at any rate not if our present view holds good

But oh! will you tell me, I said whether if evil were to perish we should hunger any more or thirst any more or have any similar desire? [221] Or may we suppose that hunger will remain while men and animals remain but not so as to be hurtful? And the same of thirst and the other desires —that they will remain but will not be evil because evil has perished? Or rather shall I say that to ask what either will be then or will not be is ridiculous for who knows? This we do know that in our present condition hunger may injure us and may also benefit us —Is not that true?

Yes

And in like manner thirst or any similar desire may sometimes be a good and sometimes an evil to us and sometimes neither one nor the other?

To be sure

But is there any reason why because evil perishes that which is not evil should perish with it?

None

Then even if evil perishes the desires which are neither good nor evil will remain?

Clearly they will

And must not a man love that which he desires and affects?

He must

Then even if evil perishes there may still remain some elements of love or friendship?

Yes

But not if evil is the cause of friendship for in that case nothing will be the friend of any other thing after the destruction of evil for the effect cannot remain when the cause is destroyed

True

And have we not admitted already that the friend loves something for a reason? and at the time of making the admission we were of opinion that the neither good nor evil loves the good because of the evil?

Very true

But now our view is changed and we conceive that there must be some other cause of friendship?

I suppose so

May not the truth be rather as we were saying just now that desire is the cause of friendship, for that which desires is dear to that which is desired at the time of desiring it? and may not the other theory have been only a long story about nothing?

Likely enough

But surely I said he who desires desires that of which he is in want?

Yes

And that of which he is in want is dear to him?

True

And he is in want of that of which he is deprived?

Certainly

Then love and desire and friendship would appear to be of the natural or congenial Such Lysis and Menexenus is the inference

They assented

Then if you are friends you must have natures which are congenial to one another?

Certainly they both said

And I say my boys that no one who loves or desires another would ever have loved or desired or affected him [222] if he had not been in some way congenial to him either in his soul or in his character or in his manners or in his form

Yes yes said Menexenus But Lysis was silent

Then I said the conclusion is that what is of a congenial nature must be loved

It follows he said

Then the lover who is true and no counterfeit must of necessity be loved by his love

Lysis and Menexenus gave a faint assent to this and Hippothales changed into all manner of colours with delight

Here intending to revise the argument I said Can we point out any difference between the congenial and the like? For if that is possible then I think Lysis and Menexenus there may be some sense in our argument about friendship But if the congenial is only the like how will you get rid of the other argument of the uselessness of like to like in as far as they are like for to say that what is useless is dear would be absurd? Suppose then that we agree to distinguish between the congenial and the like—in the intoxication of argument that may perhaps be allowed

Very true

And shall we further say that the good is congenial and the evil uncongenial to every one? Or again that the evil is congenial to the evil and the good to the good and that which is neither good nor evil to that which is neither good nor evil?

Nic As far as I am concerned Lysimachus and Melesias I applaud your purpose and will gladly assist you and I believe that you, Laches will be equally glad

La Certainly Nicias and I quite approve of the remark wh ch Lysimachus made about h s own father and the father of Melesias and which is applicable, not only to them but to us, and to e ery one who is occup ed with public affairs. As he says, such persons are too apt to be negl gent and careless of their own children and their private concerns There is much truth in that remark of yours, Lysimachus But why instead of consultin us, do you not consult our friend Socrates about the education of the youths? He is of the same deme with you, and is always passin, his time in places where the youth have any noble study or pursuit, such as you are enquiring after Lys Why Laches, has Socrates ever attended to matters of this sort?

La Certainly Lysimachus

Nic That I have the means of knowing as well as Laches for quite lately he supplied me with a teacher of music for my sons,—Damon, the d sciple of Agathocles, who is a most accom plished man in every way as well as a mus cian, and a companion of inestimable value for young men at their age

Lys Those who have reached my time of life Socrates and Nicias and Lacl es fall out of ac quaintance with the young because they are gen erally detained at home by old age but you, O son of Sophron scus, shoul I let your fellow demesman have the benefits of any advice wh ch you are able to give Moreover I have a claim upon you as an old friend of your father for I and he were always companions and friends and to the hour of his death there ne er was a difference between us and now it comes back to me at the ment on of yo r name, that I have heard these lads talking to one another at home [181] and often speak ng of Socrates in term of the highest praise but I have never thought to ask them whether the son of Soph on scus was the person whom they meant. Tell me, my boys, whether this is the Socrates of whom you have often spoken?

Son Certainl father th s is he

Lys I am delighted to hear Socrates, that you maintain the name of your father who was a most excellent man and I further r joice at the prospect of our fam ly ties being renewed

La Indeed, Lysima hus, you ought not to gi e him up for I can assure you that I have seen him ma nta n ng not only h s father s, but also his country s name He was my companion in the retreat from Delium and I can tell you that if others had only been like him the hon our of our country would have been upheld and the great defeat would never have occurred

Lys That is very high praise which is ac corded to you Socrates by faithful witnesses and for actions like those which they praise Let me tell you the pleasure wh ch I feel in hearing of your fame and I hope that you will regard me as one of your warmest friends You ought to have visited us long ago and made yourself at home with us but now from this day for ward, as we have at last found one another out do as I say—come and make acquaintance with me, and with these young men, that I may con tinue your friend as I was your father s I shall expect you to do so, and shall venture at some future time to remind you of your duty But what say you of the matter of which we were beginning to speak—the art of fighting in ar mour? Is that a practice in which the lads may be advantageously instructed?

Soc I will endeavour to advise you, Lysi machus, as far as I can in this matter and also in every way will comply with your wishes but as I am younger and not so experienced, I think that I ought certainly to hear first what my elders have to say and to learn of them and if I have anyth ng to add then I may venture to give my opin on to them as well as to you Suppose, Nicias that one or other of you begin

Nic I have no objection Socrates and my opinion is that the acquirement of this art is in many ways useful to young men It is an ad vantage to them that among the favourite amusements of their le sure hours they should have one wh ch tends to impro e and not to in jure their bodily health [182] No gymnastics could be better or harder exercise and this, and the art of rid ng are of all arts most befitting to a freeman for they only who are thus trained in the use of arms are the athletes of our mili tary profession, trained in that on which the conflict turns. Moreover in actual battle, when you have to fight in a line with a number of others, such an acqu rement will be of some use and will be of the greatest whenever the ranks are broken and you have to fight singly either in pu suit, when you are attacking some one who is defend ng himself or in flight, when you ha e to defend yourself against an assailant Certainly he who possessed the art could not meet w th any harm at the hands of a single person or perhaps of several and in any case he would have a great advantage. Further this

LACHES, or Courage

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE LYSIMACHUS son of Aristides MELESIAS, son of Thucydides THEIR SONS NICIAS, LACHES SOCRATES

[178] Lys You have seen the exhibition of the man fighting in armour Nicias and Laches but we did not tell you at the time the reason why my friend Melesias and I asked you to go with us and see him I think that we may as well confess what this was for we certainly ought not to have any reserve with you The reason was that we were intending to ask your advice Some laugh at the very notion of advis ing others and when they are asked will not say what they think They guess at the wishes of the person who asks them and answer ac cording to his and not according to their own opinion But as we know that you are good judges and will say exactly what you think we have taken you into our counsels The matter about which I am making all this pref ace is as follows Melesias and I have two sons that is his son and he is named Thucydides after his grandfather [179] and this is mine who is also called after his grandfather Aristi des Now we are resolved to take the greatest care of the youths and not to let them run about as they like which is too often the way with the young when they are no longer children but to begin at once and do the utmost that we can for them And knowing you to have sons of your own we thought that you were most likely to have attended to their training and im provement and if perchance you have not attended to them we may remind you that you ought to have done so and would invite you to assist us in the fulfilment of a common duty I will tell you Nicias and Laches even at the risk of being tedious how we came to think of this Melesias and I live together and our sons live with us and now as I was saying at first we are going to confess to you Both of us often talk to the lads about the many noble deeds which our own fathers did in war and peace—in the management of the allies and in the ad*ministration of the city but neither* of us has any deeds of his own which he can show The truth is that we are ashamed of this contrast being seen by them and we blame our fathers for letting us be spoiled in the days of our youth while they were occupied with the con cerns of others and we urge all this upon the lads pointing out to them that they will not grow up to honour if they are rebellious and take no pains about themselves but that if they take pains they may perhaps become worthy of the names which they bear They on their part promise to comply with our wishes and our care is to discover what studies or pursuits are likely to be most improving to them Some one commended to us the art of fighting in armour which he thought an excellent accom plishment for a young man to learn and he praised the man whose exhibition you have seen and told us to go and see him And we deter mined that we would go and get you to accom pany us and we were intending at the same time if you did not object to take counsel with you about the education of our sons That is the matter which we wanted to talk over with you [180] and we hope that you will give us your opinion about this art of fighting in ar mour and about any other studies or pursuits which may or may not be desirable for a young man to learn Please to say whether you agree to our proposal desirableness of this art; but, as I said at first, ask Socrates, and do not let him go until he has given you his opinion of the matter.

Lys. I am going to ask this favour of you, Socrates; as is the more necessary because the two councillors disagree, and some one is in a manner still needed who will decide between them. Had they agreed, no arbiter would have been required. But as Laches has voted one way and Nicias another, I should like to hear with which of our two friends you agree.

Soc. What, Lysimachus, are you going to accept the opinion of the majority?

Lys. Why, yes, Socrates; what else am I to do?

Soc. And would you do so too, Melesias? If you were deliberating about the gymnastic training of your son, would you follow the advice of the majority of us, or the opinion of the one who had been trained and exercised under a skilful master?

Mel. The latter, Socrates; as would surely be reasonable.

Soc. His one vote would be worth more than the vote of all us four?

Mel. Certainly.

Soc. And for this reason, as I imagine,—because a good decision is based on knowledge and not on numbers?

Mel. To be sure.

[185] Soc. Must we not then first of all ask, whether there is any one of us who has knowledge of that about which we are deliberating? If there is, let us take his advice, though he be one only, and not mind the rest; if there is not, let us seek further counsel. Is this a slight matter about which you and Lysimachus are deliberating? Are you not risking the greatest of your possessions? For children are your riches; and upon their turning out well or ill depends the whole order of their father's house.

Mel. That is true.

Soc. Great care, then, is required in this matter?

Mel. Certainly.

Soc. Suppose, as I was just now saying, that we were considering, or wanting to consider, who was the best trainer. Should we not select him who knew and had practised the art, and had the best teachers?

Mel. I think that we should.

Soc. But would there not arise a prior question about the nature of the art of which we want to find the masters?

Mel. I do not understand.

Soc. Let me try to make my meaning plainer then. I do not think that we have as yet decided what that is about which we are consulting, when we ask which of us is or is not skilled in the art, and has or has not had a teacher of the art.

Nic. Why, Socrates, is not the question whether young men ought or ought not to learn the art of fighting in armour?

Soc. Yes, Nicias; but there is also a prior question, which I may illustrate in this way: When a person considers about applying a medicine to the eyes, would you say that he is consulting about the medicine or about the eyes?

Nic. About the eyes.

Soc. And when he considers whether he shall set a bridle on a horse and at what time, he is thinking of the horse and not of the bridle?

Nic. True.

Soc. And in a word, when he considers any thing for the sake of another thing, he thinks of the end and not of the means?

Nic. Certainly.

Soc. And when you call in an adviser, you should see whether he too is skilful in the accomplishment of the end which you have in view?

Nic. Most true.

Soc. And at present we have in view some knowledge, of which the end is the soul of youth?

Nic. Yes.

Soc. And we are enquiring, Which of us is skilful or successful in the treatment of the soul, and which of us has had good teachers?

La. Well but, Socrates; did you never observe that some persons, who have had no teachers, are more skilful than those who have in some things?

Soc. Yes, Laches, I have observed that; but you would not be very willing to trust them if they only professed to be masters of their art, [186] unless they could show some proof of their skill or excellence in one or more works.

La. That is true.

Soc. And therefore, Laches and Nicias, as Lysimachus and Melesias, in their anxiety to improve the minds of their sons, have asked our advice about them, we too should tell them who our teachers were, if we say that we have had any, and prove them to be in the first place men of merit and experienced trainers of the minds of youth and also to have been really our teachers. Or if any of us says that he has no teacher, but that he has works of his own to show; then he should point out to them what sort of skill inclines a man to the love of other noble lessons for every man who has learned how to fight in armour will desire to learn the proper arrangement of an army which is the sequel of the lesson and when he has learned this and his ambition is once fired he will go on to learn the complete art of the general There is no difficulty in seeing that the knowledge and practice of other military arts will be honourable and valuable to a man and this lesson may be the beginning of them Let me add a further advantage which is by no means a slight one—that this science will make any man a great deal more valiant and self possessed in the field And I will not disdain to mention what by some may be thought to be a small matter—he will make a better appearance at the right time that is to say at the time when his appearance will strike terror into his enemies My opinion then Lysimachus is as I say that the youths should be instructed in this art and for the reasons which I have given But Laches may take a different view and I shall be very glad to hear what he has to say

La I should not like to maintain Nicias that any kind of knowledge is not to be learned for all knowledge appears to be a good and if as Nicias and as the teachers of the art affirm this use of arms is really a species of knowledge then it ought to be learned, but if not, and if those who profess to teach it are deceivers only or if it be knowledge but not of a valuable sort, then what is the use of learning it? [183] I say this because I think that if it had been really valuable the Lacedaemonians whose whole life is passed in finding out and practising the arts which give them an advantage over other nations in war would have discovered this one And even if they had not still these professors of the art would certainly not have failed to discover that of all the Hellenes the Lacedaemonians have the greatest interest in such matters and that a master of the art who was honoured among them would be sure to make his fortune among other nations just as a tragic poet would who is honoured among ourselves which is the reason why he who fancies that he can write a tragedy does not go about itinerating in the neighbouring states but rushes hither straight and exhibits at Athens and this is natural Whereas I perceive that these fighters in armour regard Lacedaemon as a sacred inviolable territory which they do not touch with the point of their foot but they make a circuit of the neighbouring states and would rather exhibit to any others than to the Spartans and particularly to those who would themselves acknowledge that they are by no means first rate in the arts of war Further Lysimachus I have encountered a good many of these gentlemen in actual service and have taken their measure which I can give you at once for none of these masters of fence have ever been distinguished in war—there has been a sort of fatality about them while in all other arts the men of note have been always those who have practised the art they appear to be a most unfortunate exception For example this very Stesilaus whom you and I have just witnessed exhibiting in all that crowd and making such great professions of his powers I have seen at another time making in sober truth an involuntary exhibition of himself which was a far better spectacle He was a marine on board a ship which struck a transport vessel and was armed with a weapon half spear half scythe the singularity of this weapon was worthy of the singularity of the man To make a long story short I will only tell you what happened to this notable invention of the scythe spear He was fighting and the scythe was caught in the rigging of the other ship and stuck fast and he tugged but was unable to get his weapon free The two ships were passing one another He first ran along his own ship holding on to the spear but as the other ship passed by and drew him after as he was holding on [184] he let the spear slip through his hand until he retained only the end of the handle The people in the transport clapped their hands and laughed at his ridiculous figure and when some one threw a stone which fell on the deck at his feet and he quitted his hold of the scythe spear the crew of his own trireme also burst out laughing they could not refrain when they beheld the weapon waving in the air suspended from the transport Now I do not deny that there may be something in such an art as Nicias asserts but I tell you my experience and as I said at first whether this be an art of which the advantage is so slight or not an art at all but only an imposition in either case such an acquirement is not worth having For my opinion is that if the professor of this art be a coward he will be likely to become rash and his character will be only more notorious or if he be brave and fail ever so little other men will be on the watch and he will be greatly traduced for there is a jealousy of such pretenders and unless a man be preeminent in valour he cannot help being ridiculous if he says that he has this sort of skill Such is my judgment Lysimachus of the de

suitableness of this art but, as I said at first ask Socrates and do not let him go until he has given you his opinion of the matter

Lys I am going to ask this favour of you Socrates as is the more necessary because the two councillors disagree and some one is in a manner still needed who will decide between them. sort of skill inclines a man to the love of other noble lessons for every man who has learned how to fight in armour will desire to learn the proper arrangement of an army which is the sequel of the lesson and when he has learned this and his ambition is once fired he will go on to learn the complete art of the general There is no difficulty in seeing that the knowledge and practice of other military arts will be honourable and valuable to a man and this lesson may be the beginning of them Let me add a further advantage which is by no means a slight one —that this science will make any man a great deal more valiant and self possessed in the field And I will not disdain to mention what by some may be thought to be a small matter —he will make a better appearance at the right time that is to say at the time when his appearance will strike terror into his enemies My opinion then Lysimachus is as I say that the youths should be instructed in this art and for the reasons which I have given But Laches may take a different view and I shall be very glad to hear what he has to say

La I should not like to maintain Nicias that any kind of knowledge is not to be learned for all knowledge appears to be a good and if as Nicias and as the teachers of the art affirm this use of arms is really a species of knowledge, then it ought to be learned but if not and if those who profess to teach it are deceivers only or if it be knowledge but not of a valuable sort then what is the use of learning it? [183] I say this because I think that if it had been really valuable the Lacedaemonians whose whole life is passed in finding out and practising the arts which give them an advantage over other nations in war would have discovered this one And even if they had not still these professors of the art would certainly not have failed to discover that of all the Hellenes the Lacedaemonians have the greatest interest in such matters and that a master of the art who was honoured among them would be sure to make his fortune among other nations just as a tragic poet would who is honoured among ourselves which is the reason why he who fancies that he can write a tragedy does not go about itinerating in the neighbouring states but rushes hither straight and exhibits at Athens and this is natural Whereas I perceive that these fighters in armour regard Lacedaemon as a sacred inviolable territory which they do not touch with the point of their foot but they make a circuit of the neighbouring states and would rather exhibit to any others than to the Spartans and particularly to those who would themselves acknowledge that they are by no means first rate in the arts of war Further Lysimachus I have encountered a good many of these gentlemen in actual service and have taken their measure which I can give you at once for none of these masters of fence have ever been distinguished in war —there has been a sort of fatality about them while in all other arts the men of note have been always those who have practised the art they appear to be a most unfortunate exception For example this very Stesilaus whom you and I have just witnessed exhibiting in all that crowd and making such great professions of his powers I have seen at another time making in sober truth an involuntary exhibition of himself which was a far better spectacle He was a marine on board a ship which struck a transport vessel and was armed with a weapon half spear half scythe the singularity of this weapon was worthy of the singularity of the man To make a long story short I will only tell you what happened to this notable invention of the scythe spear He was fighting and the scythe was caught in the rigging of the other ship and stuck fast and he tugged but was unable to get his weapon free The two ships were passing one another He first ran along his own ship holding on to the spear but as the other ship passed by and drew him after as he was holding on [184] he let the spear slip through his hand until he retained only the end of the handle The people in the transport clapped their hands and laughed at his ridiculous figure and when some one threw a stone which fell on the deck at his feet and he quitted his hold of the scythe spear the crew of his own trireme also burst out laughing they could not refrain when they beheld the weapon waving in the air suspended from the transport Now I do not deny that there may be something in such an art as Nicias asserts but I tell you my experience and as I said at first whether this be an art of which the advantage is so slight or not an art at all but only an imposition in either case such an acquirement is not worth having For my opinion is that if the professor of this art be a coward he will be likely to become rash and his character will be only more notorious or if he be brave and fail ever so little other men will be on the watch and he will be greatly traduced for there is a jealousy of such pretenders and unless a man be pre eminent in valour he cannot help being ridiculous if he says that he has this sort of skill Such is my judgment Lysimachus of the de unpleasant indeed I knew all along that where Socrates was, the argument would soon pass from our sons to ourselves and therefore I say that for my part, I am quite willing to discourse with Socrates in his own manner but you had better ask our friend Laches what his feeling may be.

La I have but one feeling Nicias, or (shall I say?) two feelings about discussions Some would think that I am a lover and to others I may seem to be a hater of discourse for when I hear a man discoursing of virtue or of any sort of wisdom who is a true man and worthy of his theme, I am delighted beyond measure and I compare the man and his words, and note the harmony and correspondence of them And such an one I deem to be the true musician attuned to a fairer harmony than that of the lyre, or any pleasant instrument of music for truly he has in his own life a harmony of words and deeds arranged not in the Ionian or in the Phrygian mode nor yet in the Lydian, but in the true Hellenic mode, which is the Dorian and no other Such an one makes me merry with the sound of his voice and when I hear him I am thought to be a lover of discourse so eager am I in drinking in his words But a man whose actions do not agree with his words is an annoyance to me and the better he speaks the more I hate him and then I seem to be a hater of discourse. As to Socrates, I have no knowledge of his words, but of old, as would seem, I have had experience of his deeds and his deeds show that free and noble sentiments are natural to [189] him And if his words accord, then I am of one mind with him and shall be delighted to be interrogated by a man such as he is, and shall not be annoyed at having to learn of him for I too agree with Solon that I would fain grow old learning many things But I must be allowed to add of the good only Socrates must be willing to allow that he is a good teacher or I shall be a dull and uncongenial pupil but that the teacher is younger or not as yet in repute—any thing of that sort is of no account with me And therefore, Socrates I give you notice that you may teach and confute me as much as ever you like, and also learn of me anything which I know So high is the opinion which I have entertained of you ever since the day on which you were my companion in danger and gave a proof of your valour such as only the man of merit can give Therefore, say whatever you like, and do not mind about the difference of our ages.

Soc I cannot say that either of you show any reluctance to take counsel and advise with me

Lys But this is our proper business and yours as well as ours for I reckon you as one of us Please then to take my place and find out from Nicias and Laches what we want to know for the sake of the youths and talk and consult with them for I am old, and my memory is bad and I do not remember the questions which I am going to ask, or the answers to them and if there is any interruption I am quite lost I will therefore beg of you to carry on the proposed discussion by yourselves and I will listen and Melesias and I will act upon your conclusions.

Soc Let us, Nicias and Laches, comply with the request of Lysimachus and Melesias There will be no harm in asking ourselves the question which was first proposed to us Who have been our own instructors in this sort of training and whom have we made better? But the other mode of carrying on the enquiry will bring us equally to the same point, and will be more like proceeding from first principles. For if we knew that the addition of something would improve some other thing and were able to make the addition then clearly we must know how that about which we are advising may be best and most easily attained Perhaps you do not understand what I mean [190] Then let me make my meaning plainer in this way Suppose we knew that the addition of sight makes better the eyes which possess this gift and also were able to impart sight to the eyes then, clearly we should know the nature of sight, and should be able to advise how this gift of sight may be best and most easily attained but if we knew neither what sight is, nor what hearing is, we should not be very good medical advisers about the eyes or the ears, or about the best mode of giving sight and hearing to them

La. That is true, Socrates

Soc And are not our two friends, Laches at this very moment inviting us to consider in what way the gift of virtue may be imparted to their sons for the improvement of their minds?

La Very true.

Soc Then must we not first know the nature of virtue? For how can we advise any one about the best mode of attaining something of which we are wholly ignorant?

La I do not think that we can Socrates

Soc Then Laches, we may presume that we know the nature of virtue?

La Yes

Soc And that which we know we must surely be able to tell?

La Certainly

Soc I would not have us begin my friend with enquiring about the whole of virtue for that may be more than we can accomplish let us first consider whether we have a sufficient knowledge of a part the enquiry will thus probably be made easier to us

La Let us do as you say Socrates

Soc Then which of the parts of virtue shall we select? Must we not select that to which the art of fighting in armour is supposed to conduce? And is not that generally thought to be courage?

La Yes certainly

Soc Then Laches suppose that we first set about determining the nature of courage and in the second place proceed to enquire how the young men may attain this quality by the help of studies and pursuits Tell me if you can what is courage

La Indeed Socrates I see no difficulty in answering he is a man of courage who does not run away but remains at his post and fights against the enemy there can be no mistake about that

Soc Very good Laches and yet I fear that I did not express myself clearly and therefore you have answered not the question which I intended to ask but another [191] La What do you mean Socrates?

Soc I will endeavour to explain you would call a man courageous who remains at his post and fights with the enemy?

La Certainly I should

Soc And so should I but what would you say of another man who fights flying instead of remaining?

La How flying?

Soc Why as the Scythians are said to fight flying as well as pursuing and as Homer says in praise of the horses of Aeneas that they knew how to pursue and fly quickly hither and thither and he passes an encomium on Aeneas himself as having a knowledge of fear or flight and calls him an author of fear or flight

La Yes Socrates and there Homer is right for he was speaking of chariots as you were speaking of the Scythian cavalry who have that way of fighting but the heavy armed Greek fights as I say remaining in his rank

Soc And yet Laches you must except the Lacedaemonians at Plataea who, when they came upon the light shields of the Persians are said not to have been willing to stand and fight and to have fled but when the ranks of the Persians were broken they turned upon them like cavalry and won the battle of Plataea

Soc That was my meaning when I said that I was to blame in having put my question badly and that this was the reason of your answering badly For I meant to ask you not only about the courage of heavy armed soldiers but about the courage of cavalry and every other style of soldier and not only who are courageous in war but who are courageous in perils by sea and who in disease or in poverty or again in politics are courageous and not only who are courageous against pain or fear but mighty to contend against desires and pleasures either fixed in their rank or turning upon their enemy There is this sort of courage—is there not Laches?

La Certainly Socrates

Soc And all these are courageous but some have courage in pleasures and some in pains some in desires and some in fears and some are cowards under the same conditions as I should imagine

La Very true

Soc Now I was asking about courage and cowardice in general And I will begin with courage and once more ask What is that common quality which is the same in all these cases and which is called courage? Do you now understand what I mean?

La Not over well

[192] Soc I mean this As I might ask what is that quality which is called quickness and which is found in running in playing the lyre in speaking in learning and in many other similar actions or rather which we possess in nearly every action that is worth mentioning of arms legs mouth voice mind —would you not apply the term quickness to all of them?

La Quite true

Soc And suppose I were to be asked by some one What is that common quality Socrates which in all these uses of the word you call quickness? I should say the quality which accomplishes much in a little time—whether in running speaking or in any other sort of action

La You would be quite correct

Soc And now Laches do you try and tell me in like manner What is that common quality which is called courage and which includes all the various uses of the term when applied both to pleasure and pain, and in all the cases to which I was just now referring?

La I should say that courage is a sort of endurance of the soul, if I am to speak of the universal nature which pervades them all

Soc But that is what we must do if we are to answer the question And yet I cannot say that every kind of endurance is, in my opinion to be deemed courage. Hear my reason I am sure, Laches, that you would consider courage to be a very noble quality

La Most noble, certainly

Soc And you would say that a wise endurance is also good and noble?

La Very noble.

Soc But what would you say of a foolish endurance? Is not that, on the other hand, to be regarded as evil and hurtful?

La True.

Soc And is anything noble which is evil and hurtful?

La I ought not to say that, Socrates.

Soc Then you would not admit that sort of endurance to be courage—for it is not noble but courage is noble?

La You are right.

Soc Then, according to you, only the wise endurance is courage?

La True.

Soc But as to the epithet "wise,"—wise in what? In all things small as well as great? For example, if a man shows the quality of endurance in spending his money wisely knowing that by spending he will acquire more in the end, do you call him courageous?

La Assuredly not.

Soc Or for example, if a man is a physician and his son, or some patient of his has inflammation of the lungs and begs that he may be allowed to eat or drink something, and the other is firm and refuses is that courage?

[193] La No that is not courage at all any more than the last

Soc Again take the case of one who endures in war and is willing to fight, and wisely calculates and knows that others will help him and that there will be fewer and inferior men against him than there are with him and suppose that he has also advantages of position — would you say of such a one who endures with all this wisdom and preparation, that he, or some man in the opposing army who is in the opposite circumstances to these and yet endures and remains at his post, is the braver?

La I should say that the latter Socrates, was the braver

Soc But, surely this is a foolish endurance in comparison with the other?

La That is true

Soc Then you would say that he who in an engagement of cavalry endures having the knowledge of horsemanship is not so courageous as he who endures, having no such knowledge?

La So I should say

Soc And he who endures, having a knowledge of the use of the sling, or the bow or of any other art, is not so courageous as he who endures, not having such a knowledge?

La True.

Soc And he who descends into a well and dives, and holds out in this or any similar action having no knowledge of diving or the like, is, as you would say more courageous than those who have this knowledge?

La Why Socrates, what else can a man say?

Soc Nothing, if that be what he thinks

La. But that is what I do think.

Soc And yet men who thus run risks and endure are foolish, Laches, in comparison of those who do the same things having the skill to do them.

La That is true

Soc But foolish boldness and endurance appeared before to be base and hurtful to us.

La Quite true.

Soc Whereas courage was acknowledged to be a noble quality

La True.

Soc And now on the contrary we are saying that the foolish endurance, which was before held in dishonour is courage

La Very true.

Soc And are we right in saying so?

La Indeed, Socrates, I am sure that we are not right.

Soc Then according to your statement, you and I Laches, are not attuned to the Dorian mode, which is a harmony of words and deeds for our deeds are not in accordance with our words Any one would say that we had courage who saw us in action, but not, I imagine, he who heard us talking about courage just now

La That is most true

Soc And is this condition of ours satisfactory?

La Quite the reverse

Soc Suppose, however that we admit the principle of which we are speaking to a certain extent.

[194] La To what extent and what principle do you mean?

Soc The principle of endurance We too must endure and persevere in the enquiry and then courage will not laugh at our faintheartedness in searching for courage which after all may very likely be endurance

La I am ready to go on Socrates and yet I am unused to investigations of this sort But the spirit of controversy has been aroused in me by what has been said and I am really grieved at being thus unable to express my meaning For I fancy that I do know the nature of courage but somehow or other she has slipped away from me and I cannot get hold of her and tell her nature

Soc But my dear friend should not the good sportsman follow the track and not be lazy?

La Certainly he should

Soc And shall we invite Nicias to join us? he may be better at the sport than we are What do you say?

La I should like that

Soc Come then Nicias and do what you can to help your friends who are tossing on the waves of argument and at the last gasp you see our extremity and may save us and also settle your own opinion if you will tell us what you think about courage

Nic I have been thinking Socrates that you and Laches are not defining courage in the right way for you have forgotten an excellent saying which I have heard from your own lips

Soc What is it Nicias?

Nic I have often heard you say that Every man is good in that in which he is wise and bad in that in which he is unwise

Soc That is certainly true Nicias

Nic And therefore if the brave man is good he is also wise

Soc Do you hear him Laches?

La Yes I hear him but I do not very well understand him

Soc I think that I understand him and he appears to me to mean that courage is a sort of wisdom

La What can he possibly mean Socrates?

Soc That is a question which you must ask of himself

La Yes

Soc Tell him then Nicias what you mean by this wisdom for you surely do not mean the wisdom which plays the flute?

Nic Certainly not

Soc Nor the wisdom which plays the lyre?

Nic No

Soc But what is this knowledge then and of what?

La I think that you put the question to him very well Socrates and I would like him to say what is the nature of this knowledge or wisdom

[195] Nic I mean to say Laches, that courage is the knowledge of that which inspires fear or confidence in war or in anything

La How strangely he is talking Socrates

Soc Why do you say so Laches?

La Why surely courage is one thing and wisdom another

Soc That is just what Nicias denies

La Yes that is what he denies but he is so silly

Soc Suppose that we instruct instead of abusing him?

Nic Laches does not want to instruct me, Socrates but having been proved to be talking nonsense himself he wants to prove that I have been doing the same

La Very true Nicias and you are talking nonsense as I shall endeavour to show Let me ask you a question Do not physicians know the dangers of disease? or do the courageous know them? or are the physicians the same as the courageous?

Nic Not at all

La No more than the husbandmen who know the dangers of husbandry or than other craftsmen who have a knowledge of that which inspires them with fear or confidence in their own arts and yet they are not courageous a whit the more for that

Soc What is Laches saying Nicias? He appears to be saying something of importance

Nic Yes he is saying something but it is not true

Soc How so?

Nic Why because he does not see that the physician s knowledge only extends to the nature of health and disease he can tell the sick man no more than this Do you imagine Laches that the physician knows whether health or disease is the more terrible to a man? Had not many a man better never get up from a sick bed? I should like to know whether you think that life is always better than death May not death often be the better of the two?

La Yes certainly so in my opinion

Nic And do you think that the same things are terrible to those who had better die, and to those who had better live?

La Certainly not

Nic And do you suppose that the physician or any other artist knows this, or any one in deed, except he who is skilled in the grounds of fear and hope? And him I call the courageous.

Soc. Do you understand his meaning, Laches?

La. Yes, I suppose that, in his way of speaking, the soothsayers are courageous. For who but one of them can know to whom to die or to live is better? And yet, Nicias, would you allow that you are yourself a soothsayer, or are you neither a soothsayer nor courageous?

Nic. What! do you mean to say that the soothsayer ought to know the grounds of hope or fear?

La. Indeed I do: who but he?

Nic. Much rather I should say he of whom I speak; for the soothsayer ought to know only the signs of things that are about to come to pass, whether death or disease, or loss of property, or victory, or defeat in war [196] or in any sort of contest; but to whom the suffering or not suffering of these things will be for the best, can no more be decided by the soothsayer than by one who is no soothsayer.

La. I cannot understand what Nicias would be at, Socrates; for he represents the courageous man as neither a soothsayer, nor a physician, nor in any other character, unless he means to say that he is a god. My opinion is that he does not like honestly to confess that he is talking nonsense, but that he shuffles up and down in order to conceal the difficulty into which he has got himself. You and I, Socrates, might have practised a similar shuffle just now, if we had only wanted to avoid the appearance of inconsistency. And if we had been arguing in a court of law there might have been reason in so doing; but why should a man deck himself out with vain words at a meeting of friends such as this?

Soc. I quite agree with you, Laches, that he should not. But perhaps Nicias is serious, and not merely talking for the sake of talking. Let us ask him just to explain what he means, and if he has reason on his side we will agree with him; if not, we will instruct him.

La. Do you, Socrates, if you like, ask him: I think that I have asked enough.

Soc. I do not see why I should not; and my question will do for both of us.

La. Very good.

Soc. Then tell me, Nicias, or rather tell us, for Laches and I are partners in the argument: Do you mean to affirm that courage is the knowledge of the grounds of hope and fear?

Nic. I do.

Soc. And not every man has this knowledge; the physician and the soothsayer have it not; and they will not be courageous unless they acquire it—that is what you were saying?

Nic. I was.

Soc. Then this is certainly not a thing which every pig would know, as the proverb says, and therefore he could not be courageous.

Nic. I think not.

Soc. Clearly not, Nicias; not even such a big pig as the Crommyonian sow would be called by you courageous. And this I say not as a joke, but because I think that he who assents to your doctrine, that courage is the knowledge of the grounds of fear and hope, cannot allow that any wild beast is courageous, unless he admits that a lion, or a leopard, or perhaps a boar, or any other animal, has such a degree of wisdom that he knows things which but a few human beings ever know by reason of their difficulty. He who takes your view of courage must affirm that a lion, and a stag, and a bull, and a monkey, have equally little pretensions to courage.

[197] La. Capital, Socrates; by the gods, that is truly good. And I hope, Nicias, that you will tell us whether these animals, which we all admit to be courageous, are really wiser than mankind; or whether you will have the boldness, in the face of universal opinion, to deny their courage.

Nic. Why, Laches, I do not call animals or any other things which have no fear of dangers, because they are ignorant of them, courageous, but only fearless and senseless. Do you imagine that I should call little children courageous, which fear no dangers because they know none? There is a difference, to my way of thinking, between fearlessness and courage. I am of opinion that thoughtful courage is a quality possessed by very few, but that rashness and boldness, and fearlessness, which has no forethought, are very common qualities possessed by many men, many women, many children, many animals. And you, and men in general, call by the term "courageous" actions which I call rash;—my courageous actions are wise actions.

La. Behold, Socrates, how admirably, as he thinks, he dresses himself out in words, while seeking to deprive of the honour of courage those whom all the world acknowledges to be courageous.

Nic. Not so, Laches, but do not be alarmed; for I am quite willing to say of you and also of Lamachus, and of many other Athenians, that you are courageous and therefore wise

La I could answer that but I would not have you cast in my teeth that I am a haughty Aexonian

Soc Do not answer him Laches I rather fancy that you are not aware of the source from which his wisdom is derived He has got all this from my friend Damon and Damon is always with Prodicus who of all the Sophists is considered to be the best puller to pieces of words of this sort

La Yes Socrates and the examination of such niceties is a much more suitable employment for a Sophist than for a great statesman whom the city chooses to preside over her

Soc Yes my sweet friend but a great statesman is likely to have a great intelligence And I think that the view which is implied in Nicias definition of courage is worthy of examination

La Then examine for yourself Socrates

Soc That is what I am going to do my dear friend Do not however suppose I shall let you out of the partnership for I shall expect you to apply your mind and join with me in the consideration of the question

La I will if you think that I ought

[198] Soc Yes I do but I must beg of you Nicias to begin again You remember that we originally considered courage to be a part of virtue

Nic Very true

Soc And you yourself said that it was a part and there were many other parts all of which taken together are called virtue

Nic Certainly

Soc Do you agree with me about the parts? For I say that justice temperance and the like are all of them parts of virtue as well as courage Would you not say the same?

Nic Certainly

Soc Well then so far we are agreed And now let us proceed a step and try to arrive at a similar agreement about the fearful and the hopeful I do not want you to be thinking one thing and myself another Let me then tell you my own opinion and if I am wrong you shall set me right in my opinion the terrible and the hopeful are the things which do or do not create fear and fear is not of the present nor of the past but is of future and expected evil Do you not agree to that Laches?

La Yes Socrates entirely

Soc That is my view Nicias the terrible things as I should say are the evils which are future and the hopeful are the good or not evil things which are future Do you or do you not agree with me?

Nic I agree

Soc And the knowledge of these things you call courage?

Nic Precisely

Soc And now let me see whether you agree with Laches and myself as to a third point

Nic What is that?

Soc I will tell you He and I have a notion that there is not one knowledge or science of the past another of the present a third of what is likely to be best and what will be best in the future but that of all three there is one science only for example there is one science of medicine which is concerned with the inspection of health equally in all times present past and future and one science of husbandry in like manner which is concerned with the productions of the earth in all times As to the art of the general you yourselves will be my witnesses that he has an excellent foreknowledge of the future and that he claims to be the master and not the servant of the soothsayer because he knows better what is happening or is likely to happen in war [199] and accordingly the law places the soothsayer under the general and not the general under the soothsayer Am I not correct in saying so Laches?

La Quite correct

Soc And do you Nicias also acknowledge that the same science has understanding of the same things whether future present or past?

Nic Yes indeed Socrates that is my opinion

Soc And courage my friend is as you say a knowledge of the fearful and of the hopeful?

Nic Yes

Soc And the fearful and the hopeful are admitted to be future goods and future evils?

Nic True

Soc And the same science has to do with the same things in the future or at any time?

Nic That is true

Soc Then courage is not the science which is concerned with the fearful and hopeful for they are future only courage like the other sciences is concerned not only with good and evil of the future but of the present and past and of any time?

Nic That as I suppose, is true

Soc Then the answer which you have given Nicias includes only a third part of courage, but our question extended to the whole nature of courage and according to your view that is according to your present view courage is not only the knowledge of the hopeful and the fearful, but seems to include nearly every good and evil without reference to time. What do you say to that alteration in your statement?

Nic. I agree, Socrates.

Soc. But then, my dear friend, if a man knew all good and evil, and how they are, and have been, and will be produced, would he not be perfect, and wanting in no virtue, whether justice, or temperance, or holiness? He would possess them all, and he would know which were dangers and which were not, and guard against them whether they were supernatural or natural; and he would provide the good, as he would know how to deal both with gods or men.

Nic. I think, Socrates, that there is a great deal of truth in what you say.

Soc. But then, Nicias, courage, according to this new definition of yours, instead of being a part of virtue only, will be all virtue?

Nic. It would seem so.

Soc. But we were saying that courage is one of the parts of virtue?

Nic. Yes, that was what we were saying.

Soc. And that is in contradiction with our present view?

Nic. That appears to be the case.

Soc. Then, Nicias, we have not discovered what courage is.

Nic. We have not.

[200] La. And yet, friend Nicias, I imagined that you would have made the discovery, when you were so contemptuous of the answers which I made to Socrates. I had very great hopes that you would have been enlightened by the wisdom of Damon.

Nic. I perceive, Laches, that you think nothing of having displayed your ignorance of the nature of courage, but you look only to see whether I have not made a similar display; and if we are both equally ignorant of the things which a man who is good for anything should know, that, I suppose, will be of no consequence. You certainly appear to me very like the rest of the world, looking at your neighbour and not at yourself. I am of opinion that enough has been said on the subject which we have been discussing; and if anything has been imperfectly said, that may be hereafter corrected by the help of Damon, whom you think to laugh down, although you have never seen him, and with the help of others. And when I am satisfied myself, I will freely impart my satisfaction to you, for I think that you are very much in want of knowledge.

La. You are a philosopher, Nicias; of that I am aware: nevertheless I would recommend Lysimachus and Melesias not to take you and me as advisers about the education of their children; but, as I said at first, they should ask Socrates and not let him off; if my own sons were old enough, I would have asked him myself.

Nic. To that I quite agree, if Socrates is willing to take them under his charge. I should not wish for any one else to be the tutor of Niceratus. But I observe that when I mention the matter to him he recommends to me some other tutor and refuses himself. Perhaps he may be more ready to listen to you, Lysimachus.

Lys. He ought, Nicias: for certainly I would do things for him which I would not do for many others. What do you say, Socrates—will you comply? And are you ready to give assistance in the improvement of the youths?

Soc. Indeed, Lysimachus, I should be very wrong in refusing to aid in the improvement of anybody. And if I had shown in this conversation that I had a knowledge which Nicias and Laches have not, then I admit that you would be right in inviting me to perform this duty; but as we are all in the same perplexity, why should one of us be preferred to another? [201] I certainly think that no one should; and under these circumstances, let me offer you a piece of advice (and this need not go further than ourselves). I maintain, my friends, that every one of us should seek out the best teacher whom he can find, first for ourselves, who are greatly in need of one, and then for the youth, regardless of expense or anything. But I cannot advise that we remain as we are. And if any one laughs at us for going to school at our age, I would quote to them the authority of Homer, who says that Modesty is not good for a needy man.

Let us, then, regardless of what may be said of us, make the education of the youths our own education.

Lys. I like your proposal, Socrates; and as I am the oldest, I am also the most eager to go to school with the boys. Let me beg a favour of you: Come to my house to-morrow at dawn, and we will advise about these matters. For the present, let us make an end of the conversation.

Soc. I will come to you to-morrow, Lysimachus, as you propose, God willing.

PROTAGORAS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE SOCRATES who is the narrator of the Dialogue to his Companion HIPPOCRATES ALCIBIADES CRITIAS PROTAGORAS HIPPIAS PRODICUS Sophists CALLIAS a wealthy Athenian Scene The House of Callias

[309] Com Where do you come from Socrates? And yet I need hardly ask the question for I know that you have been in chase of the fair Alcibiades I saw him the day before yesterday and he had got a beard like a man—and he is a man as I may tell you in your ear But I thought that he was still very charming

Soc What of his beard? Are you not of Homer s opinion who says

Youth is most charming when the beard first appears?

And that is now the charm of Alcibiades

Com Well and how do matters proceed? Have you been visiting him and was he gracious to you?

Soc Yes I thought that he was very gracious and especially to-day for I have just come from him and he has been helping me in an argument But shall I tell you a strange thing? I paid no attention to him and several times I quite forgot that he was present

Com What is the meaning of this? Has any thing happened between you and him? For surely you cannot have discovered a fairer love than he is certainly not in this city of Athens

Soc Yes much fairer

Com What do you mean—a citizen or a foreigner?

Soc A foreigner

Com Of what country?

Soc Of Abdera

Com And is this stranger really in your opinion a fairer love than the son of Cleinias?

Soc And is not the wiser always the fairer sweet friend?

Com But have you really met, Socrates with some wise one?

Soc Say rather with the wisest of all living men if you are willing to accord that title to Protagoras

Com What! Is Protagoras in Athens?

Soc Yes he has been here two days

Com And do you just come from an interview with him?

[310] Soc Yes and I have heard and said many things

Com Then if you have no engagement suppose that you sit down and tell me what passed and my attendant here shall give up his place to you

Soc To be sure and I shall be grateful to you for listening

Com Thank you too for telling us

Soc That is thank you twice over Listen then —

Last night or rather very early this morning Hippocrates the son of Apollodorus and the brother of Phason gave a tremendous thump with his staff at my door some one opened to him and he came rushing in and bawled out Socrates are you awake or asleep?

I knew his voice and said Hippocrates is that you? and do you bring any news?

Good news he said nothing but good

Delightful I said but what is the news? and why have you come hither at this unearthly hour?

He drew nearer to me and said Protagoras is come

Yes, I replied he came two days ago have you only just heard of his arrival?

Yes, by the gods, he said but not until yesterday evening

At the same time he felt for the truckle-bed, and sat down at my feet, and then he said Yesterday quite late in the evening on my return from Oenoe whither I had gone in pursuit of my runaway slave Satyrus as I meant to have told you, if some other matter had not come in the way —on my return, when we had done supper and were about to retire to rest, my brother said to me Protagoras is come. I was going to you at once, and then I thought that the night was far spent. But the moment sleep left me after my fatigue, I got up and came hither direct.

I who knew the very courageous madness of the man, said What is the matter? Has Protagoras robbed you of anything?

He replied, laughing Yes, indeed he has, Socrates, of the wisdom which he keeps from me.

But, surely I said, if you give him money and make friends with him, he will make you as wise as he is himself.

Would to heaven he replied, that this were the case! He might take all that I have, and all that my friends have, if he pleased. But that is why I have come to you now in order that you may speak to him on my behalf for I am young, and also I have never seen nor heard him [311] (when he visited Athens before I was but a child) and all men praise him Socrates he is reputed to be the most accomplished of speakers. There is no reason why we should not go to him at once, and then we shall find him at home He lodges, as I hear with Callias the son of Hipponicus let us start.

I replied Not yet, my good friend the hour is too early But let us rise and take a turn in the court and wait about there until daybreak when the day breaks, then we will go For Protagoras is generally at home, and we shall be sure to find him never fear

Upon this we got up and walked about in the court, and I thought that I would make trial of the strength of his resolution. So I examined him and put questions to him Tell me, Hippocrates, I said, as you are going to Protagoras, and will be paying your money to him, what is he to whom you are going? and what will he make of you? If for example, you had thought of going to Hippocrates of Cos, the Asclepiad and were about to give him your money and some one had said to you You are paying money to your namesake Hippocrates, O Hippocrates tell me, what is he that you give him money? how would you have answered?

I should say he replied that I gave money to him as a physician

And what will he make of you?

A physician, he said.

And if you were resolved to go to Polycleitus the Argive, or Pheidias the Athenian, and were intending to give them money and some one had asked you What are Polycleitus and Pheidias? and why do you give them this money? —how would you have answered?

I should have answered, that they were statuaries.

And what will they make of you?

A statuary of course.

Well now I said, you and I are going to Pro*tagoras, and we are ready to pay him money* on your behalf If our own means are sufficient, and we can gain him with these, we shall be only too glad but if not then we are to spend the money of your friends as well Now suppose, that while we are thus enthusiastically pursuing our object some one were to say to us Tell me, Socrates, and you Hippocrates what is Protagoras, and why are you going to pay him money —how should we answer? I know that Pheidias is a sculptor and that Homer is a poet but what appellation is given to Protagoras? how is he designated?

They call him a Sophist, Socrates, he replied.

Then we are going to pay our money to him in the character of a Sophist?

Certainly

But suppose a person were to ask this further question And how about yourself? [312] What will Protagoras make of you, if you go to see him?

He answered with a blush upon his face (for the day was just beginning to dawn so that I could see him) Unless this differs in some way from the former instances, I suppose that he will make a Sophist of me.

By the gods I said, and are you not ashamed at having to appear before the Hellenes in the character of a Sophist?

Indeed, Socrates, to confess the truth, I am.

But you should not assume, Hippocrates, that the instruction of Protagoras is of this nature may you not learn of him in the same way that you learned the arts of the grammarian or musician or trainer not with the view of mak ing any of them a profession but only as a part of education and because a private gentleman and freeman ought to know them?

Just so he said and that in my opinion is a far truer account of the teaching of Protagoras

I said I wonder whether you know what you are doing?

And what am I doing?

You are going to commit your soul to the care of a man whom you call a Sophist And yet I hardly think that you know what a Sophist is and if not then you do not even know to whom you are committing your soul and whether the thing to which you commit your self be good or evil

I certainly think that I do know he replied

Then tell me what do you imagine that he is?

I take him to be one who knows wise things he replied as his name implies

And might you not I said affirm this of the painter and of the carpenter also Do not they too know wise things? But suppose a person were to ask us In what are the painters wise? We should answer In what relates to the making of likenesses and similarly of other things And if he were further to ask What is the wisdom of the Sophist and what is the manufacture over which he presides?—how should we answer him?

How should we answer him Socrates? What other answer could there be but that he presides over the art which makes men eloquent?

Yes I replied that is very likely true but not enough for in the answer a further question is involved Of what does the Sophist make a man talk eloquently? The player on the lyre may be supposed to make a man talk eloquently about that which he makes him understand that is about playing the lyre Is not that true?

Yes

Then about what does the Sophist make him eloquent? Must not he make him eloquent in that which he understands?

Yes that may be assumed

And what is that which the Sophist knows and makes his disciple know?

Indeed he said I cannot tell

[313] Then I proceeded to say Well but are you aware of the danger which you are incurring? If you were going to commit your body to some one who might do good or harm to it would you not carefully consider and ask the opinion of your friends and kindred and deliberate many days as to whether you should give him the care of your body? But when the soul is in question which you hold to be of far more value than the body and upon the good or evil of which depends the well being of your all —about this you never consulted either with your father or with your brother or with any one of us who are your companions But no sooner does this foreigner appear than you instantly commit your soul to his keeping In the evening as you say, you hear of him and in the morning you go to him never deliberating or taking the opinion of any one as to whether you ought to intrust yourself to him or not —you have quite made up your mind that you will at all hazards be a pupil of Protagoras and are prepared to expend all the property of yourself and of your friends in carrying out at any price this determination although as you admit you do not know him and have never spoken with him and you call him a Sophist but are manifestly ignorant of what a Sophist is and yet you are going to commit yourself to his keeping

When he heard me say this he replied No other inference Socrates can be drawn from your words

I proceeded Is not a Sophist Hippocrates one who deals wholesale or retail in the food of the soul? To me that appears to be his nature

And what Socrates is the food of the soul?

Surely I said knowledge is the food of the soul and we must take care my friend that the Sophist does not deceive us when he praises what he sells like the dealers wholesale or re*tail who sell the food of the body for* they praise indiscriminately all their goods without knowing what are really beneficial or hurtful neither do their customers know with the exception of any trainer or physician who may happen to buy of them In like manner those who carry about the wares of knowledge and make the round of the cities and sell or retail them to any customer who is in want of them praise them all alike though I should not wonder O my friend if many of them were really ignorant of their effect upon the soul and their customers equally ignorant unless he who buys of them happens to be a physician of the soul If therefore you have understanding of what is good and evil you may safely buy knowledge of Protagoras or of any one [314] but if not then O my friend pause and do not hazard your dearest interests at a game of chance For there is far greater peril in buying knowledge than in buying meat and drink the one you purchase of the wholesale or retail dealer and carry them away in other vessels and before you receive them into the body as food you may deposit them at home and call in any experienced friend who knows what is good to be eaten or drunken and what not and how much and when and then the danger of purchasin them is not so great But you cannot buy the wares of knowledge and carry them away in another vessel when you have paid for them you must receive them into the soul and go your way either greatly harmed or greatly benefited and therefore we should deliberate and take counsel with our elders for we are still young—too young to determine such a matter And now let us go as we were intending and hear Protagoras and when we have heard what he has to say we may take counsel of others for not only is Protagoras at the house of Callias but there is Hippias of Elis and if I am not mistaken Prodicus of Ceos, and several other wise men

To this we agreed and proceeded on our way until we reached the vestibule of the house and there we stopped in order to conclude a discussion which had arisen between us as we were going along and we stood talking in the vestibule until we had finished and come to an understanding And I think that the door keeper who was a eunuch and who was probably annoyed at the great inroad of the Sophists must have heard us talking At any rate, when we knocked at the door and he opened and saw us he grumbled They are Sophists—he is not at home and instantly gave the door a hearty bang with both his hands Again we knocked and he answered without opening Did you not hear me say that he is not at home, fellows? But, my friend, I said you need not be alarmed for we are not Sophists and we are not come to see Callias but we want to see Protagoras and I must request you to announce us At last, after a good deal of difficulty the man was persuaded to open the door

When we entered we found Protagoras taking a walk in the cloister and next to him on one side, were walking Callias, the son of Hipponicus and Paralus the son of Pericles who by the mother's side is his half brother and Charmides, the son of Glaucon [315] On the other side of him were Xanthippus the other son of Pericles Philippides, the son of Philomelus also Antimoerus of Mende, who of all the disciples of Protagoras is the most famous and intends to make sophistry his profession A train of listeners followed him the greater part of them appeared to be foreigners, whom Protagoras had brought with him out of the various cities visited by him in his journeys, he, like Orpheus attracting them by his voice and they following I should mention also that there were some Athenians in the company Nothing delighted me more than the precision of their movements they never got into his way at all but when he and those who were with him turned back then the band of listeners parted regularly on either side he was always in front and they wheeled round and took their places behind him in perfect order

After him as Homer says I lifted up my eyes and saw Hippias the Elean sitting in the opposite cloister on a chair of state and around him were seated on benches Eryximachus the son of Acumenus, and Phaedrus the Myrrhinusian and Andron the son of Androtion and there were strangers whom he had brought with him from his native city of Elis, and some others they were putting to Hippias certain physical and astronomical questions and he, ex cathedra was determining their several questions to them and discoursing of them

Also my eyes beheld Tantalus for Prodicus the Cean was at Athens he had been lodged in a room which in the days of Hipponicus, was a storehouse but as the house was full Callias had cleared this out and made the room into a guest-chamber Now Prodicus was still in bed wrapped up in sheepskins and bed-clothes, of which there seemed to be a great heap and there was sitting by him on the couches near Pausanias of the deme of Cerameis and with Pausanias was a youth quite young who is certainly remarkable for his good looks and if I am not mistaken is also of a fair and gentle nature. I thought that I heard him called Agathon and my suspicion is that he is the beloved of Pausanias There was this youth and also there were the two Adeimantuses, one the son of Cepis and the other of Leucolophides and some others I was very anxious to hear what Prodicus was saying for he seems to me to be an all wise and inspired man [316] but I was not able to get into the inner circle, and his fine deep voice made an echo in the room which rendered his words inaudible

No sooner had we entered than there followed us Alcibiades the beautiful as you say and I believe you and also Critias the son of Callaeschrus

On entering we stopped a little in order to look about us, and then walked up to Protagoras, and I said Protagoras my friend Hippocrates and I have come to see you

Cf. Republic x, 600

Do you wish he said to speak with me alone or in the presence of the company?

Whichever you please I said you shall determine when you have heard the purpose of our visit

And what is your purpose? he said

I must explain I said that my friend Hippocrates is a native Athenian he is the son of Apollodorus and of a great and prosperous house and he is himself in natural ability quite a match for anybody of his own age I believe that he aspires to political eminence and this he thinks that conversation with you is most likely to procure for him And now you can determine whether you would wish to speak to him of your teaching alone or in the presence of the company

Thank you Socrates for your consideration of me For certainly a stranger finding his way into great cities and persuading the flower of the youth in them to leave the company of their kinsmen or any other acquaintances old or young and live with him under the idea that they will be improved by his conversation ought to be very cautious great jealousies are aroused by his proceedings and he is the subject of many enmities and conspiracies Now the art of the Sophist is as I believe of great antiquity but in ancient times those who practised it fearing this odium veiled and disguised themselves under various names some under that of poets as Homer Hesiod and Simonides some of hierophants and prophets as Orpheus and Musaeus and some as I observe even under the name of gymnastic masters like Iccus of Tarentum or the more recently celebrated Herodicus now of Selymbria and formerly of Megara who is a first rate Sophist Your own Agathocles pretended to be a musician but was really an eminent Sophist also Pythocleides the Cean and there were many others and all of them as I was saying adopted these arts as veils or disguises because they were afraid of the odium which they would incur But that is not my way [317] for I do not believe that they effected their purpose which was to deceive the government who were not blinded by them and as to the people they have no understanding and only repeat what their rulers are pleased to tell them Now to run away and to be caught in running away is the very height of folly and also greatly increases the exasperation of mankind for they regard him who runs away as a rogue in addition to any other objections which they have to him, and therefore I take an entirely opposite course and acknowledge myself to be a Sophist and instructor of mankind such an open acknowledgement appears to me to be a better sort of caution than concealment. Nor do I neglect other precautions and therefore I hope, as I may say by the favour of heaven that no harm will come of the acknowledgment that I am a Sophist And I have been now many years in the profession—for all my years when added up are many there is no one here present of whom I might not be the father Wherefore I should much prefer conversing with you if you want to speak with me in the presence of the company

As I suspected that he would like to have a little display and glorification in the presence of Prodicus and Hippias and would gladly show us to them in the light of his admirers, I said But why should we not summon Prodicus and Hippias and their friends to hear us?

Very good he said

Suppose said Callias that we hold a council in which you may sit and discuss —This was agreed upon and great delight was felt at the prospect of hearing wise men talk we ourselves took the chairs and benches and arranged them by Hippias where the other benches had been already placed Meanwhile Callias and Alcibiades got Prodicus out of bed and brought in him and his companions

When we were all seated Protagoras said Now that the company are assembled Socrates, tell me about the young man of whom you were just now speaking [318]

I replied I will begin again at the same point Protagoras and tell you once more the purport of my visit this is my friend Hippocrates who is desirous of making your acquaintance he would like to know what will happen to him if he associates with you I have no more to say

Protagoras answered Young man if you associate with me on the very first day you will return home a better man than you came and better on the second day than on the first and better every day than you were on the day before

When I heard this I said Protagoras I do not at all wonder at hearing you say this even at your age and with all your wisdom if any one were to teach you what you did not know before you would become better no doubt but please to answer in a different way—I will explain how by an example Let me suppose that Hippocrates instead of desiring your acquaintance wished to become acquainted with the young man Zeuxippus of Heraclea, who has lately been in Athens, and he had come to him as he has come to you, and had heard him say as he has heard you say that every day he would grow and become better if he associated with him and then suppose that he were to ask him, In what shall I become better and in what shall I grow?"—Zeuxippus would answer In painting. And suppose that he went to Orthagoras the Theban, and heard him say the same thing, and asked him, "In what shall I become better day by day?" he would reply In flute-playing." Now I want you to make the same sort of answer to this young man and to me, who am asking questions on his account. When you say that on the first day on which he associates with you he will return home a better man, and on every day will grow in like manner—in what, Protagoras, will he be better and about what?

When Protagoras heard me say this, he replied You ask questions fairly and I like to answer a question which is fairly put. If Hippocrates comes to me he will not experience the sort of drudgery with which other Sophists are in the habit of insulting their pupils who, when they have just escaped from the arts, are taken and driven back into them by these teachers, and made to learn calculation, and astronomy and geometry and music (he gave a look at Hippias as he said this) but if he comes to me, he will learn that which he comes to learn. And this is prudence in affairs private as well as public he will learn to order his own house in the best manner and he will be able to speak and act for the best in the affairs of the state.

[319] Do I understand you, I said and is your meaning that you teach the art of politics, and that you promise to make men good citizens?

That, Socrates, is exactly the profession which I make.

Then, I said, you do indeed possess a noble art, if there is no mistake about this for I will freely confess to you, Protagoras, that I have a doubt whether this art is capable of being taught, and yet I know not how to disbelieve your assertion And I ought to tell you why I am of opinion that this art cannot be taught or communicated by man to man. I say that the Athenians are an understanding people, and indeed they are esteemed to be such by the other Hellenes. Now I observe that when we are met together in the assembly and the matter in hand relates to building, the builders are summoned as advisers when the question is one of shipbuilding, then the ship-wrights and the like of other arts which they think capable of being taught and learned. And if some person offers to give them advice who is not supposed by them to have any skill in the art, even though he be good looking and rich, and noble, they will not listen to him, but laugh and hoot at him, until either he is clamoured down and retires of himself or if he persist, he is dragged away or put out by the constables at the command of the prytanes. This is their way of behaving about professors of the arts. But when the question is an affair of state, then everybody is free to have a say—carpenter tinker cobbler sailor passenger rich and poor high and low—any one who likes gets up, and no one reproaches him, as in the former case, with not having learned, and having no teacher and yet giving advice evidently because they are under the impression that this sort of knowledge cannot be taught. And not only is this true of the state, but of individuals the best and wisest of our citizens are unable to impart their political wisdom to others [320] as for example, Pericles, the father of these young men, who gave them excellent instruction in all that could be learned from masters, in his own department of politics neither taught them, nor gave them teachers but they were allowed to wander at their own free will in a sort of hope that they would light upon virtue of their own accord. Or take another example there was Cleinias the younger brother of our friend Alcibiades, of whom this very same Pericles was the guardian and he being in fact under the apprehension that Cleinias would be corrupted by Alcibiades, took him away and placed him in the house of Ariphron to be educated but before six months had elapsed, Ariphron sent him back, not knowing what to do with him. And I could mention numberless other instances of persons who were good themselves, and never yet made any one else good, whether friend or stranger Now I Protagoras, having these examples before me, am inclined to think that virtue cannot be taught. But then again, when I listen to your words, I waver and am disposed to think that there must be something in what you say because I know that you have great experience, and learning, and invention. And I wish that you would, if possible, show me a little more clearly that virtue can be taught. Will you be so good?

That I will, Socrates, and gladly But what would you like? Shall I, as an elder speak to

Do you wish he said to speak with me alone or in the presence of the company?

Whichever you please I said you shall determine when you have heard the purpose of our visit

Zeus I should like them all to have a share for cases cannot exist, if a few only share in the virtues, as in the arts. And further make a law by my order that he who has no part in reverence and justice shall be put to death for he is a plague of the state"

And this is the reason Socrates, why the Athenians and mankind in general, when the question relates to carpentering or any other mechanical art, allow but a few to share in their deliberations and when any one else interferes, then, as you say they object, if he be not of the favoured few which, as I reply is very natural. But when they meet to deliberate about political virtue, [323] which proceeds only by way of justice and wisdom, they are patient enough of any man who speaks of them, as is also natural because they think that every man ought to share in this sort of virtue, and that states could not exist if this were otherwise. I have explained to you, Socrates, the reason of this phenomenon.

And that you may not suppose yourself to be deceived in thinking that all men regard every man as having a share of justice or honesty and of every other political virtue, let me give you a further proof which is this. In other cases, as you are aware, if a man says that he is a good flute-player or skilful in any other art in which he has no skill, people either laugh at him or are angry with him, and his relations think that he is mad and go and admonish him but when honesty is in question or some other political virtue, even if they know that he is dishonest, yet, if the man comes publicly forward and tells the truth about his dishonesty then, what in the other case was held by them to be good sense, they now deem to be madness. They say that all men ought to profess honesty whether they are honest or not, and that a man is out of his mind who says anything else. Their notion is, that a man must have some degree of honesty and that if he has none at all he ought not to be in the world.

I have been showing that they are right in admitting every man as a counsellor about this sort of virtue, as they are of opinion that every man is a partaker of it. And I will now endeavour to show further that they do not conceive this virtue to be given by nature, or to grow spontaneously but to be a thing which may be taught and which comes to a man by taking pains. No one would instruct, no one would rebuke, or be angry with those whose calamities they suppose to be due to nature or chance they do not try to punish or to prevent them from being what they are they do but pity them Who is so foolish as to chastise or instruct the ugly or the diminutive, or the feeble? And for this reason Because he knows that good and evil of this kind is the work of nature and of chance whereas if a man is wanting in those good qualities which are attained by study and exercise and teaching and has only the contrary evil qualities, other men are angry with him, and punish and reprove him—of these evil qualities one is impiety [324] another injustice, and they may be described generally as the very opposite of political virtue. In such cases any man will be angry with another and reprimand him,—clearly because he thinks that by study and learning, the virtue in which the other is deficient may be acquired If you will think, Socrates, of the nature of punishment, you will see at once that in the opinion of mankind virtue may be acquired no one punishes the evil-doer under the notion, or for the reason that he has done wrong—only the unreasonable fury of a beast acts in that manner But he who desires to inflict rational punishment does not retaliate for a past wrong which cannot be undone he has regard to the future, and is desirous that the man who is punished, and he who sees him punished may be deterred from doing wrong again He punishes for the sake of prevention, thereby clearly implying that virtue is capable of being taught. This is the notion of all who retaliate upon others either privately or publicly And the Athenians, too your own citizens, like other men, punish and take vengeance on all whom they regard as evil doers and hence, we may infer them to be of the number of those who think that virtue may be acquired and taught. Thus far Socrates I have shown you clearly enough, if I am not mistaken, that your countrymen are right in admitting the tinker and the cobbler to advise about politics, and also that they deem virtue to be capable of being taught and acquired

There yet remains one difficulty which has been raised by you about the sons of good men What is the reason why good men teach their sons the knowledge which is gained from teachers, and make them wise in that, but do nothing towards improving them in the virtues which distinguish themselves? And here, Socrates, I will leave the apologue and resume the argument. Please to consider Is there or is there not some one quality of which all the citizens must be partakers, if there is to be a city at all? In the answer to this question is con-

you as younger men in an apologue or myth or shall I argue out the question?

To this several of the company answered that he should choose for himself

Well then he said I think that the myth will be more interesting

Once upon a time there were gods only and no mortal creatures But when the time came that these also should be created the gods fashioned them out of earth and fire and various mixtures of both elements in the interior of the earth and when they were about to bring them into the light of day they ordered Prometheus and Epimetheus to equip them and to distribute to them severally their proper qualities Epimetheus said to Prometheus Let me distribute and do you inspect This was agreed and Epimetheus made the distribution There were some to whom he gave strength without swiftness while he equipped the weaker with swiftness some he armed and others he left unarmed and devised for the latter some other means of preservation making some large and having their size as a protection and others small whose nature was to fly in the air or burrow in the ground [321] this was to be their way of escape Thus did he compensate them with the view of preventing any race from becoming extinct And when he had provided against their destruction by one another he contrived also a means of protecting them against the seasons of heaven clothing them with close hair and thick skins sufficient to defend them against the winter cold and able to resist the summer heat so that they might have a natural bed of their own when they wanted to rest also he furnished them with hoofs and hair and hard and callous skins under their feet Then he gave them varieties of food—herb of the soil to some to others fruits of trees and to others roots and to some again he gave other animals as food And some he made to have few young ones while those who were their prey were very prolific and in this manner the race was preserved Thus did Epimetheus who not being very wise forgot that he had distributed among the brute animals all the qualities which he had to give—and when he came to man who was still unprovided he was terribly perplexed Now while he was in this perplexity Prometheus came to inspect the distribution and he found that the other animals were suitably furnished but that man alone was naked and shoeless and had neither bed nor arms of defence The appointed hour was approaching when man in his turn was to go forth into the light of day and Prometheus not knowing how he could devise his salvation stole the mechanical arts of Hephaestus and Athene and fire with them (they could neither have been acquired nor used without fire) and gave them to man Thus man had the wisdom necessary to the support of life but political wisdom he had not for that was in the keeping of Zeus and the power of Prometheus did not extend to entering into the citadel of heaven where Zeus dwelt who moreover had terrible sentinels but he did enter by stealth into the common workshop of Athene and Hephaestus in which they used to practise their favourite arts and carried off Hephaestus art of working by fire and also the art of Athene and gave them to man And in this way man was supplied with the means of life But Prometheus is said to have been afterwards prosecuted for theft owing to the blunder of Epimetheus

freely teaching everybody the art, both in private and public, and reproving the bad player as freely and openly as every man now teaches justice and the laws, not concealing them as he would conceal the other arts, but imparting them—for all of us have a mutual interest in the justice and virtue of one another, and this is the reason why every one is so ready to teach justice and the laws—suppose, I say, that there were the same readiness and liberality among us in teaching one another flute-playing, do you imagine, Socrates, that the sons of good flute-players would be more likely to be good than the sons of bad ones? I think not. Would not their sons grow up to be distinguished or undistinguished according to their own natural capacities as flute-players, and the son of a good player would often turn out to be a bad one, and the son of a bad player to be a good one, and all flute-players would be good enough in comparison of those who were ignorant and unacquainted with the art of flute-playing? In like manner I would have you consider that he who appears to you to be the worst of those who have been brought up in laws and humanities, would appear to be a just man and a master of justice if he were to be compared with men who had no education, or courts of justice, or laws, or any restraints upon them which compelled them to practise virtue—with the savages, for example, whom the poet Pherecrates exhibited on the stage at the last year's Lenaean festival. If you were living among men such as the man-haters in his Chorus, you would be only too glad to meet with Eurybates and Phrynondas, and you would sorrowfully long to revisit the rascality of this part of the world. And you, Socrates, are discontented, and why? Because all men are teachers of virtue, each one according to his ability; and you say Where are the teachers? [328] You might as well ask, Who teaches Greek? For of that too there will not be any teachers found. Or you might ask, Who is to teach the sons of our artisans this same art which they have learned of their fathers? He and his fellow workmen have taught them to the best of their ability—but who will carry them further in their arts? And you would certainly have a difficulty, Socrates, in finding a teacher of them; but there would be no difficulty in finding a teacher of those who are wholly ignorant. And this is true of virtue or of anything else; if a man is better able than we are to promote virtue ever so little, we must be content with the result. A teacher of this sort I believe myself to be, and above all other men to have the knowledge which makes a man noble and good; and I give my pupils their money's-worth, and even more, as they themselves confess. And therefore I have introduced the following mode of payment:—When a man has been my pupil, if he likes he pays my price, but there is no compulsion; and if he does not like, he has only to go into a temple and take an oath of the value of the instructions, and he pays no more than he declares to be their value.

Such is my Apologue, Socrates, and such is the argument by which I endeavour to show that virtue may be taught, and that this is the opinion of the Athenians. And I have also attempted to show that you are not to wonder at good fathers having bad sons, or at good sons having bad fathers, of which the sons of Polycleitus afford an example, who are the companions of our friends here, Paralus and Xanthippus, but are nothing in comparison with their father; and this is true of the sons of many other artists. As yet I ought not to say the same of Paralus and Xanthippus themselves, for they are young and there is still hope of them.

Protagoras ended, and in my ear

Thought him still speaking; still stood fixed to hear.[1]

At length, when the truth dawned upon me, that he had really finished, not without difficulty I began to collect myself, and looking at Hippocrates, I said to him: O son of Apollodorus, how deeply grateful I am to you for having brought me hither; I would not have missed the speech of Protagoras for a great deal. For I used to imagine that no human care could make men good; but I know better now. Yet I have still one very small difficulty which I am sure that Protagoras will easily explain, as he has already explained so much. If a man were to go and consult Pericles or any of our great speakers [329] about these matters, he might perhaps hear as fine a discourse; but then when one has a question to ask of any of them, like books, they can neither answer nor ask; and if any one challenges the least particular of their speech, they go ringing on in a long harangue, like brazen pots, which when they are struck continue to sound unless some one puts his hand upon them; whereas our friend Protagoras can not only make a good speech, as he has already shown, but when he is asked a question he can answer briefly; and when he asks he will tained the only solution of your difficulty there is no other For if there be any such quality and this quality or unity is not the art of the carpenter [325] or the smith or the potter but justice and temperance and holiness and in a word manly virtue—if this is the quality of which all men must be partakers and which is the very condition of their learning or doing anything else and if he who is wanting in this, whether he be a child only or a grown up man or woman must be taught and punished until by punishment he becomes better and he who rebels against instruction and punishment is either exiled or condemned to death under the idea that he is incurable—if what I am saying be true good men have their sons taught other things and not this do consider how extraordinary their conduct would appear to be For we have shown that they think virtue capable of being taught and cultivated both in private and public and notwithstanding they have their sons taught lesser matters ignorance of which does not involve the punishment of death but greater things of which the ignorance may cause death and exile to those who have no training or knowledge of them—aye and confiscation as well as death and in a word may be the ruin of families—those things I say they are supposed not to teach them—not to take the utmost care that they should learn How improbable is this Socrates!

Education and admonition commence in the first years of childhood and last to the very end of life Mother and nurse and father and tutor are vying with one another about the improvement of the child as soon as ever he is able to understand what is being said to him he cannot say or do anything without their setting forth to him that this is just and that is unjust this is honourable that is dishonourable this is holy that is unholy do this and abstain from that And if he obeys well and good if not he is straightened by threats and blows like a piece of bent or warped wood At a later stage they send him to teachers and enjoin them to see to his manners even more than to his reading and music and the teachers do as they are desired And when the boy has learned his letters and is beginning to understand what is written as before he understood only what was spoken [326] they put into his hands the works of great poets which he reads sitting on a bench at school in these are contained many admonitions and many tales and praises, and encomia of ancient famous men which he is required to learn by heart, in order that he may imitate or emulate them and desire to become like them Then again the teachers of the lyre take similar care that their young disciple is temperate and gets into no mischief and when they have taught him the use of the lyre they introduce him to the poems of other excellent poets who are the lyric poets and these they set to music and make their harmonies and rhythms quite familiar to the children s souls, in order that they may learn to be more gentle, and harmonious and rhythmical and so more fitted for speech and action for the life of man in every part has need of harmony and rhythm Then they send them to the master of gymnastic, in order that their bodies may better minister to the virtuous mind and that they may not be compelled through bodily weakness to play the coward in war or on any other occasion This is what is done by those who have the means, and those who have the means are the rich their children begin to go to school soonest and leave off latest When they have done with masters the state again compels them to learn the laws and live after the pattern which they furnish and not after their own fancies and just as in learning to write, the writing master first draws lines with a style for the use of the young beginner and gives him the tablet and makes him follow the lines, so the city draws the laws which were the invention of good lawgivers living in the olden time these are given to the young man in order to guide him in his conduct whether he is commanding or obeying and he who transgresses them is to be corrected or in other words called to account which is a term used not only in your country but also in many others seeing that justice calls men to account Now when there is all this care about virtue private and public why Socrates, do you still wonder and doubt whether virtue can be taught? Cease to wonder for the opposite would be far more surprising

But why then do the sons of good fathers often turn out ill? There is nothing very wonderful in this for as I have been saying the existence of a state implies that virtue is not any man s private possession [327] If so—and nothing can be truer—then I will further ask you to imagine as an illustration some other pursuit or branch of knowledge which may be assumed equally to be the condition of the existence of a state Suppose that there could be no state unless we were all flute players as far as each had the capacity and everybody was freely teaching everybody the art, both in private and public, and reproving the bad player as freely and openly as every man now teaches justice and the laws not concealing them as he would conceal the other arts but imparting them—for all of us have a mutual interest in the justice and virtue of one another and this is the reason why every one is so ready to teach justice and the laws —suppose I say that there were the same readiness and liberality among us in teaching one another flute playing do you imagine Socrates, that the sons of good flute players would be more likely to be good than the sons of bad ones? I think not. Would not their sons grow up to be distinguished or undistinguished according to their own natural capacities as flute players and the son of a good player would often turn out to be a bad one, and the son of a bad player to be a good one and all flute players would be good enough in comparison of those who were ignorant and unacquainted with the art of flute playing? In like manner I would have you consider that he who appears to you to be the worst of those who have been brought up in laws and humanities would appear to be a just man and a master of justice if he were to be compared with men who had no education or courts of justice or laws or any restraints upon them which compelled them to practise virtue—with the savages, for example whom the poet Pherecrates exhibited on the stage at the last year's Lenaean festival If you were living among men such as the man haters in his Chorus you would be only too glad to meet with Eurybates and Phrynondas, and you would sorrowfully long to revisit the rascality of this part of the world And you Socrates are discontented and why? Because all men are teachers of virtue each one according to his ability and you say Where are the teachers? [328] You might as well ask, Who teaches Greek? For of that too there will not be any teachers found Or you might ask Who is to teach the sons of our artisans this same art which they have learned of their fathers? He and his fellow workmen have taught them to the best of their ability — but who will carry them further in their arts? And you would certainly have a difficulty Socrates in finding a teacher of them but there would be no difficulty in finding a teacher of those who are wholly ignorant And this is true of virtue or of anything else if a man is better able than we are to promote virtue ever so little, we must be content with the result. A teacher of this sort I believe myself to be, and above all other men to have the knowledge which makes a man noble and good and I give my pupils their money's-worth and even more as they themselves confess And therefore I have introduced the following mode of payment — When a man has been my pupil if he likes he pays my price, but there is no compulsion and if he does not like, he has only to go into a temple and take an oath of the value of the instructions and he pays no more than he declares to be their value.

Such is my Apologue, Socrates and such is the argument by which I endeavour to show that virtue may be taught and that this is the opinion of the Athenians And I have also attempted to show that you are not to wonder at good fathers having bad sons or at good sons having bad fathers, of which the sons of Polycleitus afford an example, who are the companions of our friends here, Paralus and Xan*thippus, but are nothing in comparison* with their father and this is true of the sons of many other artists As yet I ought not to say the same of Paralus and Xanthippus themselves, for they are young and there is still hope of them

So charming left his voice that I the while
Thought him still speaking still stood fixed to h[ear]

At length when the truth dawned upon me that he had really finished not without diffi*culty I began to collect myself* and looking at Hippocrates I said to him O son of Apollodorus, how deeply grateful I am to you for having brought me hither I would not have missed the speech of Protagoras for a great deal For I used to imagine that no human care could make men good but I know better now Yet I have still one very small difficulty which I am sure that Protagoras will easily explain as he has already explained so much If a man were to go and consult Pericles or any of our great speakers [329] about these matters he might perhaps hear as fine a discourse but then when one has a question to ask of any of them like books they can neither answer nor ask and if any one challenges the least particular of their speech they go ringing on in a long harangue, like brazen pots which when they are struck continue to sound unless some one puts his hand upon them whereas our friend Protagoras can not only make a good speech, as he has already shown but when he is asked a question he can answer briefly and when he asks he will wait and hear the answer and this is a very rare gift Now I Protagoras, want to ask of you a little question which if you will only answer I shall be quite satisfied You were saying that virtue can be taught —that I will take upon your authority and there is no one to whom I am more ready to trust But I marvel at one thing about which I should like to have my mind set at rest You were speaking of Zeus sending justice and reverence to men and several times while you were speaking justice, and temperance and holiness and all these qualities were described by you as if together they made up virtue Now I want you to tell me truly whether virtue is one whole of which justice and temperance and holiness are parts or whether all these are only the names of one and the same thing that is the doubt which still lingers in my mind

There is no difficulty Socrates in answering that the qualities of which you are speaking are the parts of virtue which is one

And are they parts I said in the same sense in which mouth nose, and eyes and ears are the parts of a face or are they like the parts of gold which differ from the whole and from one another only in being larger or smaller?

I should say that they differed Socrates in the first way they are related to one another as the parts of a face are related to the whole face

And do men have some one part and some another part of virtue? Of if a man has one part must he also have all the others?

By no means he said for many a man is brave and not just or just and not wise

You would not deny then that courage and wisdom are also parts of virtue?

[330] Most undoubtedly they are he answered and wisdom is the noblest of the parts

And they are all different from one another? I said

Yes

And has each of them a distinct function like the parts of the face —the eye for example, is not like the ear and has not the same functions and the other parts are none of them like one another either in their functions or in any other way? I want to know whether the comparison holds concerning the parts of virtue Do they also differ from one another in themselves and in their functions? For that is clearly what the simile would imply

Yes Socrates you are right in supposing that they differ

Then I said no other part of virtue is like knowledge or like justice or like courage or like temperance or like holiness?

No he answered

Well then I said suppose that you and I enquire into their natures And first you would agree with me that justice is of the nature of a thing would you not? That is my opinion would it not be yours also?

Mine also he said

And suppose that some one were to ask us, saying O Protagoras and you Socrates what about this thing which you were calling justice, is it just or unjust? —and I were to answer just would you vote with me or against me?

With you he said

Thereupon I should answer to him who asked me that justice is of the nature of the just would not you?

Yes he said

And suppose that he went on to say Well now is there also such a thing as holiness? —we should answer Yes if I am not mistaken?

Yes he said

Which you would also acknowledge to be a thing—should we not say so?

He assented

And is this a sort of thing which is of the nature of the holy or of the nature of the unholy? I should be angry at his putting such a question and should say Peace man nothing can be holy if holiness is not holy What would you say? Would you not answer in the same way?

Certainly he said

And then after this suppose that he came and asked us What were you saying just now? Perhaps I may not have heard you rightly but you seemed to me to be saying that the parts of virtue were not the same as one another [331] I should reply You certainly heard that said but not as you imagine by me for I only asked the question Protagoras gave the answer And suppose that he turned to you and said "Is this true Protagoras? and do you maintain that one part of virtue is unlike another and is this your position? —how would you answer him?

I could not help acknowledging the truth of what he said Socrates

Well then Protagoras we will assume this and now supposing that he proceeded to say further Then holiness is not of the nature of justice nor justice of the nature of holiness but of the nature of unholiness and holiness is of the nature of the not just and therefore of the unjust and the unjust is the unholy" how shall we answer him? I should certainly answer him on my own behalf that justice is holy and that holiness is just and I would say in like manner on your behalf also, if you would allow me, that justice is either the same with holiness, or very nearly the same and above all I would assert that justice is like holiness and holiness is like justice and I wish that you would tell me whether I may be permitted to give this answer on your behalf and whether you would agree with me.

He replied, I cannot simply agree, Socrates, to the proposition that justice is holy and that holiness is just, for there appears to me to be a difference between them. But what matter? if you please I please and let us assume, if you will, that justice is holy and that holiness is just.

Pardon me, I replied I do not want this "if you wish" or "if you will" sort of conclusion to be proven, but I want you and me to be proven I mean to say that the conclusion will be best proven if there be no if.

Well, he said, I admit that justice bears a resemblance to holiness, for there is always some point of view in which everything is like every other thing: white is in a certain way like black, and hard is like soft, and the most extreme opposites have some qualities in common, even the parts of the face which, as we were saying before, are distinct and have different functions, are still in a certain point of view similar and one of them is like another of them. And you may prove that they are like one another on the same principle that all things are like one another and yet things which are like in some particular ought not to be called alike, nor things which are unlike in some particular however slight, unlike.

And do you think, I said in a tone of surprise, that justice and holiness have but a small degree of likeness?

Certainly not: any more than I agree with what I understand to be your view [332] Well, I said, as you appear to have a difficulty about this, let us take another of the examples which you mentioned instead. Do you admit the existence of folly?

I do

And is not wisdom the very opposite of folly

That is true, he said.

And when men act rightly and advantageously they seem to you to be temperate?

Yes, he said.

And temperance makes them temperate?

Certainly

And they who do not act rightly act foolishly and in acting thus are not temperate?

I agree, he said

Then to act foolishly is the opposite of acting temperately?

He assented.

And foolish actions are done by folly and temperate actions by temperance?

He agreed.

And that is done strongly which is done by strength, and that which is weakly done, by weakness?

He assented.

And that which is done with swiftness is done swiftly and that which is done with slowness, slowly?

He assented again.

And that which is done in the same manner is done by the same and that which is done in an opposite manner by the opposite?

He agreed

Once more, I said, is there anything beautiful?

Yes.

To which the only opposite is the ugly?

There is no other

And is there anything good?

There is.

To which the only opposite is the evil?

There is no other

And there is the acute in sound?

True.

To which the only opposite is the grave?

There is no other he said, but that.

Then every opposite has one opposite only and no more

He assented.

Then now I said, let us recapitulate our admissions. First of all we admitted that everything has one opposite and not more than one?

We did so

And we admitted also that what was done in opposite ways was done by opposites?

Yes.

And that which was done foolishly as we further admitted, was done in the opposite way to that which was done temperately?

Yes.

And that which was done temperately was done by temperance, and that which was done foolishly by folly?

He agreed.

And that which is done in opposite ways is done by opposites?

Yes.

Well then Protagoras we will assume this and now supposing that he proceeded to say further Then holiness is not of the nature of justice nor justice of the nature of holiness but of the nature of unholiness and holiness is of the nature of the not just and therefore of the unjust and the unjust is the unholy how shall what he is talking about. As then if I had been deaf and you were going to converse with me, you would have had to raise your voice so now having such a bad memory I will ask you to cut your answers shorter if you would take me with you

What do you mean? he said how am I to shorten my answers? shall I make them too short?

Certainly not, I said.

But short enough?

Yes, I said

Shall I answer what appears to me to be short enough, or what appears to you to be short enough?

I have heard I said, that you can speak and teach others to speak about the same things at such length that words never seemed to fail, or with such brevity that no one could use fewer of them. Please therefore, [335] if you talk with me, to adopt the latter or more compendious method.

Socrates, he replied, many a battle of words have I fought, and if I had followed the method of disputation which my adversaries desired as you want me to do I should have been no better than another and the name of Protagoras would have been nowhere

I saw that he was not satisfied with his previous answers, and that he would not play the part of answerer any more if he could help and I considered that there was no call upon me to continue the conversation so I said Protagoras, I do not wish to force the conversation upon you if you had rather not, but when you are willing to argue with me in such a way that I can follow you, then I will argue with you Now you, as is said of you by others and as you say of yourself, are able to have discussions in shorter forms of speech as well as in longer for you are a master of wisdom but I cannot manage these long speeches I only wish that I could. You, on the other hand, who are capable of either ought to speak shorter as I beg you, and then we might converse. But I see that you are disinclined, and as I have an engagement which will prevent my staying to hear you at greater length (for I have to be in another place) I will depart although I should have liked to have heard you

Thus I spoke, and was rising from my seat, when Callias seized me by the right hand and in his left hand caught hold of this old cloak of mine. He said We cannot let you go Socrates, for if you leave us there will be an end of our discussions I must therefore beg you to remain, as there is nothing in the world that I should like better than to hear you and Protagoras discourse. Do not deny the company this pleasure.

Now I had got up and was in the act of departure. Son of Hipponicus, I replied, I have always admired and do now heartily applaud and love your philosophical spirit, and I would gladly comply with your request, if I could But the truth is that I cannot. And what you ask is as great an impossibility to me as if you bade me run a race with Crison of Himera [336] when in his prime or with some one of the long or day course runners To such a request I should reply that I would fain ask the same of my own legs but they refuse to comply And therefore if you want to see Crison and me in the same stadium, you must bid him slacken his speed to mine, for I cannot run quickly and he can run slowly And in like manner if you want to hear me and Protagoras discoursing, you must ask him to shorten his answers, and keep to the point as he did at first if not, how can there be any discussion? For discussion is one thing and making an oration is quite another in my humble opinion.

But you see, Socrates said Callias, that Protagoras may fairly claim to speak in his own way just as you claim to speak in yours

Here Alcibiades interposed and said That, Callias, is not a true statement of the case. For our friend Socrates admits that he cannot make a speech—in this he yields the palm to Protagoras but I should be greatly surprised if he yielded to any living man in the power of holding and apprehending an argument. Now if Protagoras will make a similar admission, and confess that he is inferior to Socrates in argumentative skill, that is enough for Socrates but if he claims a superiority in argument as well, let him ask and answer—not, when a question is asked, slipping away from the point, and instead of answering making a speech at such length that most of his hearers forget the question at issue (not that Socrates is likely to forget—I will be bound for that, although he may pretend in fun that he has a bad memory) And Socrates appears to me to be more in the right than Protagoras that is my view and every man ought to say what he thinks.

When Alcibiades had done speaking some one—Critias I believe—went on to say O Prodicus and Hippias, Callias appears to me to be a partisan of Protagoras and this led Alcibiades, who loves opposition, to take the other side But we should not be partisans either of

And one thing is done by temperance and quite another thing by folly?

Yes

And in opposite ways?

Certainly

And therefore by opposites —then folly is the opposite of temperance?

Clearly

And do you remember that folly has already been acknowledged by us to be the opposite of wisdom?

He assented

And we said that everything has only one opposite?

Yes

[333] Then Protagoras which of the two assertions shall we renounce? One says that everything has but one opposite the other that wisdom is distinct from temperance and that both of them are parts of virtue and that they are not only distinct but dissimilar both in themselves and in their functions like the parts of a face Which of these two assertions shall we renounce? For both of them together are certainly not in harmony they do not accord or agree for how can they be said to agree if everything is assumed to have only one opposite and not more than one and yet folly which is one has clearly the two opposites—wisdom and temperance? Is not that true, Protagoras? What else would you say?

He assented but with great reluctance

Then temperance and wisdom are the same as before justice and holiness appeared to us to be nearly the same And now Protagoras I said we must finish the enquiry and not faint Do you think that an unjust man can be temperate in his injustice?

I should be ashamed Socrates he said to acknowledge this which nevertheless many may be found to assert

And shall I argue with them or with you? I replied

I would rather he said that you should argue with the many first if you will

Whichever you please if you will only answer me and say whether you are of their opinion or not My object is to test the validity of the argument and yet the result may be that I who ask and you who answer may both be put on our trial

Protagoras at first made a show of refusing as he said that the argument was not encouraging at length he consented to answer

Now then I said begin at the beginning and answer me You think that some men are temperate and yet unjust?

Yes he said let that be admitted

And temperance is good sense?

Yes

And good sense is good counsel in doing injustice?

Granted

If they succeed, I said or if they do not succeed?

If they succeed

And you would admit the existence of goods?

Yes

And is the good that which is expedient for man?

Yes indeed he said and there are some things which may be inexpedient and yet I call them good

I thought that Protagoras was getting ruffled and excited he seemed to be setting himself in an attitude of war Seeing this I minded my business and gently said —

[334] When you say Protagoras that things inexpedient are good do you mean inexpedient for man only or inexpedient altogether? and do you call the latter good?

Certainly not the last he replied for I know of many things—meats drinks medicines and ten thousand other things which are inexpedient for man and some which are expedient and some which are neither expedient nor inexpedient for man but only for horses and some for oxen only and some for dogs and some for no animals but only for trees and some for the roots of trees and not for their branches as for example manure which is a good thing when laid about the roots of a tree but utterly destructive if thrown upon the shoots and young branches or I may instance olive oil which is mischievous to all plants and generally most injurious to the hair of every animal with the exception of man but beneficial to human hair and to the human body generally and even in this application (so various and changeable is the nature of the benefit) that which is the greatest good to the outward parts of a man is a very great evil to his inward parts and for this reason physicians always forbid their patients the use of oil in their food except in very small quantities just enough to extinguish the disagreeable sensation of smell in meats and sauces

When he had given this answer the company cheered him And I said Protagoras I have a wretched memory and when any one makes a long speech to me I never remember

Scopas the son of Creon the Thessalian

Hardly on the one hand can a man become truly good, built four-square in hands and feet and mind, a work without a flaw.

Do you know the poem? or shall I repeat the whole?

There is no need, I said; for I am perfectly well acquainted with the ode—I have made a careful study of it.

Very well, he said. And do you think that the ode is a good composition, and true?

Yes, I said, both good and true.

But if there is a contradiction, can the composition be good or true?

No, not in that case, I replied.

And is there not a contradiction? he asked. Reflect.

Well, my friend, I have reflected.

And does not the poet proceed to say, "I do not agree with the word of Pittacus, albeit the utterance of a wise man: Hardly can a man be good"? Now you will observe that this is said by the same poet.

I know it.

And do you think, he said, that the two sayings are consistent?

Yes, I said, I think so (at the same time I could not help fearing that there might be something in what he said). And you think otherwise?

Why, he said, how can he be consistent in both? First of all, premising as his own thought, "Hardly can a man become truly good"; and then a little further on in the poem, forgetting, and blaming Pittacus and refusing to agree with him, when he says, "Hardly can a man be good," which is the very same thing. And yet when he blames him who says the same with himself, he blames himself; so that he must be wrong either in his first or his second assertion.

Many of the audience cheered and applauded this. And I felt at first giddy and faint, as if I had received a blow from the hand of an expert boxer, when I heard his words and the sound of the cheering; and to confess the truth, I wanted to get time to think what the meaning of the poet really was. So I turned to Prodicus and called him. Prodicus, I said, Simonides is a countryman of yours, and you ought to come to his aid. [340] I must appeal to you, like the river Scamander in Homer, who, when beleaguered by Achilles, summons the Simois to aid him, saying:

Brother dear, let us both together stay the force of the hero.

And I summon you, for I am afraid that Protagoras will make an end of Simonides. Now is the time to rehabilitate Simonides, by the application of your philosophy of synonyms, which enables you to distinguish "will" and "wish," and make other charming distinctions like those which you drew just now. And I should like to know whether you would agree with me; for I am of opinion that there is no contradiction in the words of Simonides. And first of all I wish that you would say whether, in your opinion, Prodicus, "being" is the same as "becoming."

Not the same, certainly, replied Prodicus.

Did not Simonides first set forth, as his own view, that "Hardly can a man become truly good"?

Quite right, said Prodicus.

And then he blames Pittacus, not, as Protagoras imagines, for repeating that which he says himself, but for saying something different from himself. Pittacus does not say as Simonides says, that hardly can a man become good, but hardly can a man be good: and our friend Prodicus would maintain that being, Protagoras, is not the same as becoming; and if they are not the same, then Simonides is not inconsistent with himself. I dare say that Prodicus and many others would say, as Hesiod says,

On the one hand, hardly can a man become good,
For the gods have made virtue the reward of toil,
But on the other hand, when you have climbed the height,
Then, to retain virtue, however difficult the acquisition, is easy.

Prodicus heard and approved; but Protagoras said: Your correction, Socrates, involves a greater error than is contained in the sentence which you are correcting.

Alas! I said, Protagoras; then I am a sorry physician, and do but aggravate a disorder which I am seeking to cure.

Such is the fact, he said.

How so? I asked.

The poet, he replied, could never have made such a mistake as to say that virtue, which in the opinion of all men is the hardest of all things, can be easily retained.

Well, I said, and how fortunate are we in having Prodicus among us at the right moment; for he has a wisdom, Protagoras, which, as I imagine, is more than human and of very ancient date, and may be as old as Simonides or even older. [341] Learned as you are in many things, you appear to know nothing of

Socrates or of Protagoras let us rather unite in entreating both of them not to break up the discussion

[337] Prodicus added That Critias seems to me to be well said for those who are present at such discussions ought to be impartial hearers of both the speakers remembering however that impartiality is not the same as equality, for both sides should be impartially heard and yet an equal meed should not be assigned to both of them but to the wiser a higher meed should be given and a lower to the less wise And I as well as Critias would beg you Protagoras and Socrates to grant our request which is that you will argue with one another and not wrangle for friends argue with friends out of goodwill but only adversaries and enemies wrangle And then our meeting will be delightful for in this way you who are the speakers will be most likely to win esteem and not praise only among us who are your audience for esteem is a sincere conviction of the hearers souls but praise is often an insincere expression of men uttering falsehoods contrary to their conviction And thus we who are the hearers will be gratified and not pleased for gratification is of the mind when receiving wisdom and knowledge but pleasure is of the body when eating or experiencing some other bodily delight Thus spoke Prodicus and many of the company applauded his words

Hippias the sage spoke next He said All of you who are here present I reckon to be kinsmen and friends and fellow-citizens by nature and not by law for by nature like is akin to like whereas law is the tyrant of mankind and often compels us to do many things which are against nature How great would be the disgrace then if we who know the nature of things and are the wisest of the Hellenes and as such are met together in this city which is the metropolis of wisdom and in the greatest and most glorious house of this city should have nothing to show worthy of this height of dignity but should only quarrel with one another like the meanest of mankind! I do pray and advise you Protagoras and you Socrates to agree upon a compromise Let us be your peacemakers And do not you Socrates aim at this precise and extreme brevity in discourse if Protagoras objects [338] but loosen and let go the reins of speech that your words may be grander and more becoming to you Neither do you Protagoras go forth on the gale with every sail set out of sight of land into an ocean of words but let there be a mean observed by both of you Do as I say And let me also persuade you to choose an arbiter or overseer or president he will keep watch over your words and will prescribe their proper length

This proposal was received by the company with universal approval Callias said that he would not let me off and they begged me to choose an arbiter But I said that to choose an umpire of discourse would be unseemly for if the person chosen was inferior then the inferior or worse ought not to preside over the better or if he was equal neither would that be well for he who is our equal will do as we do and what will be the use of choosing him? And if you say Let us have a better then —to that I answer that you cannot have any one who is wiser than Protagoras And if you choose another who is not really better and whom you only say is better to put another over him as though he were an inferior person would be an unworthy reflection on him not that as far as I am concerned any reflection is of much consequence to me Let me tell you then what I will do in order that the conversation and discussion may go on as you desire If Protagoras is not disposed to answer let him ask and I will answer and I will endeavour to show at the same time how as I maintain he ought to answer and when I have answered as many questions as he likes to ask let him in like manner answer me and if he seems to be not very ready at answering the precise question asked of him you and I will unite in entreating him as you entreated me not to spoil the discussion And this will require no special arbiter—all of you shall be arbiters

This was generally approved and Protagoras though very much against his will was obliged to agree that he would ask questions and when he had put a sufficient number of them that he would answer in his turn those which he was asked in short replies He began to put his questions as follows —

I am of opinion Socrates he said that skill in poetry is the principal part of education [339] and this I conceive to be the power of knowing what compositions of the poets are correct and what are not and how they are to be distinguished and of explaining when asked the reason of the difference And I propose to transfer the question which you and I have been discussing to the domain of poetry we will speak as before of virtue but in reference to a passage of a poet Now Simonides says to philosophy even stronger than the love of gymnastics they are conscious that only a perfectly educated man is capable of uttering such expressions [343] Such were Thales of Miletus and Pittacus of Mitylene and Bias of Priene, and our own Solon and Cleobulus the Lindian, and Myson the Chenian and seventh in the catalogue of wise men was the Lacedaemonian Chilo. All these were lovers and emulators and disciples of the culture of the Lacedaemonians, and any one may perceive that their wisdom was of this character consisting of short memorable sentences, which they severally uttered. And they met together and dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Delphi as the first fruits of their wisdom the far famed inscriptions, which are in all men s mouths— Know thyself and Nothing too much

Why do I say all this? I am explaining that this Lacedaemonian brevity was the style of primitive philosophy Now there was a saying of Pittacus which was privately circulated and received the approbation of the wise, Hard is it to be good And Simonides, who was ambitious of the fame of wisdom was aware that if he could overthrow this saying then as if he had won a victory over some famous athlete, he would carry off the palm among his contemporaries. And if I am not mistaken he composed the entire poem with the secret intention of damaging Pittacus and his saying

Let us all unite in examining his words, and see whether I am speaking the truth Simonides must have been a lunatic, if in the very first words of the poem wanting to say only that to become good is hard he inserted μέν "on the one hand [on the one hand to become good is hard] there would be no reason for the introduction of μέν unless you suppose him to speak with a hostile reference to the words of Pittacus Pittacus s saying Hard is it to be good" and he, in refutation of this thesis, rejoins that the truly hard thing Pittacus, is to become good not joining truly with good, but with hard Not, that the hard thing is to be truly good as though there were some truly good men, and there were others who were good but not truly good (this would be a very simple observation, and quite unworthy of Simonides) but you must suppose him to make a trajection of the word truly construing the saying of Pittacus thus (and let us imagine Pittacus to be speaking and Simonides answering him) O my friends, says Pittacus, hard is it to be good and Simonides answers, [344] In that, Pittacus, you are mistaken the difficulty is not to be good but on the one hand to become good four square in hands and feet and mind without a flaw—that is hard truly This way of reading the passage accounts for the insertion of μέν on the one hand, and for the position at the end of the clause of the word "truly and all that follows shows this to be the meaning A great deal might be said in praise of the details of the poem which is a charming piece of workmanship and very finished but such minutiae would be tedious I should like however to point out the general intention of the poem, which is certainly designed in every part to be a refutation of the saying of Pittacus For he speaks in what follows a little further on as if he meant to argue that although there is a difficulty in becoming good, yet this is possible for a time, and only for a time. But having become good, to remain in a good state and be good as you, Pittacus, affirm is not possible, and is not granted to man God only has this blessing but man cannot help being bad when the force of circumstances overpowers him Now whom does the force of circumstance overpower in the command of a vessel?—not the private individual for he is always overpowered and as one who is already prostrate cannot be overthrown and only he who is standing upright but not he who is prostrate can be laid prostrate, so the force of circumstances can only overpower him who at some time or other has resources, and not him who is at all times helpless The descent of a great storm may make the pilot helpless, or the severity of the season the husbandman or the physician for the good may become bad as another poet witnesses

The good are sometimes good and sometimes bad

But the bad does not become bad he is always bad So that when the force of circumstances overpowers the man of resources and skill and virtue, then he cannot help being bad And you, Pittacus, are saying Hard is it to be good Now there is a difficulty in becoming good and yet this is possible but to be good is an impossibility—

For he who does well is the good man and he who does ill is the bad

But what sort of doing is good in letters? [345] and what sort of doing makes a man good in letters? Clearly the knowing of them And what sort of well-doing makes a man a good physician? Clearly the knowledge of the art of healing the sick But he who does ill is the bad.

this but I know for I am a disciple of his And now if I am not mistaken you do not under stand the word hard (χαλεπον) in the sense which Simonides intended and I must correct you as Prodicus corrects me when I use the word awful (δεινοι) as a term of praise If I say that Protagoras or any one else is an aw fully wise man he asks me if I am not ashamed of calling that which is good awful and then he explains to me that the term awful is always taken in a bad sense and that no one speaks of being awfully healthy or wealthy or aw ful peace but of awful disease, awful war awful poverty meaning by the term awful evil And I think that Simonides and his countrymen the Ceans when they spoke of hard meant evil or something which you do not understand Let us ask Prodicus for he ought to be able to answer questions about the dialect of Simonides What did he mean, Prodicus by the term hard?

Evil said Prodicus

And therefore I said Prodicus he blames Pittacus for saying Hard is the good just as if that were equivalent to saying Evil is the good

Yes he said that was certainly his meaning and he is twitting Pittacus with ignorance of the use of terms which in a Lesbian who has been accustomed to speak a barbarous language, is natural

Do you hear Protagoras I asked what our friend Prodicus is saying? And have you an an swer for him?

You are entirely mistaken Prodicus said Protagoras and I know very well that Simoni des in using the word hard meant what all of us mean not evil but that which is not easy —that which takes a great deal of trouble of this I am positive

I said I also incline to believe Protagoras that this was the meaning of Simonides of which our friend Prodicus was very well aware but he thought that he would make fun and try if you could maintain your thesis for that Simonides could never have meant the other is clearly proved by the context in which he says that God only has this gift Now he can not surely mean to say that to be good is evil when he afterwards proceeds to say that God only has this gift, and that this is the attribute of him and of no other For if this be his mean ing Prodicus would impute to Simonides a character of recklessness which is very unlike his countrymen And I should like to tell you

[342] I said what I imagine to be the real meaning of Simonides in this poem if you will test what in your way of speaking would be called my skill in poetry or if you would rather, I will be the listener

To this proposal Protagoras replied As you please —and Hippias Prodicus and the others told me by all means to do as I proposed

Then now I said I will endeavour to ex plain to you my opinion about this poem of Simonides There is a very ancient philosophy which is more cultivated in Crete and Lace daemon than in any other part of Hellas and there are more philosophers in those countries than anywhere else in the world This how ever is a secret which the Lacedaemonians deny and they pretend to be ignorant just be cause they do not wish to have it thought that they rule the world by wisdom like the Soph ists of whom Protagoras was speaking and not by valour of arms considering that if the reason of their superiority were disclosed all men would be practising their wisdom And this secret of theirs has never been discovered by the imitators of Lacedaemonian fashions in other cities who go about with their ears bruised in imitation of them and have the caestus bound on their arms and are always in training and wear short cloaks for they im agine that these are the practices which have enabled the Lacedaemonians to conquer the other Hellenes Now when the Lacedaemoni ans want to unbend and hold free conversation with their wise men and are no longer satisfied with mere secret intercourse, they drive out all these laconizers and any other foreigners who may happen to be in their country and they hold a philosophical séance unknown to stran gers and they themselves forbid their young men to go out into other cities—in this they are like the Cretans—in order that they may not unlearn the lessons which they have taught them And in Lacedaemon and Crete not only men but also women have a pride in their high cultivation And hereby you may know that I am right in attributing to the Lacedaemonians this excellence in philosophy and speculation If a man converses with the most ordinary Lacedaemonian he will find him seldom good for much in general conversation but at any point in the discourse he will be darting out some notable saying terse and full of mean ing with unerring aim and the person with whom he is talking seems to be like a child in his hands And many of our own age and of former ages have noted that the true Lace daemonian type of character has the love of about the highest matters."—And this, I said Prodicus and Protagoras, I take to be the meaning of Simonides in this poem.

Hippias said I think, Socrates, that you have given a very good explanation of the poem but I have also an excellent interpretation of my own which I will propound to you, if you will allow me.

Nay Hippias, said Alcibiades not now but at some other time. At present we must abide by the compact which was made between Socrates and Protagoras, to the effect that as long as Protagoras is willing to ask, Socrates should answer or that if he would rather answer then that Socrates should ask.

I said I wish Protagoras either to ask or answer as he is inclined but I would rather have done with poems and odes, if he does not object, and come back to the question about which I was asking you at first, Protagoras, and by your help make an end of that. The talk about the poets seems to me like a commonplace entertainment to which a vulgar company have recourse who, because they are not able to converse or amuse one another while they are drinking with the sound of their own voices and conversation, by reason of their stupidity raise the price of flute girls in the market, hiring for a great sum the voice of a flute instead of their own breath, to be the medium of intercourse among them but where the company are real gentlemen and men of education, you will see no flute girls, nor dancing girls, nor harp-girls and they have no nonsense or games, but are contented with one another's conversation, of which their own voices are the medium, and which they carry on by turns and in an orderly manner even though they are very liberal in their potations. And a company like this of ours, and men such as we profess to be, do not require the help of another's voice, or of the poets whom you cannot interrogate about the meaning of what they are saying people who cite them declaring some that the poet has one meaning and others that he has another and the point which is in dispute can never be decided This sort of entertainment they decline, and prefer to talk with one another and put one another to the proof in conversation. [348] And these are the models which I desire that you and I should imitate. Leaving the poets, and keeping to ourselves, let us try the mettle of one another and make proof of the truth in conversation If you have a mind to ask, I am ready to answer or if you would rather do you answer and give me the opportunity of resuming and completing our unfinished argument.

I made these and some similar observations but Protagoras would not distinctly say which he would do Thereupon Alcibiades turned to Callias, and said —Do you think, Callias, that Protagoras is fair in refusing to say whether he will or will not answer? for I certainly think that he is unfair he ought either to proceed with the argument, or distinctly to refuse to proceed that we may know his intention and then Socrates will be able to discourse with some one else, and the rest of the company will be free to talk with one another

I think that Protagoras was really made ashamed by these words of Alcibiades, and when the prayers of Callias and the company were superadded, he was at last induced to argue, and said that I might ask and he would answer

So I said Do not imagine, Protagoras, that I have any other interest in asking questions of you but that of clearing up my own difficulties. For I think that Homer was very right in saying that

When two go together one sees before the other for all men who have a companion are readier in deed, word, or thought but if a man

Sees a thing when he is alone

he goes about straightway seeking until he finds some one to whom he may show his discoveries, and who may confirm him in them And I would rather hold discourse with you than with any one, because I think that no man has a better understanding of most things which a good man may be expected to understand, and in particular of virtue. For who is there, but you?—who not only claim to be a good man and a gentleman, for many are this, and yet have not the power of making others good—whereas you are not only good yourself but also the cause of goodness in others Moreover such confidence have you in yourself that although other Sophists conceal their profession you proclaim in the face of Hellas that you are a Sophist or teacher of virtue and education, and are the first who demanded pay in return [349] How then can I do otherwise than invite you to the examination of these subjects, and ask questions and consult with you? I must, indeed And I should like once more to have my memory refreshed by you about the questions which I was asking you at first and also to have your help in considering them.

Now who becomes a bad physician? Clearly he who is in the first place a physician and in the second place a good physician for he may become a bad one also but none of us unskilled individuals can by any amount of doing ill become physicians any more than we can become carpenters or anything of that sort and he who by doing ill cannot become a physician at all clearly cannot become a bad physician In like manner the good may become deteriorated by time or toil or disease or other accident (the only real doing ill is to be deprived of knowledge) but the bad man will never become bad for he is always bad and if he were to become bad he must previously have been good Thus the words of the poem tend to show that on the one hand a man cannot be continuously good but that he may become good and may also become bad and again that

They are the best for the longest time whom the gods love

All this relates to Pittacus as is further proved by the sequel For he adds

Therefore I will not throw away my span of life to no purpose in searching after the impossible hoping in vain to find a perfectly faultless man among those who partake of the fruit of the broad bosomed earth if I find him I will send you word

(this is the vehement way in which he pursues his attack upon Pittacus throughout the whole poem)

But him who does no evil voluntarily I praise and love —not even the gods war against necessity

All this has a similar drift for Simonides was not so ignorant as to say that he praised those who did no evil voluntarily as though there were some who did evil voluntarily For no wise man as I believe will allow that any human being errs voluntarily or voluntarily does evil and dishonourable actions but they are very well aware that all who do evil and dishonourable things do them against their will And Simonides never says that he praises him who does no evil voluntarily the word voluntarily applies to himself For he was under the impression that a good man might often compel himself [346] to love and praise another and to be the friend and approver of another and that there might be an involuntary love such as a man might feel to an unnatural father or mother or country or the like Now bad men when their parents or country have any defects look on them with malignant joy and find fault with them and expose and denounce them to others under the idea that the rest of mankind will be less likely to take themselves to task and accuse them of neglect and they blame their defects far more than they deserve, in order that the odium which is necessarily incurred by them may be increased but the good man dissembles his feelings and con*strains* himself to praise them and if they have wronged him and he is angry he pacifies his anger and is reconciled, and compels himself to love and praise his own flesh and blood And Simonides as is probable considered that he himself had often had to praise and magnify a tyrant or the like much against his will and he also wishes to imply to Pittacus that he does not censure him because he is censorious

For I am satisfied [he says] when a man is neither bad nor very stupid and when he knows justice (which is the health of states) and is of sound mind I will find no fault with him for I am not given to finding fault and there are innumerable fools

(implying that if he delighted in censure he might have abundant opportunity of finding fault)

All things are good with which evil is unmingled

In these latter words he does not mean to say that all things are good which have no evil in them as you might say All things are white which have no black in them for that would be ridiculous but he means to say that he accepts and finds no fault with the moderate or intermediate state He says

I do not hope to find a perfectly blameless man among those who partake of the fruits of the broad bosomed earth (if I find him I will send you word) in this sense I praise no man But he who is moderately good and does no evil is good enough for me who love and approve every one

Who love and approve every one voluntarily who does no evil

and that the stop should be put after voluntarily) but there are some whom I involuntarily praise and love And you Pittacus I would never have blamed [347] if you had spoken what was moderately good and true but I do blame you because putting on the appearance of truth you are speaking falsely they are not the same and I argue that the courageous are confident, but not all the confident courageous. For confidence may be given to men by art and also like ability by madness and rage but courage comes to them from nature and the healthy state of the soul

I said You would admit, Protagoras that some men live well and others ill?

He assented.

And do you think that a man lives well who lives in pain and grief?

He does not

But if he lives pleasantly to the end of his life, will he not in that case have lived well?

He will

Then to live pleasantly is a good and to live unpleasantly an evil?

Yes, he said, if the pleasure be good and honourable.

And do you Protagoras, like the rest of the world call some pleasant things evil and some painful things good?—for I am rather disposed to say that things are good in as far as they are pleasant, if they have no consequences of another sort and in as far as they are painful they are bad

I do not know Socrates he said, whether I can venture to assert in that unqualified manner that the pleasant is the good and the painful the evil Having regard not only to my present answer but also to the whole of my life I shall be safer if I am not mistaken, in saying that there are some pleasant things which are not good and that there are some painful things which are good and some which are not good and that there are some wh ch are neither good nor evil

And you would call pleasant I said the things which participate in pleasure or create pleasure?

Certainly he said

Then my meaning is, that in as far as they are pleasant they are good and my question would imply that pleasure is a good in itself

According to your favourite mode of speech, Socrates, let us reflect about this he said and if the reflection is to the point and the result proves that pleasure and good are really the same, then we will agree but if not, then we will argue

And would you wish to begin the enquiry? I said or shall I begin?

You ought to take the lead he said for you are the author of the discussion

[352] May I employ an illustration? I said. Suppose some one who is enquiring into the health or some other bodily quality of another —he looks at his face and at the tips of his fingers and then he says Uncover your chest and back to me that I may have a better view — that is the sort of thing which I desire in this speculation Having seen what your opinion is about good and pleasure, I am minded to say to you Uncover your mind to me, Protagoras and reveal your opinion about knowledge that I may know whether you agree with the rest of the world Now the rest of the world are of opinion that knowledge is a principle not of strength or of rule, or of command their notion is that a man may have knowledge, and yet that the knowledge which is in him may be overmastered by anger or pleasure, or pain, or love, or perhaps by fear —just as if knowledge were a slave, and might be dragged about any how Now is that your view? or do you think that knowledge is a noble and commanding thing which cannot be overcome, and will not allow a man if he only knows the difference of good and evil to do anything which is contrary to knowledge, but that wisdom will have strength to help him?

I agree with you Socrates, said Protagoras and not only so, but I above all other men am bound to say that wisdom and knowledge are the highest of human things

Good, I said and true But are you aware that the majority of the world are of another mind and that men are commonly supposed to know the things which are best and not to do them when they might? And most persons whom I have asked the reason of this have said that when men act contrary to knowledge they are overcome by pain or pleasure, or some of those affections which I was just now mentioning

Yes, Socrates, he replied and that is not the only point about which mankind are in error

Suppose, then that you and I endeavour to instruct and inform them what is the nature of this affection which they call "being overcome by pleasure [353] and which they affirm to be the reason why they do not always do what is best When we say to them Friends you are mistaken and are saying what is not true, they would probably reply Socrates and Protagoras, if this affection of the soul is not to be called being overcome by pleasure, pray what is it, and by what name would you describe it?

But why Socrates should we trouble ourselves about the opinion of the many who just say anything that happens to occur to them?

I believe, I said that they may be of use in

If I am not mistaken the question was this Are wisdom and temperance and courage and justice and holiness five names of the same thing? or has each of the names a separate underlying essence and corresponding thing having a peculiar function no one of them being like any other of them? And you replied that the five names were not the names of the same thing but that each of them had a separate object and that all these objects were parts of virtue not in the same way that the parts of gold are like each other and the whole of which they are parts but as the parts of the face are unlike the whole of which they are parts and one another and have each of them a distinct function I should like to know whether this is still your opinion or if not I will ask you to define your meaning and I shall not take you to task if you now make a different statement For I dare say that you may have said what you did only in order to make trial of me

I answer, Socrates he said that all these qualities are parts of virtue and that four out of the five are to some extent similar, and that the fifth of them which is courage is very different from the other four as I prove in this way You may observe that many men are utterly unrighteous unholy intemperate ignorant who are nevertheless remarkable for their courage

Stop I said I should like to think about that When you speak of brave men do you mean the confident or another sort of nature?

Yes he said I mean the impetuous ready to go at that which others are afraid to approach

In the next place you would affirm virtue to be a good thing of which good thing you assert yourself to be a teacher

Yes, he said I should say the best of all things if I am in my right mind

And is it partly good and partly bad I said or wholly good?

Wholly good and in the highest degree

[350] Tell me then who are they who have confidence when diving into a well?

I should say the divers

And the reason of this is that they have knowledge?

Yes that is the reason

And who have confidence when fighting on horseback—the skilled horseman or the unskilled?

The skilled

And who when fighting with light shields—the peltasts or the nonpeltasts?

The peltasts And that is true of all other things he said if that is your point those who have knowledge are more confident than those who have no knowledge and they are more confident after they have learned than before

And have you not seen persons utterly ignorant I said of these things and yet confident about them?

Yes he said, I have seen such persons far too confident

And are not these confident persons also courageous?

In that case he replied courage would be a base thing for the men of whom we are speaking are surely madmen

Then who are the courageous? Are they not the confident?

Yes he said to that statement I adhere.

And those I said who are thus confident without knowledge are really not courageous but mad and in that case the wisest are also the most confident and being the most confident are also the bravest and upon that view again wisdom will be courage

Nay Socrates he replied you are mistaken in your remembrance of what was said by me. When you asked me I certainly did say that the courageous are the confident but I was never asked whether the confident are the courageous if you had asked me I should have answered Not all of them and what I did answer you have not proved to be false, although you proceeded to show that those who have knowledge are more courageous than they were before they had knowledge and more courageous than others who have no knowledge and were then led on to think that courage is the same as wisdom But in this way of arguing you might come to imagine that strength is wisdom You might begin by asking whether the strong are able and I should say Yes and then whether those who know how to wrestle are not more able to wrestle than those who do not know how to wrestle and more able after than before they had learned and I should assent And when I had admitted this you might use my admissions in such a way as to prove that upon my view wisdom is strength whereas in that case I should not have admitted any more than in the other that the able are strong although I have admitted that the strong are able [351] For there is a difference between ability and strength the former is given by knowledge as well as by madness or rage but strength comes from nature and a healthy state of the body And in like manner I say of confidence and courage, that good because he is overcome at the moment by pleasure. And that this is ridiculous will be evi dent if only we give up the use of various names, such as pleasant and painful, and good and evil. As there are two things, let us call them by two names—first good and evil and then pleasant and painful. Assuming this, let us go on to say that a man does evil knowing that he does evil But some one will ask, Why? Because he is o ercome, is the first answer And by what is he overcome? the enquirer will proceed to ask. And we shall not be able to reply By pleasure for the name of pleasure has been exchanged for that of good In our an swer then, we shall only say that he is over come. By what? he will reiterate. By the good, we shall have to reply indeed we shall Nay but our questioner will rejoin with a laugh, if he be one of the swaggering sort, "That is too rid culous, that a man should do what he kno s to be evil when he ought not, because he is o ercome by good Is that, he will ask, because the good was worthy or not wor thy of conquering the evil? And in answer to that we shall clearly reply Because it was not worthy for if it had been worthy then he who, as we say was overcome by pleasure, would not have been wrong But how" he will reply can the good be unworthy of the evil, or the evil of th good? Is not the real explanation that they are out of proportion to one another either as greater and smaller or more and few er? This we cannot deny And when you speak of being o ercome— what do you mean he will say but that you choose the greater evil in exchange for the lesser good?" Admitted And now substitute the names of pleasure and pain for good and e il, and say not as before that a man does what is evil knowingly but that he does what is painful knowingly and because he is o ercome by pleasure [356] which is unworthy to o ercome. What measure is there of the relations of pleasure to pain other than excess and defect, which means that they become greater and smaller and more and fewer and differ in degree? For if any one says Yes, Socrates, but immediate pleasure differs widely from future pleasure and pain —To that I should eply And do they differ in any thing but in pleasure and pain? There can be no other measure of them. And do you, like a skilf l weigher put into the balance the pleasures and the pains, and their nearness and distance, and we gh them, and then say wh h outw ghs the other If you we gh pleasures a a st p easures, you of course take the more and greater or if you weigh pains against pains, you take the fewer and the less or if pleasures against pains, then you choose that course of action in which the painful is ex ceeded by the pleasant, whether the distant by the near or the near by the distant and you avoid that course of action in which the pleasant is exceeded by the painful Would you not admit, my friends, that this is true? I am con fident that they cannot deny this.

He agreed with me

Well then I shall say if you agree so far be so good as to answer me a question Do not the same magnitudes appear larger to your sight when near and smaller when at a distance? They will acknowledge that And the same holds of thickness and number also sounds, which are in themselves equal, are greater when near and lesser when at a distance. They will grant that also Now suppose happiness to consist in doing or choosing the greater and in not doing or in avoiding the less what would be the saving principle of human life? Would not the art of measuring be the saving prin ciple or would the power of appearance? Is not the latter that deceiving art which makes us wander up and down and take the things at one time of which we repent at another both in our actions and in our choice of things great and small? But the art of measurement would do away with the effect of appearances, and, sho ing the truth, would fain teach the soul at last to find rest in the truth and would thus save our life. Would not mankind gen erally acknowledge that the art which accom plishes this result is the art of measurement?

Yes, he said the art of measurement.

Suppose, again the salvation of human life to depend on the choice of odd and e en, and on the knowledge of when a man ought to choose the greater or less, either in reference to themselves or to each other [357] and whether near or at a distance what would be the sa ing principle of our lives? Would not know edge? —a knowledge of measuring when the question is one of excess and defect, and a kno l edge of number when the question is of odd and even? The world will assent, will they not?

Protagoras himself thought that they would

Well then, my friends I say to them seeing that the sal ation of human life has been found to consist in the right choice of pleasures and pains,—in the cho ce of the more and the few er and the greater and the less, and the nearer and remoter must not this measuring be a con

helping us to discover how courage is related to the other parts of virtue If you are disposed to abide by our agreement that I should show the way in which as I think our recent difficulty is most likely to be cleared up do you follow but if not never mind

You are quite right he said and I would have you proceed as you have begun

Well then I said let me suppose that they repeat their question What account do you give of that which in our way of speaking is termed being overcome by pleasure? I should answer thus Listen and Protagoras and I will endeavour to show you When men are overcome by eating and drinking and other sensual desires which are pleasant and they knowing them to be evil, nevertheless indulge in them, would you not say that they were overcome by pleasure? They will not deny this And suppose that you and I were to go on and ask them again In what way do you say that they are evil—in that they are pleasant and give pleasure at the moment or because they cause disease and poverty and other like evils in the future? Would they still be evil if they had no attendant evil consequences simply because they give the consciousness of pleasure of whatever nature? —Would they not answer that they are not evil on account of the pleasure which is immediately given by them but on account of the after consequences—diseases and the like?

I believe said Protagoras that the world in general would answer as you do

And in causing diseases do they not cause pain? and in causing poverty do they not cause pain —they would agree to that also if I am not mistaken?

Protagoras assented

Then I should say to them in my name and yours Do you think them evil for any other reason except because they end in pain and rob us of other pleasures —there again they would agree?

[354] We both of us thought that they would

And then I should take the question from the opposite point of view and say Friends when you speak of goods being painful do you not mean remedial goods such as gymnastic exercises and military service and the physician s use of burning cutting drugging and starving? Are these the things which are good but painful? —they would assent to me?

He agreed

And do you call them good because they occasion the greatest immediate suffering and pain or because afterwards, they bring health and improvement of the bodily condition and the salvation of states and power over others and wealth? —they would agree to the latter alternative if I am not mistaken?

He assented

Are these things good for any other reason except that they end in pleasure, and get rid of and avert pain? Are you looking to any other standard but pleasure and pain when you call them good? —they would acknowledge that they were not?

I think so said Protagoras

And do you not pursue after pleasure as a good and avoid pain as an evil?

He assented

Then you think that pain is an evil and pleasure is a good and even pleasure you deem an evil when it robs you of greater pleasures than it gives or causes pains greater than the pleasure If however you call pleasure an evil in relation to some other end or standard you will be able to show us that standard But you have none to show

I do not think that they have said Protagoras

And have you not a similar way of speaking about pain? You call pain a good when it takes away greater pains than those which it has or gives pleasures greater than the pains then if you have some standard other than pleasure and pain to which you refer when you call actual pain a good you can show what that is But you cannot

True said Protagoras

Suppose again I said that the world says to me Why do you spend many words and speak in many ways on this subject? Excuse me friends I should reply but in the first place there is a difficulty in explaining the meaning of the expression overcome by pleasure and the whole argument turns upon this. And even now if you see any possible way in which evil can be explained as other [355] than pain or good as other than pleasure you may still retract Are you satisfied then at having a life of pleasure which is without pain? If you are and if you are unable to show any good or evil which does not end in pleasure and pain hear the consequences —If what you say is true then the argument is absurd which affirms that a man often does evil knowingly when he might abstain because he is seduced and overpowered by pleasure or again when you say that a man knowingly refuses to do what is parts of virtue none of them was like any other of them each of them had a separate function To this, however I am not referring but to the assertion which he afterwards made that of the five virtues four were nearly akin to each other but that the fifth which was courage, differed greatly from the others And of this he gave me the following proof He said You will find, Socrates, that some of the most impious, and unrighteous, and intemperate, and ignorant of men are among the most courageous which proves that courage is very different from the other parts of virtue I was surprised at his saying this at the time, and I am still more surprised now that I have discussed the matter with you So I asked him whether by the brave he meant the confident Yes he replied and the impetuous or goers (You may remember Protagoras, that this was your answer)

He assented

Well then I said tell us against what are the courageous ready to go—against the same dangers as the cowards?

No he answered

Then against something different?

Yes, he said

Then do cowards go where there is safety and the courageous where there is danger?

Yes, Socrates, so men say

Very true, I said But I want to know against what do you say that the courageous are ready to go—against dangers, believing them to be dangers, or not against dangers?

No said he the former case has been proved by you in the previous argument to be impossible.

That, again, I replied, is quite true And if this has been rightly proven then no one goes to meet what he thinks to be dangers since the want of self-control which makes men rush into dangers, has been shown to be ignorance

And yet the courageous man and the coward alike go to meet that about which they are confident so that, in this point of view the cowardly and the courageous go to meet the same things.

And yet, Socrates, said Protagoras, that to which the coward goes is the opposite of that to which the courageous goes the one, for example is ready to go to battle, and the other is not ready

And is going to battle honourable or disgraceful? I said.

Honourable he replied

And if honourable then already admitted by us to be good for all honourable actions we have admitted to be good

That is true and to that opinion I shall always adhere [360] True, I said But which of the two are they who, as you say are unwilling to go to war which is a good and honourable thing?

The cowards he replied

And what is good and honourable, I said, is also pleasant?

It has certainly been acknowledged to be so, he replied

And do the cowards knowingly refuse to go to the nobler and pleasanter and better?

The admission of that he replied would belie our former admissions.

But does not the courageous man also go to meet the better and pleasanter and nobler?

That must be admitted

And the courageous man has no base fear or base confidence?

True, he replied

And if not base then honourable?

He admitted this

And if honourable, then good?

Yes

But the fear and confidence of the coward or foolhardy or madman on the contrary are base?

He assented

And these base fears and confidences originate in ignorance and uninstructedness?

True, he said

Then as to the motive from which the cowards act, do you call it cowardice or courage?

I should say cowardice, he replied

And have they not been shown to be cowards through their ignorance of dangers?

Assuredly he said

And because of that ignorance they are cowards?

He assented

And the reason why they are cowards is admitted by you to be cowardice?

He again assented

Then the ignorance of what is and is not dangerous is cowardice?

He nodded assent

But surely courage, I said is opposed to cowardice?

Yes

Then the wisdom which knows what are and are not dangers is opposed to the ignorance of them?

To that again he nodded assent

And the ignorance of them is cowardice?

To that he very reluctantly nodded assent sideration of their excess and defect and equality in relation to each other?

This is undeniably true

And this as possessing measure must undeniably also be an art and science?

They will agree he said

The nature of that art or science will be a matter of future consideration but the existence of such a science furnishes a demonstrative answer to the question which you asked of me and Protagoras At the time when you asked the question if you remember both of us were agreeing that there was nothing mightier than knowledge and that knowledge in whatever existing must have the advantage over pleasure and all other things and then you said that pleasure often got the advantage even over a man who has knowledge and we refused to allow this and you rejoined O Protagoras and Socrates what is the meaning of being overcome by pleasure if not this?—tell us what you call such a state —if we had immediately and at the time answered Ignorance you would have laughed at us But now in laughing at us you will be laughing at yourselves for you also admitted that men err in their choice of pleasures and pains that is in their choice of good and evil from defect of knowledge and you admitted further that they err not only from defect of knowledge in general but of that particular knowledge which is called measuring And you are also aware that the erring act which is done without knowledge is done in ignorance This therefore is the meaning of being overcome by pleasure —ignorance and that the greatest And our friends Protagoras and Prodicus and Hippias declare that they are the physicians of ignorance but you who are under the mistaken impression that ignorance is not the cause and that the art of which I am speaking cannot be taught neither go yourselves nor send your children to the Sophists who are the teachers of these things—you take care of your money and give them none and the result is that you are the worse off both in public and private life —Let us suppose this to be our answer to the world in general And now I should like to ask you [358] Hippias and you Prodicus as well as Protagoras (for the argument is to be yours as well as ours) whether you think that I am speaking the truth or not?

They all thought that what I said was entirely true

Then you agree I said that the pleasant is the good and the painful evil And here I would beg my friend Prodicus not to introduce his distinction of names whether he is disposed to say pleasurable delightful joyful However by whatever name he prefers to call them I will ask you most excellent Prodicus to answer in my sense of the words

Prodicus laughed and assented, as did the others

Then my friends, what do you say to this? Are not all actions honourable and useful of which the tendency is to make life painless and pleasant? The honourable work is also useful and good?

This was admitted

Then I said if the pleasant is the good nobody does anything under the idea or conviction that some other thing would be better and is also attainable when he might do the better And this inferiority of a man to himself is merely ignorance as the superiority of a man to himself is wisdom

They all assented

And is not ignorance the having a false opinion and being deceived about important matters?

To this also they unanimously assented

Then I said no man voluntarily pursues evil or that which he thinks to be evil To prefer evil to good is not in human nature and when a man is compelled to choose one of two evils no one will choose the greater when he may have the less

All of us agreed to every word of this

Well I said there is a certain thing called fear or terror and here Prodicus I should particularly like to know whether you would agree with me in defining this fear or terror as expectation of evil

Protagoras and Hippias agreed but Prodicus said that this was fear and not terror

Never mind Prodicus I said but let me ask whether if our former assertions are true a man will pursue that which he fears when he is not compelled? Would not this be in flat contradiction to the admission which has been already made that he thinks the things which he fears to be evil and no one will pursue or voluntarily accept that which he thinks to be evil?

[359] That also was universally admitted

Then I said these Hippias and Prodicus are our premisses and I would beg Protagoras to explain to us how he can be right in what he said at first I do not mean in what he said quite at first for his first statement as you may remember was that whereas there were five

EUTHYDEMUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES, who is the narrator; CRITO; CLEINIAS; EUTHYDEMUS; DIONYSODORUS; CTESIPPUS. Scene: The Lyceum

[271] Crito Who was the person, Socrates, with whom you were talking yesterday at the Lyceum? There was such a crowd around you that I could not get within hearing, but I caught a sight of him over their heads, and I made out, as I thought, that he was a stranger with whom you were talking: who was he?

Socrates There were two, Crito; which of them do you mean?

Cri. The one whom I mean was seated second from you on the right-hand side. In the middle was Cleinias the young son of Axiochus, who has wonderfully grown; he is only about the age of my own Critobulus, but he is much forwarder and very good-looking: the other is thin and looks younger than he is.

Soc. He whom you mean, Crito, is Euthydemus; and on my left hand there was his brother Dionysodorus, who also took part in the conversation.

Cri. Neither of them are known to me, Socrates; they are a new importation of Sophists, as I should imagine. Of what country are they, and what is their line of wisdom?

Soc. As to their origin, I believe that they are natives of this part of the world, and have migrated from Chios to Thurii; they were driven out of Thurii, and have been living for many years past in these regions. As to their wisdom, about which you ask, Crito, they are wonderful—consummate! I never knew what the true pancratiast was before; they are simply made up of fighting, not like the two Acarnanian brothers who fight with their bodies only, but this pair of heroes, besides being perfect in the use of their bodies, are invincible in every sort of warfare; [272] for they are capital at fighting in armour, and will teach the art to any one who pays them; and also they are most skilful in legal warfare; they will plead themselves and teach others to speak and to compose speeches which will have an effect upon the courts. And this was only the beginning of their wisdom, but they have at last carried out the pancratiastic art to the very end, and have mastered the only mode of fighting which had been hitherto neglected by them; and now no one dares even to stand up against them: such is their skill in the war of words, that they can refute any proposition whether true or false. Now I am thinking, Crito, of placing myself in their hands; for they say that in a short time they can impart their skill to any one.

Cri. But, Socrates, are you not too old? there may be reason to fear that.

Soc. Certainly not, Crito; as I will prove to you, for I have the consolation of knowing that they began this art of disputation which I covet, quite, as I may say, in old age; last year, or the year before, they had none of their new wisdom. I am only apprehensive that I may bring the two strangers into disrepute, as I have done Connus the son of Metrobius, the harp-player, who is still my music-master; for when the boys who go to him see me going with them, they laugh at me and call him grandpapa's master. Now I should not like the strangers to experience similar treatment; the fear of ridicule may make them unwilling to receive me; and therefore, Crito, I shall try and persuade some old men to accompany me to them, as I persuaded them to go with me to

And the knowledge of that which is and is not dangerous is courage and is opposed to the ignorance of these things?

At this point he would no longer nod assent but was silent

And why I said do you neither assent nor dissent Protagoras?

Finish the argument by yourself he said

I only want to ask one more question I said I want to know whether you still think that there are men who are most ignorant and yet most courageous?

You seem to have a great ambition to make me answer Socrates and therefore I will gratify you and say that this appears to me to be impossible consistently with the argument

My only object I said in continuing the discussion has been the desire to ascertain the nature and relations of virtue for if this were clear [361] I am very sure that the other controversy which has been carried on at great length by both of us—you affirming and I denying that virtue can be taught—would also become clear The result of our discussion appears to me to be singular For if the argument had a human voice that voice would be heard laughing at us and saying Protagoras and Socrates you are strange beings there are you Socrates who were saying that virtue cannot be taught contradicting yourself now by your attempt to prove that all things are knowledge including justice and temperance and courage —which tends to show that virtue can certainly be taught for if virtue were other than knowledge as Protagoras attempted to prove then clearly virtue cannot be taught but if virtue is entirely knowledge as you are seeking to show then I cannot but suppose that virtue is capable of being taught Protagoras on the other hand who started by saying that it might be taught is now eager to prove it to be anything rather than knowledge and if this is true, it must be quite incapable of being taught Now I Protagoras perceiving this terrible confusion of our ideas have a great desire that they should be cleared up And I should like to carry on the discussion until we ascertain what virtue is and whether capable of being taught or not, lest haply Epimetheus should trip us up and deceive us in the argument as he forgot us in the story I prefer your Prometheus to your Epimetheus for of him I make use, whenever I am busy about these questions in Promethean care of my own life And if you have no objection as I said at first I should like to have your help in the enquiry

Protagoras replied Socrates I am not of a base nature and I am the last man in the world to be envious I cannot but applaud your energy and your conduct of an argument As I have often said I admire you above all men whom I know and far above all men of your age and I believe that you will become very eminent in philosophy Let us come back to the subject at some future time at present we had better turn to something else

By all means I said if that is your wish for I too ought long since to have kept the engagement of which I spoke before and only tarried because I could not refuse the request of the noble Callias So the conversation ended and we went our way taught at all or that you are not the teachers of it? Has your art power to persuade him who is of the latter temper of mind that virtue can be taught and that you are the men from whom he will best learn it?

Certainly Socrates said Dionysodorus our art will do both

And you and your brother Dionysodorus I said of all men who are now living are the most likely to stimulate him to philosophy and to the study of virtue?

[275] Yes, Socrates, I rather think that we are.

Then I wish that you would be so good as to defer the other part of the exhibition and only try to persuade the youth whom you see here that he ought to be a philosopher and study virtue. Exhibit that, and you will confer a great favour on me and on every one present for the fact is I and all of us are extremely anxious that he should become truly good His name is Cleinias and he is the son of Axiochus, and grandson of the old Alcibiades cousin of the Alcibiades that now is He is quite young, and we are naturally afraid that some one may get the start of us, and turn his mind in a wrong direction and he may be ruined Your visit, therefore, is most happily timed and I hope that you will make a trial of the young man and converse with him in our presence, if you have no objection

These were pretty nearly the expressions which I used and Euthydemus in a manly and at the same time encouraging tone, replied There can be no objection Socrates if the young man is only willing to answer questions

He is quite accustomed to do so I replied for his friends often come and ask him questions and argue with him and therefore he is quite at home in answering

What followed Crito, how can I rightly narrate? For not slight is the task of rehearsing infinite wisdom and therefore like the poets, I ought to commence my relation with an invocation to Memory and the Muses Now Euthydemus if I remember rightly began nearly as follows O Cleinias are those who learn the wise or the ignorant?

The youth, overpowered by the question, blushed, and in his perplexity looked at me for help and I knowing that he was disconcerted said Take courage, Cleinias, and answer like a man whichever you think for my belief is that you will derive the greatest benefit from their questions.

Whichever he answers said Dionysodorus leaning forward so as to catch my ear his face beaming with laughter I prophesy that he will be refuted Socrates

While he was speaking to me, Cleinias gave his answer and therefore I had no time to warn him of the predicament in which he was placed [276] and he answered that those who learned were the wise.

Euthydemus proceeded There are some whom you would call teachers are there not?

The boy assented

And they are the teachers of those who learn—the grammar master and the lyre master used to teach you and other boys and you were the learners?

Yes

And when you were learners you did not as yet know the things which you were learning?

No he said

And were you wise then?

No indeed he said

But if you were not wise you were unlearned?

Certainly

You then learning what you did not know were unlearned when you were learning?

The youth nodded assent

Then the unlearned learn, and not the wise, Cleinias, as you imagine.

At these words the followers of Euthydemus of whom I spoke, like a chorus at the bidding of their director laughed and cheered Then before the youth had time to recover his breath Dionysodorus cleverly took him in hand and said Yes Cleinias and when the grammar master dictated anything to you, were they the wise boys or the unlearned who learned the dictation?

The wise replied Cleinias

Then after all the wise are the learners and not the unlearned and your last answer to Euthydemus was wrong

Then once more the admirers of the two heroes in an ecstasy at their wisdom gave vent to another peal of laughter while the rest of us were silent and amazed Euthydemus observing this, determined to persevere with the youth and in order to heighten the effect went on asking another similar question which might be compared to the double turn of an expert dancer Do those, said he, who learn learn what they know or what they do not know?

Connus and I hope that you will make one and perhaps we had better take your sons as a bait they will want to have them as pupils and for the sake of them will be willing to receive us

Cri I see no objection, Socrates if you like but first I wish that you would give me a description of their wisdom that I may know beforehand what we are going to learn

Soc In less than no time you shall hear for I cannot say that I did not attend—I paid great attention to them and I remember and will endeavour to repeat the whole story Providentially I was sitting alone in the dressing room of the Lyceum where you saw me and was about to depart when I was getting up I recognized the familiar divine sign [273] so I sat down again and in a little while the two brothers Euthydemus and Dionysodorus came in and several others with them whom I believe to be their disciples and they walked about in the covered court they had not taken more than two or three turns when Cleinias entered who as you truly say is very much improved he was followed by a host of lovers one of whom was Ctesippus the Paeanian a well bred youth but also having the wildness of youth Cleinias saw me from the entrance as I was sitting alone and at once came and sat down on the right hand of me as you describe and Dionysodorus and Euthydemus when they saw him at first stopped and talked with one another now and then glancing at us for I particularly watched them and then Euthydemus came and sat down by the youth and the other by me on the left hand the rest anywhere I saluted the brothers whom I had not seen for a long time and then I said to Cleinias Here are two wise men Euthydemus and Dionysodorus Cleinias wise not in a small but in a large way of wisdom for they know all about war—all that a good general ought to know about the array and command of an army and the whole art of fighting in armour and they know about law too and can teach a man how to use the weapons of the courts when he is injured

They heard me say this but only despised me. I observed that they looked at one another and both of them laughed and then Euthydemus said Those Socrates are matters which we no longer pursue seriously to us they are secondary occupations

Indeed I said if such occupations are regarded by you as secondary what must the principal one be tell me I beseech you what that noble study is?

The teaching of virtue Socrates he replied is our principal occupation and we believe that we can impart it better and quicker than any man

My God! I said, and where did you learn that? I always thought as I was saying just now that your chief accomplishment was the art of fighting in armour and I used to say as much of you for I remember that you professed this when you were here before But now if you really have the other knowledge O forgive me I address you as I would superior beings and ask you to pardon the impiety of my former expressions [274] But are you quite sure about this, Dionysodorus and Euthydemus? the promise is so vast that a feeling of incredulity steals over me

You may take our word Socrates for the fact

Then I think you happier in having such a treasure than the great king is in the possession of his kingdom And please to tell me whether you intend to exhibit your wisdom or what will you do?

That is why we have come hither Socrates and our purpose is not only to exhibit but also to teach any one who likes to learn

But I can promise you I said that every unvirtuous person will want to learn I shall be the first and there is the youth Cleinias and Ctesippus and here are several others I said pointing to the lovers of Cleinias who were beginning to gather round us Now Ctesippus was sitting at some distance from Cleinias and when Euthydemus leaned forward in talking with me he was prevented from seeing Cleinias who was between us and so partly because he wanted to look at his love and also because he was interested he jumped up and stood opposite to us and all the other admirers of Cleinias as well as the disciples of Euthydemus and Dionysodorus followed his example And these were the persons whom I showed to Euthydemus telling him that they were all eager to learn to which Ctesippus and all of them with one voice vehemently assented and bid him exhibit the power of his wisdom Then I said O Euthydemus and Dionysodorus I earnestly request you to do myself and the company the favour to exhibit There may be some trouble in giving the whole exhibition but tell me one thing—can you make a good man of him only who is already convinced that he ought to learn of you or of him also who is not convinced either because he imagines that virtue is a thing which cannot be rus, I think that we have had enough of this. Will you let me see you explaining to the young man how he is to apply himself to the study of virtue and wisdom? And I will first show you what I conceive to be the nature of the task, and what sort of a discourse I desire to hear: and if I do this in a very inartistic and ridiculous manner do not laugh at me, for I only venture to improvise before you because I am eager to hear your wisdom and I must therefore ask you and your disciples to refrain from laughing. And now O son of Axiochus let me put a question to you Do not all men desire happiness? And yet, perhaps this is one of those ridiculous questions which I am afraid to ask, and which ought not to be asked by a sensible man for what human being is there who does not desire happiness?

[279] There is no one, said Cleinias, who does not.

Well, then, I said, since we all of us desire happiness, how can we be happy?—that is the next question. Shall we not be happy if we have many good things? And this, perhaps, is even a more simple question than the first, for there can be no doubt of the answer

He assented.

And what things do we esteem good? No solemn sage is required to tell us this, which may be easily answered for every one will say that wealth is a good.

Certainly he said

And are not health and beauty goods, and other personal gifts?

He agreed.

Can there be any doubt that good birth and power and honours in one's own land, are goods?

He assented

And what other goods are there? I said. What do you say of temperance, justice, courage do you not verily and indeed think, Cleinias, that we shall be more right in ranking them as goods than in not ranking them as goods For a dispute might possibly arise about this. What then do you say?

They are goods, said Cleinias

Very well I said and where in the company shall we find a place for wisdom—among the good or not?

Among the goods.

And now I said, think whether we have left out any considerable goods.

I do not think that we have, said Cleinias.

Upon recollection, I said, indeed I am afraid that we have left out the greatest of them all.

What is that? he asked

Fortune, Cleinias, I replied which all even the most foolish, admit to be the greatest of goods

True, he said.

On second thoughts, I added how narrowly O son of Axiochus, have you and I escaped making a laughing stock of ourselves to the strangers.

Why do you say so?

Why because we have already spoken of good fortune, and are but repeating ourselves

What do you mean?

I mean that there is something ridiculous in again putting forward good fortune, which has a place in the list already and saying the same thing twice over

He asked what was the meaning of this, and I replied Surely wisdom is good fortune even a child may know that.

The simple minded youth was amazed and observing his surprise, I said to him Do you not know Cleinias, that flute players are most fortunate and successful in performing on the flute?

He assented.

And are not the scribes most fortunate in writing and reading letters?

Certainly

Amid the dangers of the sea, again are any more fortunate on the whole than wise pilots?

None, certainly

And if you were engaged in war in whose company would you rather take the risk—in company with a wise general, or with a foolish one?

With a wise one.

And if you were ill, whom would you rather have as a companion in a dangerous illness—a wise physician, or an ignorant one?

A wise one.

You think, I said, that to act with a wise man is more fortunate than to act with an ignorant one?

He assented

[280] Then wisdom always makes men fortunate for by wisdom no man would ever err and therefore he must act rightly and succeed, or his wisdom would be wisdom no longer

We contrived at last, somehow or other to agree in a general conclusion that he who had wisdom had no need of fortune. I then recalled to his mind the previous state of the question. You remember I said, our making the admission that we should be happy and fortunate if many good things were present with us?

Again Dionysodorus whispered to me That Socrates is just another of the same sort

Good heavens, I said and your last question was so good!

Like all our other questions Socrates, he replied—inevitable

I see the reason I said why you are in such reputation among your disciples

Meanwhile Cleinias had answered Euthydemus that those who learned learn what they do not know and he put him through a series of questions the same as before [277] Do you not know letters?

He assented

All letters?

Yes

But when the teacher dictates to you does he not dictate letters?

To this also he assented

Then if you know all letters he dictates that which you know?

This again was admitted by him

Then said the other you do not learn that which he dictates but he only who does not know letters learns?

Nay said Cleinias but I do learn

Then said he you learn what you know, if you know all the letters?

He admitted that

Then he said you were wrong in your answer

The word was hardly out of his mouth when Dionysodorus took up the argument like a ball which he caught and had another throw at the youth Cleinias he said Euthydemus is deceiving you For tell me now is not learning acquiring knowledge of that which one learns?

Cleinias assented

And knowing is having knowledge at the time?

He agreed

And not knowing is not having knowledge at the time?

He admitted that

And are those who acquire those who have or have not a thing?

Those who have not

And have you not admitted that those who do not know are of the number of those who have not?

He nodded assent

Then those who learn are of the class of those who acquire and not of those who have?

He agreed

Then Cleinias he said those who do not know learn and not those who know

Euthydemus was proceeding to give the youth a third fall but I knew that he was in deep water and therefore, as I wanted to give him a respite lest he should be disheartened, I said to him consolingly You must not be surprised Cleinias at the singularity of their mode of speech this I say because you may not understand what the two strangers are doing with you they are only initiating you after the manner of the Corybantes in the mysteries and this answers to the enthronement which, if you have ever been initiated is, as you will know accompanied by dancing and sport and now they are just prancing and dancing about you and will next proceed to initiate you, imagine then that you have gone through the first part of the sophistical ritual which as Prodicus says, begins with initiation into the correct use of terms The two foreign gentlemen perceiving that you did not know wanted to explain to you that the word to learn has two meanings, [278] and is used first, in the sense of acquiring knowledge of some matter of which you previously have no knowledge, and also, when you have the knowledge, in the sense of reviewing this matter whether something done or spoken by the light of this newly-acquired knowledge the latter is generally called knowing rather than learning but the word learning is also used and you did not see, as they explained to you that the term is employed of two opposite sorts of men of those who know and of those who do not know There was a similar trick in the second question when they asked you whether men learn what they know or what they do not know These parts of learning are not serious, and therefore I say that the gentlemen are not serious, but are only playing with you For if a man had all that sort of knowledge that ever was, he would not be at all the wiser he would only be able to play with men tripping them up and oversetting them with distinctions of words He would be like a person who pulls away a stool from some one when he is about to sit down and then laughs and makes merry at the sight of his friend overturned and laid on his back And you must regard all that has hitherto passed between you and them as merely play But in what is to follow I am certain that they will exhibit to you their serious purpose, and keep their promise (I will show them how) for they promised to give me a sample of the hortatory philosophy but I suppose that they wanted to have a game with you first. And now Euthydemus and Dionysodo-

rus, I think that we have had enough of this. Will you let me see you explaining to the young man how he is to apply himself to the study of virtue and wisdom? And I will first show you what I conceive to be the nature of the task, and what sort of a discourse I desire to hear; and if I do this in a very inartistic and ridiculous manner, do not laugh at me, for I only venture to improvise before you because I am eager to hear your wisdom: and I must therefore ask you and your disciples to refrain from laughing. And now, O son of Axiochus, let me put a question to you: Do not all men desire happiness? And yet, perhaps, this is one of those ridiculous questions which I am afraid to ask, and which ought not to be asked by a sensible man: for what human being is there who does not desire happiness?

[279] There is no one, said Cleinias, who does not.

Well, then, I said, since we all of us desire happiness, how can we be happy?—that is the next question. Shall we not be happy if we have many good things? And this, perhaps, is even a more simple question than the first, for there can be no doubt of the answer.

He assented.

And what things do we esteem good? No solemn sage is required to tell us this, which may be easily answered; for every one will say that wealth is a good.

Certainly, he said.

And are not health and beauty goods, and other personal gifts?

He agreed.

Can there be any doubt that good birth, and power, and honours in one's own land, are goods?

He assented.

And what other goods are there? I said. What do you say of temperance, justice, courage: do you not verily and indeed think, Cleinias, that we shall be more right in ranking them as goods than in not ranking them as goods? For a dispute might possibly arise about this. What then do you say?

They are goods, said Cleinias.

Very well, I said; and where in the company shall we find a place for wisdom—among the goods or not?

Among the goods.

And now, I said, think whether we have left out any considerable goods.

I do not think that we have, said Cleinias.

Upon recollection, I said, indeed I am afraid that we have left out the greatest of them all.

What is that? he asked.

Fortune, Cleinias, I replied; which all, even the most foolish, admit to be the greatest of goods.

True, he said.

On second thoughts, I added, how narrowly, O son of Axiochus, have you and I escaped making a laughing-stock of ourselves to the strangers.

Why do you say so?

Why, because we have already spoken of good fortune, and are but repeating ourselves.

What do you mean?

I mean that there is something ridiculous in again putting forward good fortune, which has a place in the list already, and saying the same thing twice over.

He asked what was the meaning of this, and I replied: Surely wisdom is good fortune; even a child may know that.

The simple-minded youth was amazed; and observing his surprise, I said to him: Do you not know, Cleinias, that flute-players are most fortunate and successful in performing on the flute?

He assented.

And are not the scribes most fortunate in writing and reading letters?

Certainly.

Amid the dangers of the sea, again, are any more fortunate on the whole than wise pilots?

None, certainly.

And if you were engaged in war, in whose company would you rather take the risk—in company with a wise general, or with a foolish one?

With a wise one.

And if you were ill, whom would you rather have as a companion in a dangerous illness—a wise physician, or an ignorant one?

A wise one.

You think, I said, that to act with a wise man is more fortunate than to act with an ignorant one?

He assented.

[280] Then wisdom always makes men fortunate: for by wisdom no man would ever err, and therefore he must act rightly and succeed, or his wisdom would be wisdom no longer.

We contrived at last, somehow or other, to agree in a general conclusion, that he who had wisdom had no need of fortune. I then recalled to his mind the previous state of the question. You remember, I said, our making the admission that we should be happy and fortunate if many good things were present with us?

He assented

And should we be happy by reason of the presence of good things if they profited us not or it they profited us?

If they profited us he said

And would they profit us if we only had them and did not use them? For example if we had a great deal of food and did not eat or a great deal of drink and did not drink should we be profited?

Certainly not he said

Or would an artisan who had all the implements necessary for his work and did not use them be any the better for the possession of them? For example would a carpenter be any the better for having all his tools and plenty of wood if he never worked?

Certainly not he said

And if a person had wealth and all the goods of which we were just now speaking and did not use them would he be happy because he possessed them?

No indeed Socrates

Then I said a man who would be happy must not only have the good things but he must also use them there is no advantage in merely having them?

True

Well Clemas but if you have the use as well as the possession of good things is that sufficient to confer happiness?

Yes in my opinion

And may a person use them either rightly or wrongly?

He must use them rightly

That is quite true I said And the wrong use of a thing is far worse than the non use for the one is an evil and the other is neither a good nor an evil [281] You admit that?

He assented

Now in the working and use of wood, is not that which gives the right use simply the knowledge of the carpenter?

Nothing else, he said

And surely in the manufacture of vessels knowledge is that which gives the right way of making them?

He agreed

And in the use of the goods of which we spoke at first—wealth and health and beauty is not knowledge that which directs us to the right use of them and regulates our practice about them?

He assented

Then in every possession and every use of a thing knowledge is that which gives a man not only good fortune but success?

He again assented

And tell me I said, O tell me what do possessions profit a man, if he have neither good sense nor wisdom? Would a man be better off having and doing many things without wisdom or a few things with wisdom? Look at the matter thus If he did fewer things would he not make fewer mistakes? if he made fewer mistakes would he not have fewer misfortunes? and if he had fewer misfortunes would he not be less miserable?

Certainly he said

And who would do least—a poor man or a rich man?

A poor man

A weak man or a strong man?

A weak man

A noble man or a mean man?

A mean man

And a coward would do less than a courageous and temperate man?

Yes

And an indolent man less than an active man?

He assented

And a slow man less than a quick and one who had dull perceptions of seeing and hearing less than one who had keen ones?

All this was mutually allowed by us

Then I said Clemas the sum of the matter appears to be that the goods of which we spoke before are not to be regarded as goods in themselves but the degree of good and evil in them depends on whether they are or are not under the guidance of knowledge under the guidance of ignorance they are greater evils than their opposites inasmuch as they are more able to minister to the evil principle which rules them and when under the guidance of wisdom and prudence they are greater goods but in themselves they are nothing?

That he replied is obvious

What then is the result of what has been said? Is not this the result—that other things are indifferent and that wisdom is the only good and ignorance the only evil?

He assented

[282] Let us consider a further point I said Seeing that all men desire happiness and happiness as has been shown is gained by a use and a right use of the things of life and the right use of them and good fortune in the use of them is given by knowledge—the inference is that everybody ought by all means to try and make himself as wise as he can?

Yes, he said

And when a man thinks that he ought to obtain this treasure, far more than money, from a father or a guardian or a friend or a suitor, whether citizen or stranger—the eager desire and prayer to them that they would impart wisdom to you, is not at all dishonourable, Cleinias; nor is any one to be blamed for doing any honourable service or ministration to any man, whether a lover or not, if his aim is to get wisdom. Do you agree? I said

Yes, he said, I quite agree, and think that you are right.

Yes, I said, Cleinias, if only wisdom can be taught, and does not come to man spontaneously; for this is a point which has still to be considered, and is not yet agreed upon by you and me—

But I think, Socrates, that wisdom can be taught, he said

Best of men, I said, I am delighted to hear you say so, and I am also grateful to you for having saved me from a long and tiresome investigation as to whether wisdom can be taught or not. But now, as you think that wisdom can be taught, and that wisdom only can make a man happy and fortunate, will you not acknowledge that all of us ought to love wisdom, and you individually will try to love her?

Certainly, Socrates, he said; I will do my best

I was pleased at hearing this, and I turned to Dionysodorus and Euthydemus and said: That is an example, clumsy and tedious I admit, of the sort of exhortations which I would have you give, and I hope that one of you will set forth what I have been saying in a more artistic style, or at least take up the enquiry where I left off, and proceed to show the youth whether he should have all knowledge or whether there is one sort of knowledge only which will make him good and happy, and what that is. For as I was saying at first, the improvement of this young man in virtue and wisdom is a matter which we have very much at heart

[283] Thus I spoke, Crito, and was all attention to what was coming. I wanted to see how they would approach the question, and where they would start in their exhortation to the young man that he should practise wisdom and virtue. Dionysodorus, who was the elder, spoke first. Everybody's eyes were directed towards him, perceiving that something wonderful might shortly be expected. And certainly they were not far wrong; for the man, Crito, began a remarkable discourse well worth hearing, and wonderfully persuasive regarded as an exhortation to virtue

Tell me, he said, Socrates and the rest of you who say that you want this young man to become wise, are you in jest or in real earnest?

I was led by this to imagine that they fancied us to have been jesting when we asked them to converse with the youth, and that this made them jest and play, and being under this impression, I was the more decided in saying that we were in profound earnest. Dionysodorus said

Reflect, Socrates; you may have to deny your words

I have reflected, I said; and I shall never deny my words

Well, said he, and so you say that you wish Cleinias to become wise?

Undoubtedly

And he is not wise as yet?

At least his modesty will not allow him to say that he is

You wish him, he said, to become wise and not to be ignorant?

That we do

You wish him to be what he is not, and no longer to be what he is?

I was thrown into consternation at this

Taking advantage of my consternation he added: You wish him no longer to be what he is, which can only mean that you wish him to perish. Pretty lovers and friends they must be who want their favourite not to be, or to perish!

When Ctesippus heard this he got very angry (as a lover well might) and said: Stranger of Thurii—if politeness would allow me I should say, A plague upon you! What can make you tell such a lie about me and the others, which I hardly like to repeat, as that I wish Cleinias to perish?

Euthydemus replied: And do you think, Ctesippus, that it is possible to tell a lie?

Yes, said Ctesippus; I should be mad to say anything else.

[284] And in telling a lie, do you tell the thing of which you speak or not?

You tell the thing of which you speak

And he who tells, tells that thing which he tells, and no other?

Yes, said Ctesippus

And that is a distinct thing apart from other things?

Certainly

And he who says that thing says that which is?

Yes

And he who says that which is, says the truth And therefore Dionysodorus if he says that which is, says the truth of you and no lie

Yes Euthydemus said Ctesippus but in saying this he says what is not Euthydemus answered And that which is not is not?

True

And that which is not is nowhere?

Nowhere

And can any one do anything about that which has no existence or do to Cleinias that which is not and is nowhere?

I think not said Ctesippus

Well but do rhetoricians when they speak in the assembly do nothing?

Nay he said they do something

And doing is making?

Yes

And speaking is doing and making?

He agreed

Then no one says that which is not for in saying what is not he would be doing something and you have already acknowledged that no one can do what is not And therefore upon your own showing no one says what is false but if Dionysodorus says anything he says what is true and what is

Yes Euthydemus said Ctesippus but he speaks of things in a certain way and manner and not as they really are

Why Ctesippus said Dionysodorus do you mean to say that any one speaks of things as they are?

Yes he said—all gentlemen and truth speaking persons

And are not good things good and evil things evil?

He assented

And you say that gentlemen speak of things as they are?

Yes

Then the good speak evil of evil things if they speak of them as they are?

Yes indeed he said and they speak evil of evil men And if I may give you a piece of advice you had better take care that they do not speak evil of you since I can tell you that the good speak evil of the evil

And do they speak great things of the great rejoined Euthydemus, and warm things of the warm?

To be sure they do said Ctesippus and they speak coldly of the insipid and cold dialectician

You are abusive Ctesippus said Dionysodorus you are abusive!

Indeed I am not Dionysodorus he replied for I love you and am giving you friendly advice and if I could would persuade you not like a boor to say in my presence that I desire my beloved [-85] whom I value above all men to perish

I saw that they were getting exasperated with one another so I made a joke with him and said O Ctesippus I think that we must allow the strangers to use language in their own way and not quarrel with them about words, but be thankful for what they give us If they know how to destroy men in such a way as to make good and sensible men out of bad and foolish ones—whether this is a discovery of their own or whether they have learned from some one else this new sort of death and destruction which enables them to get rid of a bad man and turn him into a good one—if they know this (and they do know this—at any rate they said just now that this was the secret of their newly-discovered art)—let them in their phraseology destroy the youth and make him wise and all of us with him But if you young men do not like to trust yourselves with them then fiat experimentum in corpore senis I will be the Carian on whom they shall operate And here I offer my old person to Dionysodorus he may put me into the pot like Medea the Colchian kill me boil me, if he will only make me good

Ctesippus said And I Socrates am ready to commit myself to the strangers they may skin me alive if they please (and I am pretty well skinned by them already) if only my skin is made at last not like that of Marsyas into a leathern bottle but into a piece of virtue And here is Dionysodorus fancying that I am angry with him when really I am not angry at all I do but contradict him when I think that he is speaking improperly to me and you must not confound abuse and contradiction O illustrious Dionysodorus for they are quite different things

Contradiction! said Dionysodorus why there never was such a thing

Certainly there is he replied there can be no question of that Do you Dionysodorus maintain that there is not?

You will never prove to me he said that you have heard any one contradicting any one else

Indeed said Ctesippus then now you may hear me contradicting Dionysodorus

Are you prepared to make that good?

Certainly he said

Well, have not all things words expressive of them?

Yes.

Of their existence or of their non-existence?

Of their existence.

[286] Yes, Ctesippus, and we just now proved, as you may remember that no man could affirm a negative, for no one could affirm that which is not.

And what does that signify? said Ctesippus you and I may contradict all the same for that.

But can we contradict one another said Dionysodorus, when both of us are describing the same thing? Then we must surely be speaking the same thing?

He assented.

Or when neither of us is speaking of the same thing? For then neither of us says a word about the thing at all?

He granted that proposition also

But when I describe something and you describe another thing or I say something and you say nothing—is there any contradiction? How can he who speaks contradict him who speaks not?

Here Ctesippus was silent and I in my astonishment said What do you mean Dionysodorus? I have often heard, and have been amazed to hear this thesis of yours, which is maintained and employed by the disciples of Protagoras, and others before them, and which to me appears to be quite wonderful, and suicidal as well as destructive, and I think that I am most likely to hear the truth about it from you. The dictum is that there is no such thing as falsehood a man must either say what is true or say nothing Is not that your position?

He assented

But if he cannot speak falsely may he not think falsely?

No he cannot, he said

Then there is no such thing as false opinion?

No he said

Then there is no such thing as ignorance, or men who are ignorant for is not ignorance, if there be such a thing a mistake of fact?

Certainly he said

And that is impossible?

Impossible, he replied

Are you saying this as a paradox, Dionysodorus or do you seriously maintain no man to be ignorant?

Refute me, he said

But how can I refute you if as you say to tell a falsehood is impossible?

Very true, said Euthydemus.

Neither did I tell you just now to refute me said Dionysodorus for how can I tell you to do that which is not?

O Euthydemus, I said, I have but a dull conception of these subtleties and excellent devices of wisdom I am afraid that I hardly understand them, and you must forgive me therefore if I ask a very stupid question [287] if there be no falsehood or false opinion or ignorance, there can be no such thing as erroneous action for a man cannot fail of acting as he is acting—that is what you mean?

Yes, he replied

And now I said I will ask my stupid question If there is no such thing as error in deed word, or thought, then what in the name of goodness, do you come hither to teach? And were you not just now saying that you could teach virtue best of all men, to any one who was willing to learn?

And are you such an old fool Socrates, rejoined Dionysodorus, that you bring up now what I said at first—and if I had said anything last year I suppose that you would bring that up too—but are non-plussed at the words which I have just uttered?

Why I said, they are not easy to answer for they are the words of wise men and indeed I know not what to make of this word non-plussed," which you used last what do you mean by it, Dionysodorus? You must mean that I cannot refute your argument. Tell me if the words have any other sense.

No he replied, they mean what you say And now answer

What, before you, Dionysodorus? I said

Answer said he.

And is that fair?

Yes, quite fair he said

Upon what principle? I said I can only suppose that you are a very wise man who comes to us in the character of a great logician, and who knows when to answer and when not to answer—and now you will not open your mouth at all, because you know that you ought not.

You prate, he said, instead of answering But if, my good sir you admit that I am wise, answer as I tell you

I suppose that I must obey for you are master Put the question

Are the things which have sense alive or lifeless?

They are alive

And do you know of any word which is alive?

I cannot say that I do

Then why did you ask me what sense my words had?

Why because I was stupid and made a mis take And yet perhaps I was right after all in saying that words have a sense —what do you say wise man? If I was not in error even you will not refute me and all your wisdom will be non plussed but if I did fall into error then again you are wrong in saying that there is no error —and this remark was made by you not quite a year ago [288] I am inclined to think however Dionysodorus and Euthyde mus that this argument lies where it was and is not very likely to advance even your skill in the subtleties of logic which is really amaz ing has not found out the way of throwing an other and not falling yourself now any more than of old

Ctesippus said Men of Chios Thurii or however and whatever you call yourselves I wonder at you for you seem to have no objec tion to talking nonsense

Fearing that there would be high words I again endeavoured to soothe Ctesippus and said to him To you Ctesippus I must repeat what I said before to Cleinias—that you do not understand the ways of these philosophers from abroad They are not serious but like the Egyptian wizard Proteus they take different forms and deceive us by their enchantments and let us like Menelaus refuse to let them go until they show themselves to us in earnest When they begin to be in earnest their full beauty will appear let us then beg and entreat and beseech them to shine forth And I think that I had better once more exhibit the form in which I pray to behold them it might be a guide to them I will go on therefore where I left off as well as I can in the hope that I may touch their hearts and move them to pity and that when they see me deeply serious and in terested they also may be serious You Clei nias I said shall remind me at what point we left off Did we not agree that philosophy should be studied? and was not that our con clusion?

Yes he replied

And philosophy is the acquisition of knowl edge?

Yes he said

And what knowledge ought we to acquire? May we not answer with absolute truth—A knowledge which will do us good?

Certainly he said

And should we be any the better if we went about having a knowledge of the places where most gold was hidden in the earth?

Perhaps we should he said

But have we not already proved I said that we should be none the better off even if with out trouble and digging all the gold which there is in the earth were ours? And if we knew how to convert stones into gold [289] the knowledge would be of no value to us unless we also knew how to use the gold? Do you not remember? I said

I quite remember he said

Nor would any other knowledge whether of money making or of medicine or of any other art which knows only how to make a thing and not to use it when made be of any good to us Am I not right?

He agreed

And if there were a knowledge which was able to make men immortal without giving them the knowledge of the way to use the im mortality neither would there be any use in that if we may argue from the analogy of the previous instances?

To all this he agreed

Then my dear boy I said the knowledge which we want is one that uses as well as makes?

True he said

And our desire is not to be skilful lyre mak ers or artists of that sort—far otherwise for with them the art which makes is one and the art which uses is another Although they have to do with the same they are divided for the art which makes and the art which plays on the lyre differ widely from one another Am I not right?

He agreed

And clearly we do not want the art of the flute maker this is only another of the same sort?

He assented

But suppose I said that we were to learn the art of making speeches—would that be the art which would make us happy?

I should say no rejoined Cleinias

And why should you say so? I asked

I see he replied that there are some com posers of speeches who do not know how to use the speeches which they make just as the mak ers of lyres do not know how to use the lyres and also some who are of themselves unable to compose speeches but are able to use the speeches which the others make for them and this proves that the art of making speeches is not the same as the art of using them

Yes I said and I take your words to be a sufficient proof that the art of making speeches is not one which will make a man happy And yet I did think that the art which we have so long been seeking might be discovered in that direction for the composers of speeches, whenever I meet them, always appear to me to be very extraordinary men, Cleinias, and their art is lofty and divine, and no wonder For their art is a part of the great art of enchantment [290] and hardly if at all, inferior to it and whereas the art of the enchanter is a mode of charming snakes and spiders and scorpions, and other monsters and pests, this art of theirs acts upon dicasts and ecclesiasts and bodies of men, for the charming and pacifying of them Do you agree with me?

Yes, he said, I think that you are quite right.

Whither then shall we go, I said, and to what art shall we have recourse?

I do not see my way he said.

But I think that I do, I replied.

And what is your notion? asked Cleinias.

I think that the art of the general is above all others the one of which the possession is most likely to make a man happy

I do not think so, he said.

Why not? I said.

The art of the general is surely an art of letting mankind.

What of that I said

Why he said, no art of hunting extends beyond hunting and capturing, and when the prey is taken the huntsman or fisherman cannot use it but they hand it over to the cook, and the geometricians and astronomers and calculators (who all belong to the hunting class, for they do not make their diagrams, but only find out that which was previously contained in them)—they I say not being able to use but only to catch their prey hand over their inventions to the dialectician to be applied by him, if they have any sense in them

Good, I said, fairest and wisest Cleinias. And is this true?

Certainly he said just as a general when he takes a city or a camp hands over his new acquisition to the statesman, for he does not know how to use them himself or as the quail-taker transfers the quails to the keeper of them If we are looking for the art which is to make us blessed, and which is able to use that which it makes or takes, the art of the general is not the one, and some other must be found.

Cri And do you mean, Socrates, that the youngster said all this?

Soc Are you incredulous, Crito?

Cri Indeed I am for if he did say so then in my opinion he needs neither Euthydemus nor any one else to be his instructor

Soc Perhaps I may have forgotten, and Ctesippus was the real answerer

[291] Cri Ctesippus! nonsense.

Soc All I know is that I heard these words, and that they were not spoken either by Euthydemus or Dionysodorus. I dare say my good Crito, that they may have been spoken by some superior person that I heard them I am certain Cri Yes, indeed, Socrates, by some one a good deal superior as I should be disposed to think. But did you carry the search any further and did you find the art which you were seeking?

Soc Find! my dear sir no indeed And we cut a poor figure we were like children after larks, always on the point of catching the art, which was always getting away from us But why should I repeat the whole story? At last we came to the kingly art, and enquired whether that gave and caused happiness, and then we got into a labyrinth, and when we thought we were at the end came out again at the beginning, having still to seek as much as ever

Cri How did that happen, Socrates?

Soc I will tell you the kingly art was identified by us with the political

Cri Well, and what came of that?

Soc To this royal or political art all the arts including the art of the general, seemed to render up the supremacy that being the only one which knew how to use what they produce Here obviously was the very art which we were seeking—the art which is the source of good government, and which may be described, in the language of Aeschylus, as alone sitting at the helm of the vessel of state, piloting and governing all things, and utilizing them.

Cri And were you not right, Socrates?

Soc You shall judge, Crito if you are willing to hear what followed for we resumed the enquiry and a question of this sort was asked Does the kingly art, having this supreme authority do anything for us To be sure, was the answer And would not you, Crito, say the same

Cri Yes I should

Soc And what would you say that the kingly art does? If medicine were supposed to have supreme authority over the subordinate arts, and I were to ask you a similar question about that, you would say—it produces health?

Cri I should.

Soc And what of your own art of husbandry supposing that to have supreme authority over the subject arts—what does that do? Does it not supply us with the fruits of the earth? [292]

Cri Yes

Soc And what does the kingly art do when invested with supreme power? Perhaps you may not be ready with an answer?

Cri Indeed I am not Socrates

Soc No more were we Crito But at any rate you know that if this is the art which we were seeking it ought to be useful

Cri Certainly

Soc And surely it ought to do us some good?

Cri Certainly Socrates

Soc And Cleinias and I had arrived at the conclusion that knowledge of some kind is the only good

Cri Yes that was what you were saying

Soc All the other results of politics and they are many as for example wealth freedom tranquillity were neither good nor evil in themselves but the political science ought to make us wise and impart knowledge to us if that is the science which is likely to do us good and make us happy

Cri Yes that was the conclusion at which you had arrived according to your report of the conversation

Soc And does the kingly art make men wise and good?

Cri Why not Socrates?

Soc What, all men and in every respect? and teach them all the arts —carpentering and cobbling and the rest of them?

Cri I think not Socrates

Soc But then what is this knowledge and what are we to do with it? For it is not the source of any works which are neither good nor evil and gives no knowledge but the knowledge of itself what then can it be and what are we to do with it? Shall we say Crito that it is the knowledge by which we are to make other men good?

Cri By all means

Soc And in what will they be good and useful? Shall we repeat that they will make others good and that these others will make others again without ever determining in what they are to be good for we have put aside the results of politics as they are called This is the old old song over again and we are just as far as ever, if not farther from the knowledge of the art or science of happiness

Cri Indeed Socrates you do appear to have got into a great perplexity

Soc Thereupon Crito seeing that I was on the point of shipwreck [293] I lifted up my voice and earnestly entreated and called upon the strangers to save me and the youth from the whirlpool of the argument they were our Castor and Pollux I said and they should be serious and show us in sober earnest what that knowledge was which would enable us to pass the rest of our lives in happiness

Cri And did Euthydemus show you this knowledge?

Soc Yes indeed he proceeded in a lofty strain to the following effect Would you rather Socrates said he that I should show you this knowledge about which you have been doubting or shall I prove that you already have it?

What, I said are you blessed with such a power as this?

Indeed I am

Then I would much rather that you should prove me to have such a knowledge at my time of life that will be more agreeable than having to learn

Then tell me he said do you know anything?

Yes I said I know many things but not any thing of much importance

That will do he said And would you admit that anything is what it is and at the same time is not what it is?

Certainly not

And did you not say that you knew something?

I did

If you know you are knowing

Certainly of the knowledge which I have

That makes no difference —and must you not if you are knowing know all things?

Certainly not I said for there are many other things which I do not know

And if you do not know you are not knowing

Yes friend of that which I do not know

Still you are not knowing and you said just now that you were knowing and therefore you are and are not at the same time and in reference to the same things

A pretty clatter as men say Euthydemus this of yours! and will you explain how I possess that knowledge for which we were seeking? Do you mean to say that the same thing cannot be and also not be and therefore since I know one thing that I know all for I cannot be knowing and not knowing at the same time and if I know all things then I must have the knowledge for which we are seeking—May I assume this to be your ingenious notion?

Out of your own mouth, Socrates, you are convicted, he said.

Well, but, Euthydemus, I said, has that never happened to you? for if I am only in the same case with you and our beloved Dionysodorus, I cannot complain. Tell me, then, you two, do you not know some things, and not know others?

Certainly not, Socrates, said Dionysodorus.

What do you mean, I said; do you know nothing?

Nay, he replied, we do know something.

[294] Then, I said, you know all things, if you know anything?

Yes, all things, he said; and that is as true of you as of us.

O indeed, I said, what a wonderful thing, and what a great blessing! And do all other men know all things or nothing?

Certainly, he replied; they cannot know some things, and not know others, and be at the same time knowing and not knowing.

Then what is the inference? I said.

They all know all things, he replied, if they know one thing.

O heavens, Dionysodorus, I said, I see now that you are in earnest; hardly have I got you to that point. And do you really and truly know all things, including carpentering and leather-cutting?

Certainly, he said.

And do you know stitching?

Yes, by the gods, we do, and cobbling, too.

And do you know things such as the numbers of the stars and of the sand?

Certainly; did you think we should say no to that?

By Zeus, said Ctesippus, interrupting, I only wish that you would give me some proof which would enable me to know whether you speak truly.

What proof shall I give you? he said.

Will you tell me how many teeth Euthydemus has? and Euthydemus shall tell how many teeth you have.

Will you not take our word that we know all things?

Certainly not, said Ctesippus: you must further tell us this one thing, and then we shall know that you are speaking the truth; if you tell us the number, and we count them, and you are found to be right, we will believe the rest. They fancied that Ctesippus was making game of them, and they refused, and they would only say in answer to each of his questions, that they knew all things. For at last Ctesippus began to throw off all restraint; no question in fact was too bad for him; he would ask them if they knew the foulest things, and they, like wild boars, came rushing on his blows, and fearlessly replied that they did. At last, Crito, I too was carried away by my incredulity, and asked Euthydemus whether Dionysodorus could dance.

Certainly, he replied.

And can he vault among swords, and turn upon a wheel, at his age? has he got to such a height of skill as that?

He can do anything, he said.

And did you always know this?

Always, he said.

When you were children, and at your birth?

[295] They both said that they did.

This we could not believe. And Euthydemus said: You are incredulous, Socrates.

Yes, I said, and I might well be incredulous, if I did not know you to be wise men.

But if you will answer, he said, I will make you confess to similar marvels.

Well, I said, there is nothing that I should like better than to be self-convicted of this, for if I am really a wise man, which I never knew before, and you will prove to me that I know and have always known all things, nothing in life would be a greater gain to me.

Answer then, he said.

Ask, I said, and I will answer.

Do you know something, Socrates, or nothing?

Something, I said.

And do you know with what you know, or with something else?

With what I know; and I suppose that you mean with my soul?

Are you not ashamed, Socrates, of asking a question when you are asked one?

Well, I said; but then what am I to do? for I will do whatever you bid; when I do not know what you are asking, you tell me to answer nevertheless, and not to ask again.

Why, you surely have some notion of my meaning, he said.

Yes, I replied.

Well, then, answer according to your notion of my meaning.

Yes, I said; but if the question which you ask in one sense is understood and answered by me in another, will that please you—if I answer what is not to the point?

That will please me very well; but will not please you equally well, as I imagine.

I certainly will not answer unless I understand you I said

You will not answer he said according to your view of the meaning because you will be prating and are an ancient

Now I saw that he was getting angry with me for drawing distinctions when he wanted to catch me in his springes of words And I remembered that Connus was always angry with me when I opposed him and then he neglected me because he thought that I was stupid and as I was intending to go to Euthydemus as a pupil I reflected that I had better let him have his way as he might think me a blockhead and refuse to take me So I said You are a far better dialectician than myself Euthydemus for I have never made a profession of the art and therefore do as you say ask your questions once more and I will answer

Answer then he said again whether you know what you know with something or with nothing

Yes I said I know with my soul

[296] The man will answer more than the question for I did not ask you he said with what you know but whether you know with something

Again I replied Through ignorance I have answered too much but I hope that you will forgive me And now I will answer simply that I always know what I know with something

And is that something he rejoined always the same or sometimes one thing and sometimes another thing?

Always I replied when I know I know with this

Will you not cease adding to your answers?

My fear is that this word always may get us into trouble

You perhaps but certainly not us And now answer Do you always know with this?

Always since I am required to withdraw the words when I know

You always know with this or always knowing do you know some things with this and some things with something else or do you know all things with this?

All that I know I replied I know with this

There again Socrates he said the addition is superfluous

Well then I said I will take away the words that I know

Nay, take nothing away I desire no favours of you but let me ask Would you be able to know all things if you did not know all things?

Quite impossible.

And now he said you may add on whatever you like, for you confess that you know all things

I suppose that is true I said if my qualification implied in the words that I know is not allowed to stand and so I do know all things.

And have you not admitted that you always know all things with that which you know whether you make the addition of when you know them or not? for you have acknowledged that you have always and at once known all things that is to say when you were a child, and at your birth and when you were growing up and before you were born and before the heaven and earth existed you knew all things, if you always know them and I swear that you shall always continue to know all things if I am of the mind to make you

But I hope that you will be of that mind reverend Euthydemus I said if you are really speaking the truth and yet I a little doubt your power to make good your words unless you have the help of your brother Dionysodorus then you may do it Tell me now both of you for although in the main I cannot doubt that I really do know all things when I am told so by men of your prodigious wisdom—how can I say that I know such things Euthydemus as that the good are unjust come do I know that or not?

Certainly you know that

What do I know?

That the good are not unjust

[297] Quite true I said and that I have always known but the question is where did I learn that the good are unjust?

Nowhere said Dionysodorus

Then I said I do not know this

You are ruining the argument said Euthydemus to Dionysodorus he will be proved not to know and then after all he will be knowing and not knowing at the same time

Dionysodorus blushed

I turned to the other and said What do you think Euthydemus? Does not your omniscient brother appear to you to have made a mistake?

What replied Dionysodorus in a moment am I the brother of Euthydemus?

Thereupon I said Please not to interrupt my good friend or prevent Euthydemus from proving to me that I know the good to be unjust such a lesson you might at least allow me to learn

You are running away Socrates said Dionysodorus and refusing to answer

No wonder I said for I am not a match for one of you, and a fortiori I must run away from two. I am no Heracles; and even Heracles could not fight against the Hydra, who was a she-Sophist, and had the wit to shoot up many new heads when one of them was cut off; especially when he saw a second monster of a sea-crab, who was also a Sophist, and appeared to have newly arrived from a sea-voyage, bearing down upon him from the left, opening his mouth and biting. When the monster was growing troublesome he called Iolaus, his nephew, to his help, who ably succoured him; but if my Iolaus, who is my brother Patrocles [the statuary], were to come, he would only make a bad business worse.

And now that you have delivered yourself of this strain, said Dionysodorus, will you inform me whether Iolaus was the nephew of Heracles any more than he is yours?

I suppose that I had best answer you, Dionysodorus, I said, for you will insist on asking—that I pretty well know—out of envy, in order to prevent me from learning the wisdom of Euthydemus.

Then answer me, he said.

Well then, I said, I can only reply that Iolaus was not my nephew at all, but the nephew of Heracles; and his father was not my brother Patrocles, but Iphicles, who has a name rather like his, and was the brother of Heracles.

And is Patrocles, he said, your brother?

Yes, I said, he is my half-brother, the son of my mother, but not of my father.

Then he is and is not your brother.

Not by the same father, my good man, I said, for Chaeredemus was his father, and mine was Sophroniscus.

And was Sophroniscus a father, and Chaeredemus also?

Yes, I said; the former was my father, and the latter his.

[298] Then, he said, Chaeredemus is not a father.

He is not my father, I said.

But can a father be other than a father? or are you the same as a stone?

I certainly do not think that I am a stone, I said, though I am afraid that you may prove me to be one.

Are you not other than a stone?

I am.

And being other than a stone, you are not a stone; and being other than gold, you are not gold?

Very true.

And so Chaeredemus, he said, being other than a father, is not a father?

I suppose that he is not a father, I replied.

For if, said Euthydemus, taking up the argument, Chaeredemus is a father, then Sophroniscus, being other than a father, is not a father; and you, Socrates, are without a father.

Ctesippus, here taking up the argument, said: And is not your father in the same case, for he is other than my father?

Assuredly not, said Euthydemus.

Then he is the same?

He is the same.

I cannot say that I like the connection; but is he only my father, Euthydemus, or is he the father of all other men?

Of all other men, he replied. Do you suppose the same person to be a father and not a father?

Certainly I did so imagine, said Ctesippus.

And do you suppose that gold is not gold, or that a man is not a man?

They are not "in pari materia," Euthydemus, said Ctesippus, and you had better take care, for it is monstrous to suppose that your father is the father of all.

But he is, he replied.

What, of men only, said Ctesippus, or of horses and of all other animals?

Of all, he said.

And your mother, too, is the mother of all?

Yes, our mother too.

Yes; and your mother has a progeny of sea-urchins then?

Yes; and yours, he said.

And gudgeons and puppies and pigs are your brothers?

And yours too.

And your papa is a dog?

And so is yours, he said.

If you will answer my questions, said Dionysodorus, I will soon extract the same admissions from you, Ctesippus. You say that you have a dog.

Yes, a villain of a one, said Ctesippus.

And he has puppies?

Yes, and they are very like himself.

And the dog is the father of them?

Yes, he said, I certainly saw him and the mother of the puppies come together.

And is he not yours?

To be sure he is.

Then he is a father, and he is yours; ergo, he is your father, and the puppies are your brothers.

Let me ask you one little question more, said Dionysodorus, quickly interposing, in order that Ctesippus might not get in his word: You beat this dog?

Ctesippus said laughing Indeed I do and I only wish that I could beat you instead of him

[299] Then you beat your father he said

I should have far more reason to beat yours said Ctesippus what could he have been thinking of when he begat such wise sons? much good has this father of you and your brethren the puppies got out of this wisdom of yours

But neither he nor you, Ctesippus have any need of much good

And have you no need Euthydemus? he said

Neither I nor any other man for tell me now Ctesippus if you think it good or evil for a man who is sick to drink medicine when he wants it or to go to war armed rather than unarmed

Good I say And yet I know that I am going to be caught in one of your charming puzzles

That he replied you will discover if you answer since you admit medicine to be good for a man to drink when wanted must it not be good for him to drink as much as possible when he takes his medicine a cartload of hellebore will not be too much for him?

Ctesippus said Quite so Euthydemus that is to say if he who drinks is as big as the statue of Delphi

And seeing that in war to have arms is a good thing he ought to have as many spears and shields as possible?

Very true said Ctesippus and do you think Euthydemus that he ought to have one shield only and one spear?

I do

And would you arm Geryon and Briareus in that way? Considering that you and your companion fight in armour I thought that you would have known better Here Euthydemus held his peace but Dionysodorus returned to the previous answer of Ctesippus and said —

Do you not think that the possession of gold is a good thing?

Yes said Ctesippus and the more the better

And to have money everywhere and always is a good?

Certainly a great good he said

And you admit gold to be a good?

Certainly he replied

And ought not a man then to have gold everywhere and always and as much as possible in himself and may he not be deemed the happiest of men who has three talents of gold in his belly and a talent in his pate and a stater of gold in either eye?

Yes Euthydemus said Ctesippus and the Scythians reckon those who have gold in their own skulls to be the happiest and bravest of men (that is only another instance of your manner of speaking about the dog and father) and what is still more extraordinary, they drink out of their own skulls gilt and see the inside of them and hold their own head in their hands

[300] And do the Scythians and others see that which has the quality of vision or that which has not? said Euthydemus

That which has the quality of vision clearly

And you also see that which has the quality of vision? he said

Yes I do

Then do you see our garments?

Yes

Then our garments have the quality of vision

They can see to any extent said Ctesippus

What can they see?

Nothing but you my sweet man may perhaps imagine that they do not see and certainly Euthydemus you do seem to me to have been caught napping when you were not asleep and that if it be possible to speak and say nothing—you are doing so

And may there not be a silence of the speaker? said Dionysodorus

Impossible said Ctesippus

Or a speaking of the silent?

That is still more impossible he said

But when you speak of stones wood iron bars do you not speak of the silent?

Not when I pass a smithy for then the iron bars make a tremendous noise and outcry if they are touched so that here your wisdom is strangely mistaken please however to tell me how you can be silent when speaking (I thought that Ctesippus was put upon his mettle because Cleinias was present)

When you are silent, said Euthydemus is there not a silence of all things?

Yes he said

But if speaking things are included in all things then the speaking are silent

What said Ctesippus then all things are not silent?

Certainly not said Euthydemus

Then my good friend do they all speak?

[1] Note the ambiguity of δ τὰ ὁρ 'things visible and able to see σ γω α λέγ the speaking of the silent the silent denoting either the speaker or the subject of the speech cannot be perfectly rendered in English. Compare Aristotle Sophistical Refutations iv 166 12-14.

Yes, those which speak.

Nay, said Ctesippus, but the question which I ask is whether all things are silent or speak?

Neither and both, said Dionysodorus, quickly interposing; I am sure that you will be "non-plussed" at that answer.

Here Ctesippus, as his manner was, burst into a roar of laughter; he said, That brother of yours, Euthydemus, has got into a dilemma; all is over with him. This delighted Cleinias, whose laughter made Ctesippus ten times as uproarious; but I cannot help thinking that the rogue must have picked up this answer from them; for there has been no wisdom like theirs in our time. Why do you laugh, Cleinias, I said, at such solemn and beautiful things?

Why, Socrates, said Dionysodorus, did you ever see a beautiful thing?

Yes, Dionysodorus, I replied, I have seen many.

[301] Were they other than the beautiful, or the same as the beautiful?

Now I was in a great quandary at having to answer this question, and I thought that I was rightly served for having opened my mouth at all: I said however, They are not the same as absolute beauty, but they have beauty present with each of them.

And are you an ox because an ox is present with you, or are you Dionysodorus, because Dionysodorus is present with you?

God forbid, I replied.

But how, he said, by reason of one thing being present with another, will one thing be another?

Is that your difficulty? I said. For I was beginning to imitate their skill, on which my heart was set.

Of course, he replied, I and all the world are in a difficulty about the non-existent.

What do you mean, Dionysodorus? I said. Is not the honourable honourable and the base base?

That, he said, is as I please.

And do you please?

Yes, he said.

And you will admit that the same is the same, and the other other; for surely the other is not the same; I should imagine that even a child will hardly deny the other to be other. But I think, Dionysodorus, that you must have intentionally missed the last question; for in general you and your brother seem to me to be good workmen in your own department, and to do the dialectician's business excellently well.

What, said he, is the business of a good workman? tell me, in the first place, whose business is hammering?

The smith's.

And whose the making of pots?

The potter's.

And who has to kill and skin and mince and boil and roast?

The cook, I said.

And if a man does his business he does rightly?

Certainly.

And the business of the cook is to cut up and skin; you have admitted that?

Yes, I have admitted that, but you must not be too hard upon me.

Then if some one were to kill, mince, boil, roast the cook, he would do his business, and if he were to hammer the smith, and make a pot of the potter, he would do their business.

Poseidon, I said, this is the crown of wisdom; can I ever hope to have such wisdom of my own?

And would you be able, Socrates, to recognize this wisdom when it has become your own?

Certainly, I said, if you will allow me.

What, he said, do you think that you know what is your own?

Yes, I do, subject to your correction; for you are the bottom, and Euthydemus is the top, of all my wisdom.

Is not that which you would deem your own, he said, that which you have in your own power, and which you are able to use as you would desire, [302] for example, an ox or a sheep—would you not think that which you could sell and give and sacrifice to any god whom you pleased, to be your own, and that which you could not give or sell or sacrifice you would think not to be in your own power?

Yes, I said (for I was certain that something good would come out of the questions, which I was impatient to hear); yes, such things, and such things only are mine.

Yes, he said, and you would mean by animals living beings?

Yes, I said.

You agree then, that those animals only are yours with which you have the power to do all these things which I was just naming?

I agree.

Then, after a pause, in which he seemed to be lost in the contemplation of something great, he said: Tell me, Socrates, have you an ancestral Zeus? Here, anticipating the final move, like a person caught in a net, who gives a des-

What a miserable man you must be then he said you are not an Athenian at all if you have no ancestral gods or temples or any other mark of gentility

Nay Dionysodorus I said do not be rough good words if you please in the way of religion I have altars and temples domestic and ancestral and all that other Athenians have

And have not other Athenians he said an ancestral Zeus?

That name, I said is not to be found among the Ionians whether colonists or citizens of Athens an ancestral Apollo there is who is the father of Ion and a family Zeus and a Zeus guardian of the phratry and an Athene guardian of the phratry But the name of ancestral Zeus is unknown to us

No matter said Dionysodorus for you admit that you have Apollo Zeus and Athene

Certainly I said

And they are your gods he said

Yes I said my lords and ancestors

At any rate they are yours he said did you not admit that?

I did I said what is going to happen to me?

And are not these gods animals? for you admit that all things which have life are animals and have not these gods life?

They have life I said

Then are they not animals?

They are animals I said

And you admitted that of animals those are yours which you could give away or sell or offer in sacrifice as you pleased?

I did admit that Euthydemus and I have no way of escape

[303] Well then said he if you admit that Zeus and the other gods are yours can you sell them or give them away or do what you will with them as you would with other animals?

At this I was quite struck dumb Crito and lay prostrate Ctesippus came to the rescue

Bravo Heracles brave words said he

Bravo Heracles or is Heracles a Bravo? said Dionysodorus

Poseidon said Ctesippus what awful distinctions I will have no more of them the pair are invincible

Then my dear Crito there was universal applause of the speakers and their words and what with laughing and clapping of hands and rejoicings the two men were quite overpowered for hitherto their partisans only had cheered at each successive hit, but now the whole company shouted with delight until the columns of the Lyceum returned the sound, seeming to sympathize in their joy To such a pitch was I affected myself that I made a speech in which I acknowledged that I had never seen the like of their wisdom I was their devoted servant and fell to praising and admiring of them What marvellous dexterity of wit, I said enabled you to acquire this great perfection in such a short time? There is much indeed to admire in your words Euthydemus and Dionysodorus but there is nothing that I admire more than your magnanimous disregard of any opinion—whether of the many or of the grave and reverend seigniors—you regard only those who are like yourselves And I do verily believe that there are few who are like you and who would approve of such arguments the majority of mankind are so ignorant of their value that they would be more ashamed of employing them in the refutation of others than of being refuted by them I must further express my approval of your kind and public spirited denial of all differences whether of good and evil white or black or any other the result of which is that as you say every mouth is sewn up not excepting your own which graciously follows the example of others and thus all ground of offence is taken away But what appears to me to be more than all is that this art and invention of yours has been so admirably contrived by you that in a very short time it can be imparted to any one I observed that Ctesippus learned to imitate you in no time [304] Now this quickness of attainment is an excellent thing but at the same time I would advise you not to have any more public entertainments there is a danger that men may undervalue an art which they have so easy an opportunity of acquiring the exhibition would be best of all if the discussion were confined to your two selves but if there must be an audience let him only be present who is willing to pay a handsome fee —you should be careful of this —and if you are wise you will also bid your disciples discourse with no man but you and themselves For only what is rare is valuable and water which as Pindar says is the best of all things is also the cheapest And now I have only to request that you will receive Cleinias and me among your pupils

Such was the discussion Crito and after a few more words had passed between us we went away I hope that you will come to them with me since they say that they are able to teach any one who will give them money no age or want of capacity is an impediment And I must repeat one thing which they said for your especial benefit,—that the learning of their art did not at all interfere with the business of money making

Cri Truly Socrates though I am curious and ready to learn yet I fear that I am not like minded with Euthydemus, but one of the other sort, who as you were saying would rather be refuted by such arguments than use them in refutation of others And though I may appear ridiculous in venturing to advise you I think that you may as well hear what was said to me by a man of very considerable pretensions—he was a professor of legal oratory—who came away from you while I was walking up and down Crito said he to me, are you giving no attention to these wise men? No indeed I said to him I could not get within hearing of them—there was such a crowd You would have heard something worth hearing if you had What was that? I said You would have heard the greatest masters of the art of rhetoric discoursing "And what did you think of them? I said What did I think of them? he said — theirs was the sort of discourse which anybody might hear from men who were playing the fool and making much ado about nothing That was the expression which he used Surely I said philosophy is a charming thing [305] Charming! he said what simplicity! philosophy is nought and I think that if you had been present you would have been ashamed of your friend—his conduct was so very strange in placing himself at the mercy of men who care not what they say and fasten upon every word And these, as I was telling you are supposed to be the most eminent professors of their time But the truth is, Crito that the study itself and the men themselves are utterly mean and ridiculous Now censure of the pursuit, Socrates whether coming from him or from others, appears to me to be undeserved but as to the impropriety of holding a public discussion with such men there, I confess that, in my opinion he was in the right

Soc O Crito they are marvellous men but what was I going to say? First of all let me know —What manner of man was he who came up to you and censured philosophy was he an orator who himself practises in the courts or an instructor of orators, who makes the speeches with which they do battle?

Cri He was certainly not an orator and I doubt whether he had ever been into court but they say that he knows the business and is a clever man and composes wonderful speeches

Soc Now I understand Crito he is one of an amphibious class whom I was on the point of mentioning—one of those whom Prodicus describes as on the border ground between philosophers and statesmen—they think that they are the wisest of all men, and that they are generally esteemed the wisest nothing but the rivalry of the philosophers stands in their way and they are of the opinion that if they can prove the philosophers to be good for nothing no one will dispute their title to the palm of wisdom for that they are themselves really the wisest, although they are apt to be mauled by Euthydemus and his friends, when they get hold of them in conversation This opinion which they entertain of their own wisdom is very natural for they have a certain amount of philosophy and a certain amount of political wisdom there is reason in what they say for they argue that they have just enough of both and so they keep out of the way of all risks and conflicts and reap the fruits of their wisdom

Cri What do you say of them Socrates? There is certainly something specious in that notion of theirs

Soc Yes, Crito there is more speciousness than truth they cannot be made to understand the nature of intermediates [306] For all persons or things which are intermediate between two other things and participate in both of them—if one of these two things is good and the other evil are better than the one and worse than the other but if they are in a mean between two good things which do not tend to the same end they fall short of either of their component elements in the attainment of their ends Only in the case when the two component elements which do not tend to the same end are evil is the participant better than either Now if philosophy and political action are both good but tend to different ends and they participate in both and are in a mean between them then they are talking nonsense, for they are worse than either or if the one be good and the other evil they are better than the one and worse than the other only on the supposition that they are both evil could there be any truth in what they say I do not think that they will admit that their two pursuits are either wholly or partly evil but the truth is, that these philosopher politicians who aim at both fall short of both in the attainment of their respective ends and are really third although they would perate twist that he may get away I said No Dionysodorus I have not

What a miserable man you must be then he said you are not an Athenian at all if you have no ancestral gods or temples or any other mark of gentility

Nay Dionysodorus I said do not be rough good words if you please in the way of religion I have altars and temples domestic and ancestral and all that other Athenians have teach any one who will give them money; no age or want of capacity is an impediment. And I must repeat one thing which they said, for your especial benefit,—that the learning of their art did not at all interfere with the business of money-making.

And have not other Athenians he said an ancestral Zeus?

Cri. Truly, Socrates, though I am curious and ready to learn, yet I fear that I am not like-minded with Euthydemus, but one of the other sort, who, as you were saying, would rather be refuted by such arguments than use them in refutation of others. And though I may appear ridiculous in venturing to advise you, I think that you may as well hear what was said to me by a man of very considerable pretensions—he was a professor of legal oratory—who came away from you while I was walking up and down. "Crito," said he to me, "are you giving no attention to these wise men?" "No, indeed," I said to him; "I could not get within hearing of them—there was such a crowd." "You would have heard something worth hearing if you had." "What was that?" I said. "You would have heard the greatest masters of the art of rhetoric discoursing." "And what did you think of them?" I said. "What did I think of them?" he said:—"theirs was the sort of discourse which anybody might hear from men who were playing the fool, and making much ado about nothing." That was the expression which he used. "Surely," I said, "philosophy is a charming thing." [305] "Charming!" he said; "what simplicity! philosophy is nought; and I think that if you had been present you would have been ashamed of your friend—his conduct was so very strange in placing himself at the mercy of men who care not what they say, and fasten upon every word. And these, as I was telling you, are supposed to be the most eminent professors of their time. But the truth is, Crito, that the study itself and the men themselves are utterly mean and ridiculous." Now censure of the pursuit, Socrates, whether coming from him or from others, appears to me to be undeserved; but as to the impropriety of holding a public discussion with such men, there, I confess that, in my opinion, he was in the right.

Soc. O Crito, they are marvellous men; but what was I going to say? First of all let me know;—What manner of man was he who came up to you and censured philosophy; was he an orator who himself practises in the courts, or an instructor of orators, who makes the speeches with which they do battle?

Cri. He was certainly not an orator, and I doubt whether he had ever been into court; but they say that he knows the business, and is a clever man, and composes wonderful speeches.

Soc. Now I understand, Crito; he is one of an amphibious class, whom I was on the point of mentioning—one of those whom Prodicus describes as on the border-ground between philosophers and statesmen—they think that they are the wisest of all men, and that they are generally esteemed the wisest; nothing but the rivalry of the philosophers stands in their way; and they are of the opinion that if they can prove the philosophers to be good for nothing, no one will dispute their title to the palm of wisdom, for that they are themselves really the wisest, although they are apt to be mauled by Euthydemus and his friends, when they get hold of them in conversation. This opinion which they entertain of their own wisdom is very natural; for they have a certain amount of philosophy, and a certain amount of political wisdom; there is reason in what they say, for they argue that they have just enough of both, and so they keep out of the way of all risks and conflicts and reap the fruits of their wisdom.

Cri. What do you say of them, Socrates? There is certainly something specious in that notion of theirs.

Soc. Yes, Crito, there is more speciousness than truth; they cannot be made to understand the nature of intermediates. [306] For all persons or things, which are intermediate between two other things, and participate in both of them—if one of these two things is good and the other evil, are better than the one and worse than the other; but if they are in a mean between two good things which do not tend to the same end, they fall short of either of their component elements in the attainment of their ends. Only in the case when the two component elements which do not tend to the same end are evil is the participant better than either. Now, if philosophy and political action are both good, but tend to different ends, and they participate in both, and are in a mean between them, then they are talking nonsense, for they are worse than either; or, if the one be good and the other evil, they are better than the one and worse than the other; only on the supposition that they are both evil could there be any truth in what they say. I do not think that they will admit that their two pursuits are either wholly or partly evil; but the truth is, that these philosopher-politicians who aim at both fall short of both in the attainment of their respective ends, and are really third, although they would like to stand first There is no need however to be angry at this ambition of theirs—which may be forgiven for every man ought to be loved who says and manfully pursues and works out anything which is at all like wisdom at the same time we shall do well to see them as they really are

Cri I have often told you Socrates that I am in a constant difficulty about my two sons What am I to do with them? There is no hurry about the younger one who is only a child but the other Critobulus is getting on and needs some one who will improve him I cannot help thinking when I hear you talk that there is a sort of madness in many of our anxieties about our children —in the first place about marrying a wife of good family to be the mother of them and then about heaping up money for them—and yet taking no care about their education But then again when I contemplate any of those who pretend to educate others I am amazed To me if I am to confess the truth, [307] they all seem to be such outrageous beings so that I do not know how I can advise the youth to study philosophy

Soc Dear Crito do you not know that in every profession the inferior sort are numerous and good for nothing and the good are few and beyond all price for example are not gymnastic and rhetoric and money making and the art of the general noble arts?

Cri Certainly they are in my judgment

Soc Well and do you not see that in each of these arts the many are ridiculous performers?

Cri Yes indeed that is very true

Soc And will you on this account shun all these pursuits yourself and refuse to allow them to your son?

Cri That would not be reasonable Socrates

Soc Do you then be reasonable Crito and do not mind whether the teachers of philosophy are good or bad but think only of philosophy herself Try and examine her well and truly and if she be evil seek to turn away all men from her and not your sons only but if she be what I believe that she is then follow her and serve her you and your house as the saying is and be of good cheer

CRATYLUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES, HERMOGENES, CRATYLUS

[383] Hermogenes SUPPOSE that we make Socrates a party to the argument?

Cratylus If you please.

Her I should explain to you, Socrates, that our friend Cratylus has been arguing about names he says that they are natural and not conventional not a portion of the human voice which men agree to use but that there is a truth or correctness in them, which is the same for Hellenes as for barbarians. Whereupon I ask him, whether his own name of Cratylus is a true name or not, and he answers "Yes." And Socrates? "Yes." Then every man's name, as I tell him, is that which he is called. To this he replies— "If all the world were to call you Hermogenes, that would not be your name." And when I am anxious to have a further explanation he is ironical and mysterious, [384] and seems to imply that he has a notion of his own about the matter if he would only tell and could entirely convince me, if he chose to be intelligible. Tell me, Socrates, what this oracle means or rather tell me, if you will be so good, what is your own view of the truth or correctness of names, which I would far sooner hear.

Socrates Son of Hipponicus, there is an ancient saying, that "hard is the knowledge of the good." And the knowledge of names is a great part of knowledge. If I had not been poor I might have heard the fifty-drachma course of the great Prodicus, which is a complete education in grammar and language—these are his own words—and then I should have been at once able to answer your question about the correctness of names. But, indeed, I have only heard the single-drachma course, and therefore, I do not know the truth about such matters I will, however gladly assist you and Cratylus in the investigation of them When he declares that your name is not really Hermogenes, I suspect that he is only making fun of you —he means to say that you are no true son of Hermes, because you are always looking after a fortune and never in luck. But, as I was saying there is a good deal of difficulty in this sort of knowledge, and therefore we had better leave the question open until we have heard both sides.

Her I have often talked over this matter both with Cratylus and others, and cannot convince myself that there is any principle of correctness in names other than convention and agreement any name which you give, in my opinion, is the right one, and if you change that and give another the new name is as correct as the old—we frequently change the names of our slaves, and the newly imposed name is as good as the old for there is no name given to anything by nature all is convention and habit of the users —such is my view But if I am mistaken I shall be happy to hear and learn of Cratylus, or of any one else.

[385] Soc I dare say that you be right, Hermogenes let us see —Your meaning is, that the name of each thing is only that which any body agrees to call it?

Her That is my notion.

Soc Whether the giver of the name be an individual or a city?

Her Yes.

Soc Well, now let me take an instance — suppose that I call a man a horse or a horse a man, you mean to say that a man will be rightly called a horse by me individually and rightly called a man by the rest of the world and a horse again would be rightly called a man by me and a horse by the world —that is your meaning?

Her He would according to my view

Soc But how about truth then? you would acknowledge that there is in words a true and a false?

Her Certainly

Soc And there are true and false propositions?

Her To be sure

Soc And a true proposition says that which is and a false proposition says that which is not?

Her Yes what other answer is possible?

Soc Then in a proposition there is a true and false?

Her Certainly

Soc But is a proposition true as a whole only and are the parts untrue?

Her No the parts are true as well as the whole

Soc Would you say the large parts and not the smaller ones or every part?

Her I should say that every part is true

Soc Is a proposition resolvable into any part smaller than a name?

Her No that is the smallest

Soc Then the name is a part of the true proposition?

Her Yes

Soc Yes, and a true part as you say

Her Yes

Soc And is not the part of a falsehood also a falsehood?

Her Yes

Soc Then if propositions may be true and false names may be true and false?

Her So we must infer

Soc And the name of anything is that which any one affirms to be the name?

Her Yes

Soc And will there be so many names of each thing as everybody says that there are? and will they be true names at the time of uttering them?

Her Yes Socrates I can conceive no correctness of names other than this you give one name and I another and in different cities and countries there are different names for the same things Hellenes differ from barbarians in their use of names, and the several Hellenic tribes from one another

Soc But would you say Hermogenes that the things differ as the names differ? [386] and are they relative to individuals as Protagoras tells us? For he says that man is the measure of all things and that things are to me as they appear to me and that they are to you as they appear to you Do you agree with him or would you say that things have a permanent essence of their own?

Her There have been times Socrates when I have been driven in my perplexity to take refuge with Protagoras not that I agree with him at all

Soc What! have you ever been driven to admit that there was no such thing as a bad man?

Her No indeed but I have often had reason to think that there are very bad men and a good many of them

Soc Well and have you ever found any very good ones?

Her Not many

Soc Still you have found them?

Her Yes

Soc And would you hold that the very good were the very wise and the very evil very foolish? Would that be your view?

Her It would

Soc But if Protagoras is right and the truth is that things are as they appear to any one how can some of us be wise and some of us foolish?

Her Impossible

Soc And if on the other hand wisdom and folly are really distinguishable you will allow I think that the assertion of Protagoras can hardly be correct For if what appears to each man is true to him one man cannot in reality be wiser than another

Her He cannot

Soc Nor will you be disposed to say with Euthydemus that all things equally belong to all men at the same moment and always for neither on his view can there be some good and other bad if virtue and vice are always equally to be attributed to all

Her There cannot

Soc But if neither is right and things are not relative to individuals and all things do not equally belong to all at the same moment and always they must be supposed to have their own proper and permanent essence they are not in relation to us or influenced by us, fluctuating according to our fancy but they are independent and maintain to their own essence the relation prescribed by nature

Her I think Socrates that you have said the truth

Soc Does what I am saying apply only to the things themselves, or equally to the actions which proceed from them? Are not actions also a class of being?

Her Yes, the actions are real as well as the things.

[387] Soc Then the actions also are done according to their proper nature, and not according to our opinion of them? In cutting for example, we do not cut as we please, and with any chance instrument but we cut with the proper instrument only and according to the natural process of cutting and the natural process is right and will succeed, but any other will fail and be of no use at all.

Her I should say that the natural way is the right way

Soc Again, in burning not every way is the right way but the right way is the natural way and the right instrument the natural instrument.

Her True.

Soc And this holds good of all actions?

Her Yes.

Soc And speech is a kind of action?

Her True.

Soc And will a man speak correctly who speaks as he pleases? Will not the successful speaker rather be he who speaks in the natural way of speaking and as things ought to be spoken, and with the natural instrument? Any other mode of speaking will result in error and failure.

Her I quite agree with you.

Soc And is not naming a part of speaking? for in giving names men speak.

Her That is true

Soc And if speaking is a sort of action and has a relation to acts, is not naming also a sort of action?

Her True.

Soc And we saw that actions were not relative to ourselves, but had a special nature of their own?

Her Precisely

Soc Then the argument would lead us to infer that names ought to be given according to a natural process, and with a proper instrument, and not at our pleasure in this and no other way shall we name with success

Her I agree

Soc But again that which has to be cut has to be cut with something?

Her Yes.

Soc And that which has to be woven or pierced has to be woven or pierced with something?

Her Certainly

Soc And that which has to be named has to be named with something?

Her True

Soc What is that with which we pierce?

Her An awl

[388] Soc And with which we weave?

Her A shuttle.

Soc And with which we name?

Her A name.

Soc Very good then a name is an instrument?

Her Certainly

Soc Suppose that I ask "What sort of instrument is a shuttle?" And you answer "A weaving instrument."

Her Well

Soc And I ask again "What do we do when we weave?"—The answer is, that we separate or disengage the warp from the woof

Her Very true.

Soc And may not a similar description be given of an awl and of instruments in general?

Her To be sure.

Soc And now suppose that I ask a similar question about names will you answer me? Regarding the name as an instrument what do we do when we name?

Her I cannot say

Soc Do we not give information to one another and distinguish things according to their natures?

Her Certainly we do

Soc Then a name is an instrument of teaching and of distinguishing natures, as the shuttle is of distinguishing the threads of the web

Her Yes.

Soc And the shuttle is the instrument of the weaver?

Her Assuredly

Soc Then the weaver will use the shuttle well—and well means like a weaver? and the teacher will use the name well—and well means like a teacher?

Her Yes.

Soc And when the weaver uses the shuttle whose work will he be using well?

Her That of the carpenter

Soc And is every man a carpenter or the skilled only?

Her Only the skilled

Soc And when the piercer uses the awl whose work will he be using well?

Her That of the smith.

Soc And is every man a smith or only the skilled?

Her The skilled only

Soc And when the teacher uses the name, whose work will he be using?

Her There again I am puzzled

Soc Cannot you at least say who gives us the names which we use?

Her Indeed I cannot

Soc Does not the law seem to you to give us them?

Her Yes I suppose so

Soc Then the teacher when he gives us a name uses the work of the legislator?

Her I agree

Soc And is every man a legislator or the skilled only?

Her The skilled only

Soc Then Hermogenes not every man is able to give a name but only a maker of names [389] and this is the legislator, who of all skilled artisans in the world is the rarest

Her True

Soc And how does the legislator make names? and to what does he look? Consider this in the light of the previous instances to what does the carpenter look in making the shuttle? Does he not look to that which is naturally fitted to act as a shuttle?

Her Certainly

Soc And suppose the shuttle to be broken in making will he make another looking to the broken one? or will he look to the form according to which he made the other?

Her To the latter I should imagine

Soc Might not that be justly called the true or ideal shuttle?

Her I think so

Soc And whatever shuttles are wanted for the manufacture of garments thin or thick of flaxen woollen or other material ought all of them to have the true form of the shuttle and whatever is the shuttle best adapted to each kind of work that ought to be the form which the maker produces in each case

Her Yes

Soc And the same holds of other instruments when a man has discovered the instrument which is naturally adapted to each work he must express this natural form and not others which he fancies in the material what ever it may be which he employs for example he ought to know how to put into iron the forms of awls adapted by nature to their several uses?

Her Certainly

Soc And how to put into wood forms of shuttles adapted by nature to their uses?

Her True

Soc For the several forms of shuttles naturally answer to the several kinds of webs and this is true of instruments in general

Her Yes

Soc Then as to names ought not our legislator also to know how to put the true natural names of each thing into sounds and syllables and to make and give all names with a view to the ideal name, if he is to be a namer in any true sense? And we must remember that different legislators will not use the same syllables For neither does every smith although he may be making the same instrument for the same purpose make them all of the same iron The form must be the same but the material may vary and still the instrument may be equally good of whatever iron made whether in Hellas or in a foreign country [390]—there is no difference

Her Very true

Soc And the legislator whether he be Hellene or barbarian is not therefore to be deemed by you a worse legislator provided he gives the true and proper form of the name in whatever syllables this or that country makes no matter

Her Quite true

Soc But who then is to determine whether the proper form is given to the shuttle whatever sort of wood may be used? the carpenter who makes or the weaver who is to use them?

Her I should say he who is to use them, Socrates

Soc And who uses the work of the lyre maker? Will not he be the man who knows how to direct what is being done and who will know also whether the work is being well done or not?

Her Certainly

Soc And who is he?

Her The player of the lyre

Soc And who will direct the shipwright?

Her The pilot

Soc And who will be best able to direct the legislator in his work and will know whether the work is well done in this or any other country? Will not the user be the man?

Her Yes

Soc And this is he who knows how to ask questions?

Her Yes

Soc And how to answer them?

Her Yes

Soc And him who knows how to ask and answer you would call a dialectician?

Her Yes that would be his name.

Soc Then the work of the carpenter is to make a rudder and the pilot has to direct him, if the rudder is to be well made.

Her True.

Soc And the work of the legislator is to give names, and the dialectician must be his director if the names are to be rightly given?

Her That is true.

Soc Then, Hermogenes, I should say that this giving of names can be no such light matter as you fancy or the work of light or chance persons and Cratylus is right in saying that things have names by nature, and that not every man is an artificer of names, but he only who looks to the name which each thing by nature has, and is able to express the true forms of things in letters and syllables.

Her I cannot answer you, Socrates but I find a difficulty in changing my opinion all in a moment, [391] and I think that I should be more readily persuaded, if you would show me what this is which you term the natural fitness of names.

Soc My good Hermogenes, I have none to show Was I not telling you just now (but you have forgotten) that I knew nothing and proposing to share the enquiry with you? But now that you and I have talked over the matter a step has been gained for we have discovered that names have by nature a truth, and that not every man knows how to give a thing a name.

Her Very good.

Soc And what is the nature of this truth or correctness of names? That, if you care to know is the next question.

Her Certainly I care to know

Soc Then reflect.

Her How shall I reflect?

Soc The true way is to have the assistance of those who know and you must pay them well both in money and in thanks these are the Sophists, of whom your brother Callias has—rather dearly—bought the reputation of wisdom. But you have not yet come into your inheritance, and therefore you had better go to him, and beg and entreat him to tell you what he has learnt from Protagoras about the fitness of names.

Her But how inconsistent should I be, if, whilst repudiating Protagoras and his Truth I were to attach any value to what he and his book affirm!

Truth was the title of the book of Protagoras cf. Theaetetus 16

Soc Then if you despise him, you must learn of Homer and the poets.

Her And where does Homer say anything about names, and what does he say?

Soc He often speaks of them notably and nobly in the places where he distinguishes the different names which Gods and men give to the same things. Does he not in these passages make a remarkable statement about the correctness of names? For the Gods must clearly be supposed to call things by their right and natural names do you not think so?

Her Why of course they call them rightly if they call them at all. But to what are you referring?

Soc Do you not know what he says about the river in Troy who had a single combat with Hephaestus?

> Whom the Gods call Xanthus and men call Scamander

[392] Her I remember

Soc Well and about this river—to know that he ought to be called Xanthus and not Scamander—is not that a solemn lesson? Or about the bird which, as he says,

> The Gods call Chalcis and men Cymindis

to be taught how much more correct the name Chalcis is than the name Cymindis—do you deem that a light matter? Or about Batieia and Myrina? And there are many other observations of the same kind in Homer and other poets. Now I think that this is beyond the understanding of you and me but the names of Scamandrius and Astyanax, which he affirms to have been the names of Hector s son, are more within the range of human faculties, as I am disposed to think and what the poet means by correctness may be more readily apprehended in that instance you will remember I dare say the lines to which I refer

Her I do.

Soc Let me ask you, then, which did Homer think the more correct of the names given to Hector s son—Astyanax or Scamandrius?

Her I do not know

Soc How would you answer if you were asked whether the wise or the unwise are more likely to give correct names?

Her I should say the wise, of course

Soc And are the men or the women of a city taken as a class, the wiser?

Her I should say the men

Soc And Homer as you know says that the

Iliad vi. 402.

Trojan men called him Astyanax (king of the city) but if the men called him Astyanax the other name of Scamandrius could only have been given to him by the women

Her That may be inferred

Soc And must not Homer have imagined the Trojans to be wiser than their wives?

Her To be sure

Soc Then he must have thought Astyanax to be a more correct name for the boy than Scamandrius?

Her Clearly

Soc And what is the reason of this? Let us consider —does he not himself suggest a very good reason when he says

For he alone defended their city and long walls?

This appears to be a good reason for calling the son of the saviour king of the city which his father was saving as Homer observes

Her I see

Soc Why Hermogenes I do not as yet see myself and do you?

Her No indeed not I

[393] Soc But tell me friend did not Homer himself also give Hector his name?

Her What of that?

Soc The name appears to me to be very nearly the same as the name of Astyanax—both are Hellenic and a king (ἄναξ) and a holder (ἕκτωρ) have nearly the same meaning and are both descriptive of a king for a man is clearly the holder of that of which he is king he rules and owns and holds it But perhaps you may think that I am talking nonsense and indeed I believe that I myself did not know what I meant when I imagined that I had found some indication of the opinion of Homer about the correctness of names

Her I assure you that I think otherwise and I believe you to be on the right track

Soc There is reason I think in calling the lion s whelp a lion and the foal of a horse a horse I am speaking only of the ordinary course of nature when an animal produces after his kind and not of extraordinary births —if contrary to nature a horse have a calf then I should not call that a foal but a calf nor do I call any inhuman birth a man but only a natural birth And the same may be said of trees and other things Do you agree with me?

Her Yes I agree

Soc Very good But you had better watch me and see that I do not play tricks with you For on the same principle the son of a king is to be called a king And whether the syllables of the name are the same or not the same, makes no difference provided the meaning is retained nor does the addition or subtraction of a letter make any difference so long as the essence of the thing remains in possession of the name and appears in it

Her What do you mean?

Soc A very simple matter I may illustrate my meaning by the names of letters which you know are not the same as the letters themselves with the exception of the four ε ι ο ω the names of the rest whether vowels or consonants are made up of other letters which we add to them but so long as we introduce the meaning and there can be no mistake, the name of the letter is quite correct Take, for example the letter beta—the addition of η τ α, gives no offence and does not prevent the whole name from having the value which the legislator intended—so well did he know how to give the letters names

Her I believe you are right

Soc And may not the same be said of a king? a king will often be the son of a king [394] the good son or the noble son of a good or noble sire and similarly the offspring of every kind in the regular course of nature is like the parent and therefore has the same name Yet the syllables may be disguised until they appear different to the ignorant person and he may not recognize them although they are the same, just as any one of us would not recognize the same drugs under different disguises of colour and smell although to the physician who regards the power of them they are the same and he is not put out by the addition and in like manner the etymologist is not put out by the addition or transposition or subtraction of a letter or two or indeed by the change of all the letters for this need not interfere with the meaning As was just now said the names of Hector and Astyanax have only one letter alike which is the τ and yet they have the same meaning And how little in common with the letters of their names has Archepolis (ruler of the city) —and yet the meaning is the same And there are many other names which just mean king" Again there are several names for a general as for example Agis (leader) and Polemarchus (chief in war) and Eupolemus (good warrior) and others which denote a physician as Iatrocles (famous healer) and Acesimbrotus (curer of mortals) and there are many others which might be cited differing in their syllables and letters but having the same meaning Would you not say so?

Her Yes.

Soc The same names, then, ought to be assigned to those who follow in the course of nature?

Her Yes.

Soc And what of those who follow out of the course of nature, and are prodigies? for example, when a good and religious man has an irreligious son, he ought to bear the name not of his father but of the class to which he belongs, just as in the case which was before supposed of a horse foaling a calf

Her Quite true.

Soc Then the irreligious son of a religious father should be called irreligious?

Her Certainly

Soc He should not be called Theophilus (beloved of God) or Mnesitheus (mindful of God) or any of these names if names are correctly given, his should have an opposite meaning.

Her Certainly Socrates.

Soc Again, Hermogenes, there is Orestes the man of the mountains) who appears to be rightly called whether chance gave the name, or perhaps some poet who meant to express the brutality and fierceness and mountain wildness of his hero's nature.

[395] Her That is very likely Socrates.

Soc And his father's name is also according to nature.

Her Clearly

Soc Yes, for as his name, so also is his nature; Agamemnon (admirable for remaining) is one who is patient and persevering in the accomplishment of his resolves, and by his virtue crowns them and his continuance at Troy with all the vast army is a proof of that admirable endurance in him which is signified by the name Agamemnon. I also think that Atreus is rightly called for his murder of Chrysippus and his exceeding cruelty to Thyestes are damaging and destructive to his reputation—the name is a little altered and disguised so as not to be intelligible to every one, but to the etymologist there is no difficulty in seeing the meaning, for whether you think of him as ἀτειρής the stubborn, or as ἀτρεστος the fearless, or as ἀτηρός the destructive one, the name is perfectly correct in every point of view And I think that Pelops is also named appropriately for as the name implies, he is rightly called Pelops who sees what is near only (ὁ πέλας ὁρῶν)

Her How so?

Soc Because, according to the tradition, he had no forethought or foresight of all the evil which the murder of Myrtilus would entail upon his whole race in remote ages he saw only what was at hand and immediate,—or in other words, πέλας (near) in his eagerness to win Hippodamia by all means for his bride. Every one would agree that the name of Tantalus is rightly given and in accordance with nature, if the traditions about him are true.

Her And what are the traditions?

Soc Many terrible misfortunes are said to have happened to him in his life—last of all, came the utter ruin of his country and after his death he had the stone suspended (ταλαντεία) over his head in the world below—all this agrees wonderfully well with his name You might imagine that some person who wanted to call him ταλάντατος (the most weighted down by misfortune) disguised the name by altering it into Tantalus and into this form, by some accident of tradition, it has actually been transmitted. The name of Zeus, who is his alleged father [396] has also an excellent meaning, although hard to be understood, because really like a sentence, which is divided into two parts, for some call him Zena (Ζῆνα) and use the one half, and others who use the other half call him Dia (Δία) the two together signify the nature of the God, and the business of a name, as we were saying, is to express the nature. For there is none who is more the author of life to us and to all, than the lord and king of all. Wherefore we are right in calling him Zena and Dia, which are one name although divided, meaning the God through whom all creatures always have life (δι' ὃν ζῆν ἀεὶ πᾶσι τοῖς ζῶσιν ὑπάρχει) There is an irreverence, at first sight, in calling him son of Cronos (who is a proverb for stupidity) and we might rather expect Zeus to be the child of a mighty intellect. Which is the fact for this is the meaning of his father's name Κρόνος quasi Κόρος (κορέω, to sweep) not in the sense of a youth, but signifying τὸ καθαρὸν καὶ ἀκήρατον τοῦ νοῦ the pure and garnished mind (sc. ἀπὸ τοῦ κορεῖν) He, as we are informed by tradition, was begotten of Uranus, rightly so called (ἀπὸ τοῦ ὁρᾶν τὰ ἄνω) from looking upwards which, as philosophers tell us, is the way to have a pure mind, and the name Uranus is therefore correct. If I could remember the genealogy of Hesiod, I would have gone on and tried more conclusions of the same sort on the remoter ancestors of the Gods,—then I might have seen whether this wisdom, which has come to me all in an instant, I know not whence, will or will not hold good to the end.

Her You seem to me Socrates to be quite like a prophet newly inspired and to be uttering oracles

Soc Yes Hermogenes and I believe that I caught the inspiration from the great Euthyphro of the Prospaltian deme who gave me a long lecture which commenced at dawn he talked and I listened and his wisdom and enchanting ravishment has not only filled my ears but taken possession of my soul and to-day I shall let his superhuman power work and finish the investigation of names—that will be the way but to-morrow if you are so disposed, we will conjure him away and make a purgation of him if we can only find some priest or sophist who is skilled in purifications of this [397] sort

Her With all my heart for I am very curious to hear the rest of the enquiry about names

Soc Then let us proceed and where would you have us begin now that we have got a sort of outline of the enquiry? Are there any names which witness of themselves that they are not given arbitrarily but have a natural fitness? The names of heroes and of men in general are apt to be deceptive because they are often called after ancestors with whose names as we were saying they may have no business or they are the expression of a wish like Eutychides (the son of good fortune) or Sosias (the Saviour) or Theophilus (the beloved of God) and others But I think that we had better leave these for there will be more chance of finding correctness in the names of immutable essences — there ought to have been more care taken about them when they were named and perhaps there may have been some more than human power at work occasionally in giving them names

Her I think so Socrates

Soc Ought we not to begin with the consideration of the Gods and show that they are rightly named Gods?

Her Yes that will be well

Soc My notion would be something of this sort —I suspect that the sun moon earth stars and heaven which are still the Gods of many barbarians were the only Gods known to the aboriginal Hellenes Seeing that they were always moving and running from their running nature they were called Gods or runners (θεοὺς θέοντας) and when men became acquainted with the other Gods they proceeded to apply the same name to them all Do you think that likely?

Her I think it very likely indeed

Soc What shall follow the Gods?

Her Must not demons and heroes and man come next?

Soc Demons! And what do you consider to be the meaning of this word? Tell me if my view is right

Her Let me hear

Soc You know how Hesiod uses the word?

Her I do not

Soc Do you not remember that he speaks of a golden race of men who came first?

Her Yes I do

Soc He says of them—

But now that fate has closed over this race
They are holy demons upon the earth
Beneficent averters of ills guardians of mortal men

[398] Her What is the inference?

Soc What is the inference! Why I suppose that he means by the golden men, not men literally made of gold but good and noble and I am convinced of this because he further says that we are the iron race

Her That is true

Soc And do you not suppose that good men of our own day would by him be said to be of golden race?

Her Very likely

Soc And are not the good wise?

Her Yes they are wise

Soc And therefore I have the most entire conviction that he called them demons because they were δαήμονες (knowing or wise) and in our older Attic dialect the word itself occurs Now he and other poets say truly that when a good man dies he has honour and a mighty portion among the dead and becomes a demon which is a name given to him signifying wisdom And I say too that every wise man who happens to be a good man is more than human (δαιμόνιος) both in life and death and is rightly called a demon

Her Then I rather think that I am of one mind with you but what is the meaning of the word hero? (ἥρως in the old writing ἔρως)

Soc I think that there is no difficulty in explaining for the name is not much altered and signifies that they were born of love

Her What do you mean?

Soc Do you not know that the heroes are demigods?

Her What then?

Soc All of them sprang either from the love of a God for a mortal woman or of a mortal man for a Goddess think of the word in the old Attic, and you will see better that the name heros is only a slight alteration of Eros, from whom the heroes sprang either this is the meanin or if not this, then they must have been skilful as rhetoricians and dialecticians, and able to put the question (ρωτᾶν) for ρειν is equivalent to λ γειν And therefore, as I was saying, in the Attic dialect the heroes turn out to be rhetoricians and questioners. All this is easy enough the noble breed of heroes are a tribe of sophists and rhetors But can you tell me why m n are called ανθρωποι?—that is more difficult.

Her No, I cannot and I would not try even if I could, because I think that you are the more likely to succeed

[399] Soc That is to say you trust to the inspiration of Euthyphro.

Her Of course.

Soc Your faith is not vain for at th s very moment a new and ingenious thought strikes me, and, if I am not careful before tomorrow s dawn I shall be wiser than I ought to be. Now attend to me and first, remember that we often put in and pull out letters in words, and gi e names as we please and change the accents. Take, for example, the word Δι Φιλος in order to con ert this from a sentence into a noun, we omit one of the iotas and sound the middle syllable grave instead of acute as, on the other hand, letters are sometimes inserted in words instead of being omitted and the acute takes the place of the grave

Her That is true

Soc The name θρωπος, which was once a sentence, and is now a noun, appears to be a case just of this sort, for one letter which is the α, has been omitted, and the acute on the last syllable has been changed to a gra e.

Her What do you mean?

Soc I mean to say that the wo d "man implies that other animals ne er examine, or consider or look up at what they see, but that man not only sees (οπωπε) but considers and looks up at that which he sees and hence he alone of all animals is rightly called ανθρωπος, meaning αναθρω α οπωπεν

Her May I k you to examine another word about wh ch I am curious?

Soc Certainly

Her I will take that which appears to me to f llow next in o der You know the distinction of soul and body?

Soc Of course.

Her Let us endeavour to analyze them like the prev us wo ds.

Soc You want me first of all to examine the natural fitness of the word ψυχη (soul) and then of the word σωμα (body)?

Her Yes.

Soc If I am to say what occurs to me at the moment, I should imagine that those who first use the name ψυχη meant to express that the soul when in the body is the source of life, and gives the power of breath and revival (αψυχο) and when this reviving power fails then the body perishes and dies, and this, if I am not mistaken, they called psyche. But please stay a moment I fancy that I can discover something which will be more acceptable to the disciples of Euthyphro, [400] for I am afraid that they will scorn this explanation. What do you say to another?

Her Let me hear

Soc What is that which holds and carries and gives life and motion to the entire nature of the body? What else but the soul?

Her Just that.

Soc And do you not believe with Anaxagoras, that mind or soul is the ordering and containing principle of all things?

Her Yes I do

Soc Then you may well call that power φ σ χη wh ch carr es and holds nature (η φυσιν ι, αι ει) and this may be refined away into ψυχη.

Her Certainly and this derivation is, I think, more scientific than the other

Soc It is so but I cannot help laughing if I am to suppose that this was the true meaning of the name.

Her But what shall we say of the next word?

Soc You mean σωμα (the body)

Her Yes.

Soc That may be variously interpreted and yet more var ously if a little permutation is allowed. For some say that the body is the grave (σημα) of the soul which may be thought to be bur ed in our present l fe or again the index of the soul, because the soul gives indica*tions to* (σημαινει) the body probably the Orphic poets were the inventors of the name, and they were under the impression that the soul is suffering the punishment of sin and that the body is an enclosure or prison in which the soul is incarcerated kept safe (σωμα, σωζηται) as the name σωμα implies, until the penalty is pa d according to th s v ew not even a letter of the word need be changed

Her I th nk Socrates, that we have said enough of this class of ords But have we any more explanations of the names of the Gods, like that which you were giving of Zeus? I should like to know whether any similar principle of correctness is to be applied to them

Soc Yes indeed Hermogenes and there is one excellent principle which as men of sense we must acknowledge —that of the Gods we know nothing either of their natures or of the names which they give themselves but we are sure that the names by which they call themselves whatever they may be, are true And this is the best of all principles and the next best is to say as in prayers that we will call them by any sort of kind of names or patronymics which they like [401] because we do not know of any other That also I think is a very good custom and one which I should much wish to observe Let us then if you please in the first place announce to them that we are not enquiring about them we do not presume that we are able to do so but we are enquiring about the meaning of men in giving them these names —in this there can be small blame

Her I think Socrates that you are quite right and I would like to do as you say

Soc Shall we begin, then with Hestia according to custom?

Her Yes that will be very proper

Soc What may we suppose him to have meant who gave the name Hestia?

Her That is another and certainly a most difficult question

Soc My dear Hermogenes the first imposers of names must surely have been considerable persons they were philosophers and had a good deal to say

Her Well and what of them?

Soc They are the men to whom I should attribute the imposition of names Even in foreign names if you analyze them a meaning is still discernible For example that which we term οι σια is by some called εσια, and by others again ωσια Now that the essence of things should be called εστια which is akin to the first of these (σια=εστια) is rational enough And there is reason in the Athenians calling that εστια which participates in οι σ α For in ancient times we too seem to have said εσια for ουσια and this you may note to have been the idea of those who appointed that sacrifices should be first offered to εστια which was natural enough if they meant that εστια was the essence of things Those again who read ωσια seem to have inclined to the opinion of Heracleitus that all things flow and nothing stands with them the pushing principle (ωθουν) is the cause and ruling power of all things and is therefore rightly called (σια Enough of this, which is all that we who know nothing can affirm Next in order after Hestia we ought to consider Rhea and Cronos, although the name of Cronos has been already discussed But I dare say that I am talking great nonsense

Her Why Socrates?

Soc My good friend I have discovered a hive of wisdom

Her Of what nature?

[402] Soc Well rather ridiculous and yet plausible

Her How plausible?

Soc I fancy to myself Heracleitus repeating wise traditions of antiquity as old as the days of Cronos and Rhea, and of which Homer also spoke

Her How do you mean?

Soc Heracleitus is supposed to say that all things are in motion and nothing at rest he compares them to the stream of a river and says that you cannot go into the same water twice

Her That is true

Soc Well then how can we avoid inferring that he who gave the names of Cronos and Rhea to the ancestors of the Gods agreed pretty much in the doctrine of Heracleitus? Is the giving of the names of streams to both of them purely accidental? Compare the line in which Homer and as I believe, Hesiod also tells of

Ocean the origin of Gods and mother Tethys

And again Orpheus says that

The fair river of Ocean was the first to marry and he espoused his sister Tethys who was his mother s daughter

You see that this is a remarkable coincidence and all in the direction of Heracleitus

Her I think that there is something in what you say Socrates but I do not understand the meaning of the name Tethys

Soc Well that is almost self-explained being only the name of a spring a little disguised for that which is strained and filtered (διαττωμενον ηθουμενον) may be likened to a spring and the name Tethys is made up of these two words

Her The idea is ingenious Socrates

Soc To be sure But what comes next?—of Zeus we have spoken

Her Yes

Soc Then let us next take his two brothers

Poseidon and Pluto, whether the latter is called by that or by his other name.

Her By all means.

Soc Poseidon is ποσίδεσμον, the chain of the feet, the original inventor of the name had been stopped by the watery element in his walks, and not allowed to go on, and therefore he called the ruler of this element Poseidon; the ε was probably inserted as an ornament. Yet, perhaps, not so but the name may have been originally written with a double λ and not with an σ [403] meaning that the God knew many things (πολλὰ εἰδώς) And perhaps also he being the shaker of the earth, has been named from shaking (σείειν) and then π and δ have been added. Pluto gives wealth (πλοῦτος) and his name means the giver of wealth, which comes out of the earth beneath. People in general appear to imagine that the term Hades is connected with the invisible (ἀειδὲς) and so they are led by their fears to call the God Pluto instead.

Her And what is the true derivation?

Soc In spite of the mistakes which are made about the power of this deity and the foolish fears which people have of him, such as the fear of always being with him after death, and of the soul denuded of the body going to him, my belief is that all is quite consistent, and that the office and name of the God really correspond.

Her Why how is that?

Soc I will tell you my own opinion but first, I should like to ask you which chain does any animal feel to be the stronger? and which confines him more to the same spot,—desire or necessity?

Her Desire, Socrates, is stronger far

Soc And do you not think that many a one would escape from Hades, if he did not bind those who depart to him by the strongest of chains

Her Assuredly they would.

Soc And if by the greatest of chains, then by some desire, as I should certainly infer and not by necessity?

Her That is clear

Soc And there are many desires?

Her Yes.

Soc And therefore by the greatest desire, if the chain is to be the greatest

Her Yes.

Soc And is any desire stronger than the thought that you will be made better by associating with another?

Cf. Republic iii. 386, 387

Her Certainly not.

Soc And is not that the reason, Hermogenes, why no one, who has been to him, is willing to come back to us? Even the Sirens, like all the rest of the world, have been laid under his spells. Such a charm, as I imagine is the God able to infuse into his words. And according to this view he is the perfect and accomplished Sophist, and the great benefactor of the inhabitants of the other world and even to us who are upon earth he sends from below exceeding blessings. For he has much more than he wants down there wherefore he is called Pluto (or the rich) Note also, that he will have nothing to do with men while they are in the body but only when the soul is liberated from the desires and evils of the body Now there is a great deal of philosophy and reflection in that [404] for in their liberated state he can bind them with the desire of virtue, but while they are flustered and maddened by the body not even father Cronos himself would suffice to keep them with him in his own far famed chains.

Her There is a deal of truth in what you say

Soc Yes, Hermogenes, and the legislator called him Hades, not from the unseen (ἀειδὲς) —far otherwise, but from his knowledge (εἰδέναι) of all noble things.

Her Very good and what do we say of Demeter and Herè, and Apollo, and Athene, and Hephaestus, and Ares, and the other deities?

Soc Demeter is ἡ διδοῦσα μήτηρ, who gives food like a mother Herè is the lovely one (ἐρατή)—for Zeus, according to tradition, loved and married her possibly also the name may have been given when the legislator was thinking of the heavens, and may be only a disguise of the air (ἀήρ) putting the end in the place of the beginning. You will recognize the truth of this if you repeat the letters of Herè several times over People dread the name of Pherephatta as they dread the name of Apollo—and with as little reason the fear if I am not mistaken, only arises from their ignorance of the nature of names. But they go changing the name into Phersephone, and they are terrified at this whereas the new name means only that the Goddess is wise (σοφή) for seeing that all things in the world are in motion (φερομένων) that principle which embraces and touches and is able to follow them, is wisdom. And therefore the Goddess may be truly called Pherepaphe (Φερέπαφα) or some name like it, because she touches that which is in motion (τοῦ φερομένου ἐφαπτομένη) herein showing her wisdom. And Hades, who is wise, consorts with her because she is wise They alter her name into Pherephatta now a-days because the present generation care for euphony more than truth There is the other name Apollo which as I was saying is generally supposed to have some terrible signification Have you remarked this fact?

Her To be sure I have and what you say is true

Soc But the name in my opinion is really most expressive of the power of the God

Her How so?

Soc I will endeavour to explain for I do not believe that any single name could have been better adapted to express the attributes [405] of the God embracing and in a manner signify ing all four of them—music and prophecy and medicine and archery

Her That must be a strange name and I should like to hear the explanation

Soc Say rather an harmonious name as be seems the God of Harmony In the first place the purgations and purifications which doc tors and diviners use and their fumigations with drugs magical or medicinal as well as their washings and lustral sprinklings have all one and the same object, which is to make a man pure both in body and soul

Soc And is not Apollo the purifier and the washer and the absolver from all impurities?

Her Very true

Soc Then in reference to his ablutions and absolutions as being the physician who orders them he may be rightly called Απολουων (pu rifier) or in respect of his powers of divina tion and his truth and sincerity which is the same as truth he may be most fitly called Απλους from απλους (sincere) as in the Thessalian dialect for all the Thessalians call him Απλος also he is αει Βαλλων (always shoot ing) because he is a master archer who never misses or again the name may refer to his musical attributes and then as in ακολουθος and ακοιτις and in many other words the α is supposed to mean together so the meaning of the name Apollo will be moving together whether in the poles of heaven as they are called or in the harmony of song which is termed concord because he moves all together by an harmonious power as astronomers and musicians ingeniously declare And he is the God who presides over harmony, and makes all things move together both among Gods and among men And as in the words ακολουθος and ακοιτις the α is substituted for an ο so the name Απολλων is equivalent to ομοπολων only the second λ is added in order to avoid the ill omened sound of destruction (απολων) Now the suspicion of this destructive power still haunts the minds of some who do not consider the true value of the name [406] which as I was saying just now has reference to all the powers of the God who is the single one, the everdarting the purifier the mover together (απλους αει Βαλλων απολουων ομοπολων) The name of the Muses and of music would seem to be derived from their making philosophical enquiries (μωσθαι) and Leto is called by this name because she is such a gentle Goddess, and so willing (εθελημων) to grant our re quests or her name may be Letho as she is often called by strangers—they seem to imply by it her amiability and her smooth and easy going way of behaving Artemis is named from her healthy (αρτεμης) well-ordered nature, and because of her love of virginity perhaps because she is a proficient in virtue (αρετη) and perhaps also as hating intercourse of the sexes (τον αροτον μισησασα) He who gave the Goddess her name may have had any or all of these reasons

Her What is the meaning of Dionysus and Aphrodite?

Soc Son of Hipponicus you ask a solemn question there is a serious and also a facetious explanation of both these names the serious explanation is not to be had from me but there is no objection to your hearing the facetious one for the Gods too love a joke Διονυσος is simply διδους οινον (giver of wine) Διδοινυσος as he might be called in fun—and οινος is properly οιονους because wine makes those who drink think (οιεσθαι) that they have a mind (νουν) when they have none The der ivation of Aphrodite born of the foam (αφρος) may be fairly accepted on the authority of Hesiod

Her Still there remains Athene whom you Socrates as an Athenian will surely not for get there are also Hephaestus and Ares

Soc I am not likely to forget them

Her No indeed

Soc There is no difficulty in explaining the other appellation of Athene

Her What other appellation?

Soc We call her Pallas

Her To be sure

Soc And we cannot be wrong in supposing that this is derived from armed dances For the elevation of oneself or anything else above the earth [407] or by the use of the hands we

her because she is wise They alter her name into Pherephatta now a-days because the present generation care for euphony more than truth There is the other name Apollo which as I was saying is generally supposed to have some terrible signification Have you remarked this fact?

Her To be sure I have and what you say is true

Soc But the name in my opinion is really most expressive of the power of the God

Her How so?

Soc I will endeavour to explain for I do not believe that any single name could have been better adapted to express the attributes [405] of the God embracing and in a manner signifying all four of them —music and prophecy and medicine and archery

Her That must be a strange name and I should like to hear the explanation

Soc Say rather an harmonious name as be seems the God of Harmony In the first place the purgations and purifications which doctors and diviners use and their fumigations with drugs magical or medicinal as well as their washings and lustral sprinklings have all one and the same object which is to make a man pure both in body and soul

Soc And is not Apollo the purifier and the washer and the absolver from all impurities?

Her Very true

Soc Then in reference to his ablutions and absolutions as being the physician who orders them he may be rightly called Απολουων (purifier) or in respect of his powers of divination and his truth and sincerity which is the same as truth he may be most fitly called Απλως from απλους (sincere) as in the Thessalian dialect for all the Thessalians call him Απλος also he is αει Βαλλων (always shooting) because he is a master archer who never misses or again the name may refer to his musical attributes and then as in ακολουθος and ακοιτις and in many other words the α is supposed to mean together so the meaning of the name Apollo will be moving together whether in the poles of heaven as they are called or in the harmony of song which is termed concord because he moves all together by an harmonious power as astronomers and musicians ingeniously declare And he is the God who presides over harmony and makes all things move together both among Gods and among men And as in the words ακολο θος and ακοιτις the α is substituted for an ο so the name Απολλων is equivalent to ομοπολων only the second λ is added in order to avoid the ill omened sound of destruction (απολων) Now the suspicion of this destructive power still haunts the minds of some who do not consider the true value of the name [406] which as I was saying just now has reference to all the powers of the God who is the single one the everdarting the purifier the mover together (απλους αει Βαλλων απολουων ομοπολων) The name of the Muses and of music would seem to be derived from their making philosophical enquiries (μωσθαι) and Leto is called by this name because she is such a gentle Goddess and so willing (εθελημων) to grant our requests or her name may be Letho as she is often called by strangers—they seem to imply by it her amiability and her smooth and easy going way of behaving Artemis is named from her healthy (αρτεμης) well-ordered nature and because of her love of virginity perhaps because she is a proficient in virtue (αρετη) and perhaps also as hating intercourse of the sexes (τον αροτον μισησασα) He who gave the Goddess her name may have had any or all of these reasons

Soc Son of Hipponicus you ask a solemn question there is a serious and also a facetious explanation of both these names the serious explanation is not to be had from me but there is no objection to your hearing the facetious one for the Gods too love a joke Διονυσος is simply διδοι ς οἶνον (giver of wine) Διδοινυσος as he might be called in fun —and οινος is properly οιοι ους because wine makes those who drink think (οιεσθαι) that they have a mind (νουν) when they have none The derivation of Aphrodite born of the foam (αφρος) may be fairly accepted on the authority of Hesiod

Her Still there remains Athene whom you Socrates as an Athenian will surely not forget there are also Hephaestus and Ares

Soc I am not likely to forget them

Her No indeed

Soc There is no difficulty in explaining the other appellation of Athene

Her What other appellation?

Soc We call her Pallas

Her To be sure

Soc And we cannot be wrong in supposing that this is derived from armed dances For the elevation of oneself or anything else above the earth [407] or by the use of the hands we winters and winds and the fruits of the earth. The words ενιαυτος and ετος appear to be the same,— that which brings to light the plants and growths of the earth in their turn, and passes them in review within itself (εν αυτῳ εξεταζει): this is broken up into two words, ενιαυτος from εν αυτῳ, and ετος from εταζει, just as the original name of Ζευς was divided into Ζηνα and Δια; and the whole proposition means that his power of reviewing from within is one, but has two names, two words ετος and ενιαυτος being thus formed out of a single proposition.

Her Indeed Socrates, you make surprising progress.

Soc I am run away with.

Her Very true.

Soc But am not yet at my utmost speed.

[411] Her I should like very much to know in the next place, how you would explain the virtues. What principle of correctness is there in those charming words—wisdom, understanding, justice, and the rest of them?

Soc That is a tremendous class of names which you are disinterring; still, as I have put on the lion's skin, I must not be faint of heart; and I suppose that I must consider the meaning of wisdom (φρονησις) and understanding (συνεσις) and judgment (γνωμη) and knowledge (επιστημη) and all those other charming words, as you call them?

Her Surely we must not leave off until we find out their meaning.

Soc By the dog of Egypt I have not a bad notion which came into my head only this moment. I believe that the primeval givers of names were undoubtedly like too many of our modern philosophers, who in their search after the nature of things, are always getting dizzy from constantly going round and round, and then they imagine that the world is going round and round and moving in all directions; and this appearance, which arises out of their own internal condition, they suppose to be a reality of nature: they think that there is nothing stable or permanent, but only flux and motion, and that the world is always full of every sort of motion and change. The consideration of the names which I mentioned has led me into making this reflection.

Her How is that, Socrates?

Soc Perhaps you did not observe that in the names which have been just cited the motion or flux or generation of things is most surely indicated.

Her No, indeed, I never thought of it.

Soc Take the first of those which you mentioned; clearly that is a name indicative of motion.

Her What was the name?

Soc Φρονησις (wisdom), which may signify φορας και ρου νοησις (perception of motion and flux), or perhaps φορας ονησις (the blessing of motion), but is at any rate connected with φερεσθαι (motion); γνωμη (judgment) again certainly implies the ponderation or consideration (νωμησις) of generation, for to ponder is the same as to consider; or if you would rather here is νοησις, the very word just now mentioned, which is νεου εσις (the desire of the new); the word νεος implies that the world is always in process of creation. The giver of the name wanted to express his longing of the soul, for the original name was νεοεσις, and not νοησις, but η took the place of a double ε. The word σωφροσυνη is the salvation (σωτηρια) of that wisdom (φρονησις) which we were just now considering. [412] Επιστημη (knowledge) is akin to this, and indicates that the soul which is good for anything follows (επεται) the motion of things, neither anticipating them nor falling behind them; wherefor the word should rather be read as επιστημενη, inserting ε. Συνεσις (understanding) may be regarded in like manner as a kind of conclusion; the word is derived from συνιεναι (to go along with), and, like επιστασθαι (to know), implies the progression of the soul in company with the nature of things. Σοφια (wisdom) is very dark, and appears not to be of native growth; the meaning is, touching the motion or stream of things. You must remember that the poets, when they speak of the commencement of any rapid motion, often use the word εσυθη (he rushed); and there was a famous Lacedaemonian who was named Σους (Rush), for by this word the Lacedaemonians signify rapid motion, and the touching (επαφη) of motion is expressed by σοφια, for all things are supposed to be in motion. Good (αγαθον) is the name which is given to the admirable (αγαστῳ) in nature; for although all things move, still there are degrees of motion; some are swifter, some slower; but there are some things which are admirable for their swiftness, and this admirable part of nature is called αγαθον. Δικαιοσυνη (justice) is clearly δικαιου συνεσις (understanding of the just); but the actual word δικαιον is more difficult: men are only agreed to a certain extent about justice, and then they begin to disagree.

For those who suppose all things to be in

Her You will oblige me

Soc How would you have me begin? Shall I take first of all him whom you mentioned first—the sun?

Her Very good

Soc The origin of the sun will probably be clearer in the Doric form [409] for the Dorians call him αλιος and this name is given to him because when he rises he gathers (αλιζοι) men together or because he is always rolling in his course (αει ειλειν ιων) about the earth or from αιολειν of which the meaning is the same as ποικιλλειν (to variegate), because he variegates the productions of the earth

Her But what is σεληνη (the moon)?

Soc That name is rather unfortunate for Anaxagoras

Her How so?

Soc The word seems to forestall his recent discovery that the moon receives her light from the sun

Her Why do you say so?

Soc The two words σελας (brightness) and φως (light) have much the same meaning?

Her Yes

Soc This light about the moon is always new (νεον) and always old (ενον) if the disciples of Anaxagoras say truly For the sun in his revolution always adds new light and there is the old light of the previous month

Her Very true

Soc The moon is not unfrequently called σελαναια

Her True

Soc And as she has a light which is always old and always new (ενον νεον αει) she may very properly have the name σελαενονεοαεια and this when hammered into shape becomes σελαναια

Her A real dithyrambic sort of name that Socrates But what do you say of the month and the stars?

Soc Μεις (month) is called from μειουσθαι (to lessen) because suffering diminution the name of αστρα (stars) seems to be derived from αστραπη which is an improvement on αναστρωπη signifying the upsetting of the eyes (ανατρεφειν ωπα)

Her What do you say of πυρ (fire) and υδωρ (water)?

Soc I am at a loss how to explain πυρ either the muse of Euthyphro has deserted me or there is some very great difficulty in the word Please however to note the contrivance which I adopt whenever I am in a difficulty of this sort

Her What is it?

Soc I will tell you but I should like to know first whether you can tell me what is the meaning of the word πυρ?

Her Indeed I cannot

Soc Shall I tell you what I suspect to be the true explanation of this and several other words?—My belief is that they are of foreign origin For the Hellenes especially those who were under the dominion of the barbarians often borrowed from them

Her What is the inference?

Soc Why you know that any one who seeks to demonstrate the fitness of these names according to the Hellenic language and not according to the language from which the words are derived is rather likely to be at fault

Her Yes certainly

[410] Soc Well then consider whether this πυρ is not foreign for the word is not easily brought into relation with the Hellenic tongue and the Phrygians may be observed to have the same word slightly changed just as they have υδωρ (water) and κυνες (dogs) and many other words

Her That is true

Soc Any violent interpretations of the words should be avoided for something to say about them may easily be found And thus I get rid of πυρ and υδωρ Αηρ (air) Hermogenes may be explained as the element which raises (αιρει) things from the earth or as ever flowing (αει ρει) or because the flux of the air is wind and the poets call the winds air blasts (αηται) he who uses the term may mean so to speak air flux (αητορρουν) in the sense of wind flux (πνευματορρουν) and because this moving wind may be expressed by either term he employs the word air (αηρ=αητης ρεω) Αιθηρ (aether) I should interpret as αειθεηρ this may be correctly said because this element is always running in a flux about the air (αει θει περι τον αερα ρεων) The meaning of the word γη (earth) comes out better when in the form of γαια, for the earth may be truly called mother (γαια, γεννητειρα) as in the language of Homer (Od ix 118 xiii 160) γεγααοι means γεγεννησθαι

Her Good

Soc What shall we take next?

Her There are ωραι (the seasons) and the two names of the year ενιαυτος and ετος

Soc The ωραι should be spelt in the old Attic way if you desire to know the probable truth about them they are rightly called the ὁραι because they divide (οριζουσιν) the summers and tions are often such that at last no human being can possibly make out the original meaning of the word. Another example is the word σφιγξ σφιγγος which ought properly to be φιγξ φιγγος and there are other examples.

Her That is quite true Socrates

Soc And yet, if you are permitted to put in and pull out any letters which you please, names will be too easily made, and any name may be adapted to any object.

Her True.

Soc Yes, that is true. And therefore a wise dictator like yourself should observe the laws of moderation and probability

Her Such is my desire.

Soc And mine, too, Hermogenes. But do not be too much of a precisian [415] or you will unnerve me of my strength. When you have allowed me to add μηχανη (contrivance) to τεχνη (art) I shall be at the top of my bent, for I conceive μηχανη to be a sign of great accomplishment—ανειν for μη or has the mean ing of greatness, and these two μηκος and ανειν make up the word μηχανη But, as I was saying being now at the top of my bent, I should like to consider the meaning of the two words αρετη (virtue) and κακια (vice) αρετη I do not as yet understand, but κακια is transparent, and agrees with the principles which preceded for all things being in a flux (ιοντων) κακως ιον (going badly) and this evil motion when existing in the soul has the general name of κακια, or vice, specially appropriated to it. The meaning of κακως ιεναι may be further illustrated by the use of δειλια (cowardice) which ought to have come after αρετη, but was forgotten, and as I fear is not the only word which has been passed over Δειλια signifies that the soul is bound with a strong chain (δεσμος) for λιαν means strength and therefore δειλια expresses the greatest and strongest bond of the soul and απορια (difficulty) is an evil of the same nature (from α not, and πορευεσθαι to go) like anything else which is an impediment to motion and movement Then the word κακια appears to mean κακως ιεναι, or going badly or limping and halting of which the consequence is, that the soul becomes filled with vice. And if κακια is the name of this sort of thing αρετη will be the opposite of it, signifying in the first place ease of motion then that the stream of the good soul is unimpeded and has therefore the attribute of ever flowing without let or hindrance, and is therefore called αρετη or more correctly αειρειτη (ever flowing) and may perhaps have had another form, αιρετη (eligible) indicating that nothing is more eligible than virtue, and this has been hammered into αρετη I daresay that you will deem this to be another invention of mine but I think that if the previous word κακια was right, then ἀρετη is also right.

[416] Her But what is the meaning of κακον which has played so great a part in your previous discourse?

Soc That is a very singular word about which I can hardly form an opinion and therefore I must have recourse to my ingenious device

Her What device?

Soc The device of a foreign origin, which I shall give to this word also

Her Very likely you are right but suppose that we leave these words and endeavour to see the rationale of καλον and αισχρον

Soc The meaning of αισχρον is evident being only αει ισχον ροης (always preventing from flowing) and this is in accordance with our former derivations. For the name giver was a great enemy to stagnation of all sorts, and hence he gave the name αειισχοροουν to that which hindered the flux (αει ισχον ρουν) and this is now beaten together into αισχρον

Her But what do you say of καλον?

Soc That is more obscure yet the form is only due to the quantity and has been changed by altering ου into ο

Her What do you mean?

Soc This name appears to denote mind

Her How so?

Soc Let me ask you what is the cause why anything has a name is not the principle which imposes the name the cause?

Her Certainly

Soc And must not this be the mind of Gods or of men or of both?

Her Yes.

Soc Is not mind that which called (καλεσαν) things by their names, and is not mind the beautiful (καλον)?

Her That is evident.

Soc And are not the works of intelligence and mind worthy of praise, and are not other works worthy of blame?

Her Certainly

Soc Physic does the work of a physician and carpentering does the works of a carpenter?

Her Exactly

Soc And the principle of beauty does the works of beauty?

Her Of [illegible]

Iliad vi. 65.

motion conceive the greater part of nature to be a mere receptacle and they say that there is a penetrating power which passes through all this and is the instrument of creation in all and is the subtlest and swiftest element for if it were not the subtlest and a power which none can keep out and also the swiftest passing by other things as if they were standing still it could not penetrate through the moving universe And this element which superintends all things and pieces (διαιον) all is rightly called δίκαιον the letter κ is only added for the sake of euphony Thus far as I was saying there is a general agreement about the nature of justice [413] but I, Hermogenes being an enthusiastic disciple have been told in a mystery that the justice of which I am speaking is also the cause of the world now a cause is that because of which anything is created and some one comes and whispers in my ear that justice is rightly so called because partaking of the nature of the cause and I begin after hearing what he has said to interrogate him gently Well my excellent friend say I but if all this be true I still want to know what is justice Thereupon they think that I ask tiresome questions and am leaping over the barriers and have been already sufficiently answered and they try to satisfy me with one derivation after another and at length they quarrel For one of them says that justice is the sun and that he only is the piercing (διαιοντα) and burning (καοντα) element which is the guardian of nature And when I joyfully repeat this beautiful notion I am answered by the satirical remark What is there no justice in the world when the sun is down? And when I earnestly beg my questioner to tell me his own honest opinion he says Fire in the abstract but this is not very intelligible Another says No not fire in the abstract but the abstraction of heat in the fire Another man professes to laugh at all this and says as Anaxagoras says that justice is mind for mind as they say has absolute power and mixes with nothing and orders all things and passes through all things At last, my friend I find myself in far greater perplexity about the nature of justice than I was before I began to learn But still I am of opinion that the name which has led me into this digression was given to justice for the reasons which I have mentioned

Her I think Socrates that you are not improvising now you must have heard this from some one else

Soc And not the rest?

Her Hardly

Soc Well then let me go on in the hope of making you believe in the originality of the rest What remains after justice? I do not think that we have as yet discussed courage (αιδρεια) —injustice (αδικια) which is obviously nothing more than a hindrance to the penetrating principle (διαιοι τος) need not be considered Well then the name of αιδρεια seems to imply a battle —this battle is in the world of existence and according to the doctrine of flux is only the counterflux (ειαντια ροη) if you extract the δ from αιδρεια the name at once signifies the thing and you may clearly understand that αιδρεια is not the stream opposed to every stream but only to that which is contrary to justice [414] for otherwise courage would not have been praised The words αρρηιν (male) and ανηρ (man) also contain a similar allusion to the same principle of the upward flux (τη αιω ροη) Γυιη (woman) I suspect to be the same word as γοιη (birth) θηλυ (female) appears to be partly derived from θηλη (the teat), because the teat is like rain and makes things flourish (τεθηλεναι)

Her That is surely probable

Soc Yes and the very word θαλλειν (to flourish) seems to figure the growth of youth which is swift and sudden ever And this is expressed by the legislator in the name which is a compound of θειν (running) and αλλεσθαι (leaping) Pray observe how I gallop away when I get on smooth ground There are a good many names generally thought to be of importance which have still to be explained

Her True

Soc There is the meaning of the word τεχνη (art) for example

Her Very true

Soc That may be identified with εχοιοη and expresses the possession of mind you have only to take away the τ and insert two ο s one between the χ and ι and another between the ν and η

Her That is a very shabby etymology

Soc Yes my dear friend but then you know that the original names have been long ago buried and disguised by people sticking on and stripping off letters for the sake of euphony and twisting and bedizening them in all sorts of ways and time too may have had a share in the change Take, for example the word κατοπτρον why is the letter ρ inserted? This must surely be the addition of some one who cares nothing about the truth but thinks only of putting the mouth into shape And the addi

Her Such is my view

Soc And do you know that the ancients said δυογο and not ζ γ ν?

Her They did so

Soc And ζ γ ν (yoke) has no meaning—it ought to be δυογο which word expresses the binding of two together (δ ν αγωγη) for the purpose of drawing—this has been changed into ζυγ and there are many other examples of similar changes

Her There are

Soc Proceeding in the same train of thought I may remark that the word δε ν (obligation) has a meaning which is the opposite of all the other appellations of good for δεο is here a species of good, and is, nevertheless, the chain (δεσμο) or hinderer of motion, and therefore own brother of βλαβ ρον

Her Yes, Socrates that is quite plain

Soc Not if you restore the ancient form which is more likely to be the correct one, [419] and read διο instead of δ if you convert the ε into an after the old fashion this word will then agree with other words meaning good for διο not δε signifies the good, and is a term of praise and the author of names has not contradicted himself but in all these various appellations, δε (obligatory) ωφελιμο (advantageous) λ σ ελο ν (profitable) ρδαλε (gainful) αγαθ ν (good) σ μφερο (expedient) ευπ ρον (plenteous) the same conception is implied of the ordering or all pervading principle which is praised and the restraining and binding principle which is censured And this is further illustrated by the word ζημιωδης (hurtful) which if the ζ is only changed into δ as in the ancient language, becomes δ μιωδης and this name as you will perceive, is given to that which binds motion (δ ντ ιο)

Her What do you say of ηδο η (pleasure) λυπη (pain) επιθ μια (desire) and the like, Socrates

Soc I do not think Hermogenes, that there is any great difficulty about them—ηδο η is η ησ the action which tends to advantage and the original form may be supposed to have been ηο η but this has been altered by the insertion of the δ λ πη appears to be derived from the relaxation (λ) which the body feels when in so ον (trouble) is the hindrance of motion (α and ιε αι) αλγηδω (distress) if I am not mistaken, is a foreign word which is derived from αλεινος (grievous) οδ νη (grief) is called from the putting on (ο ν) so tow n χθηδω (exation) the w d too labours, as any one may see χαρα (joy) is the very expression of the fluency and diffusion of the soul (χεω) τερψ ς (delight) is so called from the pleasure creeping (ρπον) through the soul which may be likened to a breath (πνοη) and is properly ερπνο ν but has been altered by time into τ ρπ φροσ η (cheerfulness) and επιθ μια explain themselves the former which ought to be ευφεροσυνη and has been changed into ευφροσυνη is named as every one may see from the soul moving (φε ρεσθαι) in harmony with nature επιθυμια is really η π τον θυμον α δ ναμις the power which enters into the soul θ μος (passion) is called from the rushing (θ σ ως) and boiling of the soul μερος (desire) denotes the stream (ρο ς) which most draws the soul δια τ ν ον της ρο ης—because flowing with desire (με ν) and expresses a longing after things and violent attraction of the soul to [420] them, and is termed μερος from possessing this power ποθος (longing) is expressive of the desire of that which is not present but absent, and in another place (που) this is the reason why the name ποθος is applied to things absent, as μερος is to things present ρως (love) is so called because flowing in (σρων) from without the stream is not inherent but is an influence introduced through the eyes, and from flowing in was called σρος (influx) in the old time when they used ο for ω, and is called ρως, no that ω is substituted for But why do you not give me another word?

Her What do you think of δοξα (opinion) and that class of words?

Soc Δοξα is either derived from διωξ ς (pursuit) and expresses the march of the soul in the pursuit of knowledge, or from the shooting of a bow (οξο) the latter is more likely and is confirmed by οιησις (thinking) which is only ισ ς (moving) and implies the movement of the soul to the essential nature of each thing—just as βουλη (counsel) has to do with shooting (β λη) and β λεσθαι (to wish) combines the notion of aiming and deliberating—all these words seem to follow δοξα, and all involve the idea of shooting just as β λια, absence of counsel on the other hand is a mishap or missing or mistaking of the mark or aim or proposal or object

Her You are quickening your pace now Socrates

Soc Why yes, the end I now dedicate to God not, however until I have explained αναγ η (necessity) which ought to come next, and σ ον (the voluntary) Ε σ is certainly the yielding (ικ) and unresisting—the no-

Soc And that principle we affirm to be mind?

Her Very true

Soc Then mind is rightly called beauty because she does the works which we recognize and speak of as the beautiful?

Her That is evident

Soc What more names remain to us?

Her There are the words which are connected with αγαθον and καλοι such as συμφεροι and λυσιτελουν ωφελιμον, κερδαλεον and their opposites [417]

Soc The meaning of συμφερον (expedient) I think that you may discover for yourself by the light of the previous examples —for it is a sister word to επιστημη meaning just the motion (φορα) of the soul accompanying the world and things which are done upon this principle are called συμφορα or συμφεροντα because they are carried round with the world

Her That is probable

Soc Again χερδαλεον (gainful) is called from χερδος (gain) but you must alter the δ into ν if you want to get at the meaning for this word also signifies good but in another way he who gave the name intended to express the power of admixture (κεραινυμενον) and universal penetration in the good in forming the word however he inserted a δ instead of an ν and so made κερδος

Her Well but what is λυσιτελουν (profitable)?

Soc I suppose Hermogenes that people do not mean by the profitable the gainful or that which pays (λυει) the retailer but they use the word in the sense of swift You regard the profitable (λυσιτελουν) as that which being the swiftest thing in existence allows of no stay in things and no pause or end of motion but always if there begins to be any end lets things go again (λυει) and makes motion immortal and unceasing and in this point of view as appears to me the good is happily denominated λυσιτελουν —being that which looses (λυον) the end (τελος) of motion Ωφελιμον (the advantageous) is derived from οφελλειν, meaning that which creates and increases this latter is a common Homeric word and has a foreign character

Her And what do you say of their opposites?

Soc Of such as mere negatives I hardly think that I need speak

Her Which are they?

Soc The words ασυμφορον (inexpedient) ανωφελες (unprofitable) αλυσιτελες (unadvantageous) ακερδες (ungainful)

Her True

Soc I would rather take the words βλαβερον (harmful), ζημιωδες (hurtful)

Her Good

Soc The word βλαβερον is that which is said to hinder or harm (βλαπτειν) the stream (ρουν) βλαπτον is βουλομενον απτειν (seeking to hold or bind) for απτειν is the same as δειν and δειν is always a term of censure βουλομενον απτειν ρουν (wanting to bind the stream) would properly be βουλαπτεροουν and this as I imagine is improved into βλαβερον

Her You bring out curious results Socrates, in the use of names and when I hear the word βουλαπτεροουν I cannot help imagining that you are making your mouth into a flute, and puffing away at some prelude to Athene

[418] Soc That is the fault of the makers of the name Hermogenes not mine

Her Very true but what is the derivation of ζημιωδες?

Soc What is the meaning of ζημιωδες?—let me remark Hermogenes how right I was in saying that great changes are made in the meaning of words by putting in and pulling out letters even a very slight permutation will sometimes give an entirely opposite sense I may instance the word δεοι which occurs to me at the moment and reminds me of what I was going to say to you that the fine fashionable language of modern times has twisted and disguised and entirely altered the original meaning both of δεοι and also of ζημιωδες which in the old language is clearly indicated

Her What do you mean?

Soc I will try to explain You are aware that our forefathers loved the sounds ι and δ especially the women who are most conservative of the ancient language but now they change ι into η or ε, and δ into ζ this is supposed to increase the grandeur of the sound

Her How do you mean?

Soc For example in very ancient times they called the day either ιμερα or εμερα, which is called by us ημερα

Her That is true

Soc Do you observe that only the ancient form shows the intention of the giver of the name? of which the reason is that men long for (ιμειρουσι) and love the light which comes after the darkness and is therefore called ιμερα, from ιμερος desire

Her Clearly

Soc But now the name is so travestied that you cannot tell the meaning although there are some who imagine the day to be called ημερα because it makes things gentle (ημερα)

Soc But the secondary, as I conceive, derive their significance from the primary.

Her That is evident.

Soc Very good; but then how do the primary names which precede analysis show the natures of things, as far as they can be shown; which they must do, if they are to be real names? And here I will ask you a question: Suppose that we had no voice or tongue, and wanted to communicate with one another, should we not, like the deaf and dumb, make signs with the hands and head and the rest of the body?

Her There would be no choice, Socrates.

[423] Soc We should imitate the nature of the thing; the elevation of our hands to heaven would mean lightness and upwardness; heaviness and downwardness would be expressed by letting them drop to the ground; if we were describing the running of a horse, or any other animal, we should make our bodies and their gestures as like as we could to them.

Her I do not see that we could do anything else.

Soc We could not; for by bodily imitation only can the body ever express anything.

Her Very true.

Soc And when we want to express ourselves, either with the voice, or tongue, or mouth, the expression is simply their imitation of that which we want to express.

Her It must be so, I think.

Soc Then a name is a vocal imitation of that which the vocal imitator names or imitates?

Her I think so.

Soc Nay, my friend, I am disposed to think that we have not reached the truth as yet.

Her Why not?

Soc Because if we have we shall be obliged to admit that the people who imitate sheep, or cocks, or other animals, name that which they imitate.

Her Quite true.

Soc Then could I have been right in what I was saying?

Her In my opinion, no. But I wish that you would tell me, Socrates, what sort of an imitation is a name?

Soc In the first place, I should reply, not a musical imitation, although that is also vocal; nor again an imitation of what music imitates; these, in my judgment, would not be naming. Let me put the matter as follows: All objects have sound and figure, and many have colour?

Her Certainly.

Soc But the art of naming appears not to be concerned with imitations of this kind; the arts which have to do with them are music and drawing?

Her True.

Soc Again, is there not an essence of each thing, just as there is a colour, or sound? And is there not an essence of colour and sound as well as of anything else which may be said to have an essence?

Her I should think so.

Soc Well, and if any one could express the essence of each thing in letters and syllables, would he not express the nature of each thing?

[424] Her Quite so.

Soc The musician and the painter were the two names which you gave to the two other imitators. What will this imitator be called?

Her I imagine, Socrates, that he must be the namer, or name-giver, of whom we are in search.

Soc If this is true, then I think that we are in a condition to consider the names ῥοή (stream), ἰέναι (to go), σχέσις (retention), about which you were asking; and we may see whether the namer has grasped the nature of them in letters and syllables in such a manner as to imitate the essence or not.

Her Very good.

Soc But are these the only primary names, or are there others?

Her There must be others.

Soc So I should expect. But how shall we further analyse them, and where does the imitator begin? Imitation of the essence is made by syllables and letters; ought we not, therefore, first to separate the letters, just as those who are beginning rhythm first distinguish the powers of elementary, and then of compound sounds, and when they have done so, but not before, they proceed to the consideration of rhythms?

Her Yes.

Soc Must we not begin in the same way with letters; first separating the vowels, and then the consonants and mutes, into classes, according to the received distinctions of the learned; also the semivowels, which are neither vowels, nor yet mutes; and distinguishing into classes the vowels themselves? And when we have perfected the classification of things, we shall give their names, and see whether, as in the case of letters, there are any classes to which they may be all referred; and hence we shall see their natures, and see too, whether they have in them classes as there are in the letters; and when we have well considered all this, we shall know

Cf. Phaed [illegible]

tion implied is yielding and not opposing yielding as I was just now saying to that motion which is in accordance with our will but the necessary and resistant being contrary to our will implies error and ignorance the idea is taken from walking through a ravine which is impassable and rugged and overgrown and impedes motion—and this is the derivation of the word αιαγκαιον (necessary) αν αγκη ιοι going through a ravine But while my strength lasts let us persevere and I hope that you will persevere with your questions

Her Well then let me ask about the greatest and noblest such as αληθεια (truth) and ψευδος (falsehood) and ον (being) [421] not forgetting to enquire why the word ονομα (name) which is the theme of our discussion has this name of ονομα

Soc You know the word μαιεσθαι (to seek)?

Her Yes —meaning the same as ζητειν (to enquire)

Soc The word ονομα seems to be a compressed sentence signifying οι ου ζητημα (being for which there is a search) as is still more obvious in ονομαστον (notable) which states in so many words that real existence is that for which there is a seeking (ον οῦ μασμα) αλ ηθεια is also an agglomeration of θεια αλη (divine wandering) implying the divine motion of existence ψευδος (falsehood) is the opposite of motion here is another ill name given by the legislator to stagnation and forced inaction which he compares to sleep (ευδειν) but the original meaning of the word is disguised by the addition of ψ ον and ουσια are ιοι with an ι broken off this agrees with the true principle for being (ον) is also moving (ιον) and the same may be said of not being which is like wise called not going (οικ οι or ουκι ον=ουκ ιοι)

Her You have hammered away at them manfully but suppose that some one were to say to you what is the word οι and what are ρεοι and δοιν?—show me their fitness

Soc You mean to say how should I answer him?

Her Yes

Soc One way of giving the appearance of an answer has been already suggested

Her What way?

Soc To say that names which we do not understand are of foreign origin and this is very likely the right answer and something of this kind may be true of them but also the original forms of words may have been lost in the lapse of ages names have been so twisted in all manner of ways that I should not be surprised if the old language when compared with that now in use would appear to us to be a barbarous tongue

Her Very likely

Soc Yes very likely But still the enquiry demands our earnest attention and we must not flinch For we should remember that if a person go on analysing names into words and enquiring also into the elements out of which the words are formed and keeps on always repeating this process he who has to answer him must at last give up the enquiry in despair

Her Very true

[422] Soc And at what point ought he to lose heart and give up the enquiry? Must he not stop when he comes to the names which are the elements of all other names and sentences for these cannot be supposed to be made up of other names? The word αγαθον (good) for example is as we were saying a compound of αγαστος (admirable) and θοος (swift) And probably θοος is made up of other elements and these again of others But if we take a word which is incapable of further resolution then we shall be right in saying that we have at last reached a primary element which need not be resolved any further

Her I believe you to be in the right

Soc And suppose the names about which you are now asking should turn out to be primary elements must not their truth or law be examined according to some new method?

Her Very likely

Soc Quite so Hermogenes all that has preceded would lead to this conclusion And if as I think the conclusion is true then I shall again say to you come and help me that I may not fall into some absurdity in stating the principle of primary names

Her Let me hear and I will do my best to assist you

Soc I think that you will acknowledge with me that one principle is applicable to all names primary as well as secondary—when they are regarded simply as names there is no difference in them

Her Certainly not

Soc All the names that we have been explaining were intended to indicate the nature of things

Her Of course

Soc And that this is true of the primary quite as much as of the secondary names is implied in their being names therefore used in order to express motion, just as by the letter ι he expresses the subtle elements which pass through all things. [427] This is why he uses the letter ι as imitative of motion, ἰέναι, ἵεσθαι. And there is another class of letters, φ, ψ, σ and ζ, of which the pronunciation is accompanied by great expenditure of breath; these are used in the imitation of such notions as ψυχρόν (shivering), ζέον (seething), σείεσθαι (to be shaken), σεισμός (shock), and are always introduced by the giver of names when he wants to imitate what is φυσῶδες (windy). He seems to have thought that the closing and pressure of the tongue in the utterance of δ and τ was expressive of binding and rest in a place: he further observed the liquid movement of λ, in the pronunciation of which the tongue slips, and in this he found the expression of smoothness, as in λεῖος (level), and in the word ὀλισθάνειν (to slip) itself, λιπαρόν (sleek), in the word κολλῶδες (gluey), and the like: the heavier sound of γ detained the slipping tongue, and the union of the two gave the notion of a glutinous, clammy nature, as in γλίσχρος, γλυκύς, γλοιῶδες. The ν he observed to be sounded from within, and therefore to have a notion of inwardness; hence he introduced the sound in ἔνδον and ἐντός: α he assigned to the expression of size, and η of length, because they are great letters: ο was the sign of roundness, and therefore there is plenty of ο mixed up in the word γογγύλον (round). Thus did the legislator, reducing all things into letters and syllables, and impressing on them names and signs, and out of them by imitation compounding other signs. That is my view, Hermogenes, of the truth of names; but I should like to hear what Cratylus has more to say.

Her. But, Socrates, as I was telling you before, Cratylus mystifies me; he says that there is a fitness of names, but he never explains what is this fitness, so that I cannot tell whether his obscurity is intended or not. Tell me now, Cratylus, here in the presence of Socrates, do you agree in what Socrates has been saying about names, or have you something better of your own? and if you have, tell me what your view is, and then you will either learn of Socrates, or Socrates and I will learn of you.

Crat. Well, but surely, Hermogenes, you do not suppose that you can learn, or I explain, any subject of importance all in a moment; at any rate, not such a subject as language, which is, perhaps, the very greatest of all.

[428] Her. No, indeed; but, as Hesiod says, and I agree with him, "to add little to little" is worth while. And, therefore, if you think that you can add anything at all, however small, to our knowledge, take a little trouble and oblige Socrates, and me too, who certainly have a claim upon you.

Soc. I am by no means positive, Cratylus, in the view which Hermogenes and myself have worked out; and therefore do not hesitate to say what you think, which if it be better than my own view I shall gladly accept. And I should not be at all surprised to find that you have found some better notion. For you have evidently reflected on these matters and have had teachers, and if you have really a better theory of the truth of names, you may count me in the number of your disciples.

Crat. You are right, Socrates, in saying that I have made a study of these matters, and I might possibly convert you into a disciple. But I fear that the opposite is more probable, and I already find myself moved to say to you what Achilles in the "Prayers" says to Ajax,—

Illustrious Ajax, son of Telamon, lord of the people,
You appear to have spoken in all things much to my mind.

And you, Socrates, appear to me to be an oracle, and to give answers much to my mind, whether you are inspired by Euthyphro, or whether some Muse may have long been an inhabitant of your breast, unconsciously to yourself.

Soc. Excellent Cratylus, I have long been wondering at my own wisdom; I cannot trust myself. And I think that I ought to stop and ask myself, What am I saying? for there is nothing worse than self-deception—when the deceiver is always at home and always with you—it is quite terrible, and therefore I ought often to retrace my steps and endeavour to "look fore and aft," in the words of the aforesaid Homer. And now let me see; where are we? Have we not been saying that the correct name indicates the nature of the thing:—has this proposition been sufficiently proven?

Crat. Yes, Socrates, what you say, as I am disposed to think, is quite true.

Soc. Names, then, are given in order to instruct?

Crat. Certainly.

Soc. And naming is an art, and has artificers?

Crat. Yes.

Soc. And who are they?

[429] Crat. The legislators, of whom you spoke at first.

how to apply them to what they resemble—whether one letter is used to denote one thing or whether there is to be an admixture of several of them just as in painting the painter who wants to depict anything sometimes uses purple only or any other colour and sometimes mixes up several colours as his method is when he has to paint flesh colour or anything of that kind—he uses his colours as his figures appear to require them and so too we shall apply letters to the expression of objects either single letters when required or several letters and so we shall form syllables as they are called [425] and from syllables make nouns and verbs and thus at last from the combinations of nouns and verbs arrive at language large and fair and whole and as the painter made a figure even so shall we make speech by the art of the namer or the rhetorician or by some other art Not that I am literally speaking of ourselves but I was carried away—meaning to say that this was the way in which (not we but) the ancients formed language, and what they put together we must take to pieces in like manner if we are to attain a scientific view of the whole subject and we must see whether the primary and also whether the secondary elements are rightly given or not for if they are not the composition of them my dear Hermogenes will be a sorry piece of work and in the wrong direction

Her That Socrates I can quite believe

Soc Well but do you suppose that you will be able to analyse them in this way? for I am certain that I should not

Her Much less am I likely to be able

Soc Shall we leave them then? or shall we seek to discover if we can something about them according to the measure of our ability saying by way of preface as I said before of the Gods that of the truth about them we know nothing and do but entertain human notions of them And in this present enquiry let us say to ourselves before we proceed that the higher method is the one which we or others who would analyse language to any good purpose must follow but under the circumstances as men say we must do as well as we can What do you think?

Her I very much approve

Soc That objects should be imitated in letters and syllables and so find expression may appear ridiculous Hermogenes but it cannot be avoided—there is no better principle to which we can look for the truth of first names Deprived of this we must have recourse to divine help like the tragic poets who in any perplexity have their Gods waiting in the air and must get out of our difficulty in like fashion by saying that the Gods gave the first names and therefore they are right This will be the best contrivance or perhaps that other notion may be even better still of deriving them from some barbarous people, for the barbarians are older than we are [426] or we may say that antiquity has cas a ve l over them which is the same sort of excuse as the last for all these are not reasons but only ingenious excuses for having no reasons concerning the truth of words And yet any sort of ignorance of first or primitive names involves an ignorance of secondary words for they can only be explained by the primary Clearly then the professor of languages should be able to give a very lucid explanation of first names or let him be assured he will only talk nonsense about the rest Do you not suppose this to be true?

Her Ce tainly Socrates

Soc My first notions of original names are truly wild and ridiculous though I have no objection to impart them to you if you desire and I hope that you will communicate to me in return anything better which you may have

Her Fear not I will do my best

Soc In the first place the letter ρ appears to me to be the general instrument expressing all motion (κινησις) But I have not yet explained the meaning of this latter word which is just ιεσις (going) for the letter η was not in use among the ancients who only employed ε and the root is κιειν which is a foreign form the same as ιεναι And the old word κινησις will be correctly given as ιεσις in corresponding modern letters Assuming this foreign root κιειν and allowing for the change of the η and the insertion of the ν we have κ νησις which should have been κιειησις or ειεσις and στασις is the negative of ιεναι (or ειεσις) and has been improved into στασις Now the letter ρ as I was saying appeared to the imposer of names an excellent instrument for the expression of motion and he frequently uses the letter for this purpose for example in the actual words ρειν and ροη he represents motion by ρ also in the words τρ μ ς (trembling) τραχυς (rugged) and again in words such as κρο ειν (strike) θραυειν (crush) ερ ικε ν (bruise) θρυπτειν (break) κερματιξ ν (crumble) ρ μ βε ν (whirl) of all these sorts of movements he generally finds an expression in the letter R because as I imagine he had observed that the tongue was most agitated and least at rest in the pronunciation of this letter which he

Soc Why what is the difference? May I not go to a man and say to him, "This is your picture, showing him his own likeness, or perhaps the likeness of a woman and when I say show I mean bring before the sense of sight.

Crat. Certainly

Soc And may I not go to him again, and say "This is your name"?—for the name, like the picture, is an imitation. May I not say to him—"This is your name"? [431] and may I not then bring to his sense of hearing the imitation of himself when I say "This is a man" or of a female of the human species, when I say "This is a woman," as the case may be? Is not all that quite possible?

Crat I would fain agree with you, Socrates and therefore I say Granted

Soc That is very good of you, if I am right, which need hardly be disputed at present. But if I can assign names as well as pictures to objects, the right assignment of them we may call truth, and the wrong assignment of them falsehood. Now if there be such a wrong assignment of names, there may also be a wrong or inappropriate assignment of verbs and if of names and verbs then of the sentences, which are made up of them. What do you say Cratylus?

Crat I agree and think that what you say is very true.

Soc And further primitive nouns may be compared to pictures and in pictures you may either give all the appropriate colours and figures, or you may not give them all—some may be wanting or there may be too many or too much of them—may there not?

Crat Very true.

Soc And he who gives all gives a perfect picture or figure and he who takes away or adds also gives a picture or figure, but not a good one

Crat Yes.

Soc In like manner he who by syllables and letters imitates the nature of things, if he gives all that is appropriate will produce a good image, or in other words a name but if he subtracts or perhaps adds a little, he will make an image but not a good one whence I infer that some names are well and others ill made.

Crat That is true.

Soc Then the artist of names may be sometimes good, or he may be bad?

Crat Yes.

Soc And this artist of names is called the legislator?

Crat Yes.

Soc Then like other artists the legislator may be good or he may be bad it must surely be so if our former admissions hold good?

Crat Very true, Socrates but the case of language, you see, is different for when by the help of grammar we assign the letters a or β [432] or any other letters to a certain name, then, if we add, or subtract, or misplace a letter the name which is written is not only written wrongly but not written at all and in any of these cases becomes other than a name.

Soc But I doubt whether your view is altogether correct, Cratylus.

Crat How so?

Soc I believe that what you say may be true about numbers, which must be just what they are, or not be at all for example, the number ten at once becomes other than ten if a unit be added or subtracted, and so of any other number but this does not apply to that which is qualitative or to anything which is represented under an image. I should say rather that the image, if expressing in every point the entire reality would no longer be an image Let us suppose the existence of two objects one of them shall be Cratylus, and the other the image of Cratylus and we will suppose, further that some God makes not only a representation such as a painter would make of your outward form and colour but also creates an inward organization like yours, having the same warmth and softness and into this infuses motion, and soul, and mind, such as you have, and in a word copies all your qualities, and places them by you in another form would you say that this was Cratylus and the image of Cratylus, or that there were two Cratyluses?

Crat I should say that there were two Cratyluses.

Soc Then you see, my friend that we must find some other principle of truth in images, and also in names and not insist that an image is no longer an image when something is added or subtracted. Do you not perceive that images are very far from having qualities which are the exact counterpart of the realities which they represent?

Crat Yes, I see.

Soc But then how ridiculous would be the effect of names on things, if they were exactly the same with them! For they would be the doubles of them, and no one would be able to determine which were the names and which were the realities

Crat Quite true.

Soc Then fear not, but have the courage to Soc And does this art grow up among men like other arts? Let me explain what I mean of painters some are better and some worse?

Crat Yes

Soc The better painters execute their works, I mean their figures better and the worse execute them worse and of builders also the better sort build fairer houses and the worse build them worse

Crat True

Soc And among legislators there are some who do their work better and some worse?

Crat No there I do not agree with you

Soc Then you do not think that some laws are better and others worse?

Crat No indeed

Soc Or that one name is better than another?

Crat Certainly not

Soc Then all names are rightly imposed?

Crat Yes if they are names at all

Soc Well what do you say to the name of our friend Hermogenes which was mentioned before —assuming that he has nothing of the nature of Hermes in him shall we say that this is a wrong name or not his name at all?

Crat I should reply that Hermogenes is not his name at all but only appears to be his and is really the name of somebody else who has the nature which corresponds to it

Soc And if a man were to call him Hermogenes would he not be even speaking falsely? For there may be a doubt whether you can call him Hermogenes if he is not

Crat What do you mean?

Soc Are you maintaining that falsehood is impossible? For if this is your meaning I should answer that there have been plenty of liars in all ages

Crat Why Socrates how can a man say that which is not?—say something and yet say nothing? For is not falsehood saying the thing which is not?

Soc Your argument friend is too subtle for a man of my age But I should like to know whether you are one of those philosophers who think that falsehood may be spoken but not said?

Crat Neither spoken nor said

Soc Nor uttered nor addressed? For example If a person saluting you in a foreign country were to take your hand and say Hail Athenian stranger Hermogenes son of Smicrion —these words whether spoken said uttered or addressed would have no application to you but only to our friend Hermogenes or perhaps to nobody at all?

Crat In my opinion Socrates the speaker would only be talking nonsense

Soc Well but that will be quite enough for me if you will tell me whether the nonsense would be true or false [430] or partly true and partly false —which is all that I want to know

Crat I should say that he would be putting himself in motion to no purpose and that his words would be an unmeaning sound like the noise of hammering at a brazen pot

Soc But let us see Cratylus whether we can not find a meeting point for you would admit that the name is not the same with the thing named?

Crat I should

Soc And would you further acknowledge that the name is an imitation of the thing?

Crat Certainly

Soc And you would say that pictures are also imitations of things but in another way?

Crat Yes

Soc I believe you may be right but I do not rightly understand you Please to say then whether both sorts of imitation (I mean both pictures or words) are not equally attributable and applicable to the things of which they are the imitation

Crat They are

Soc First look at the matter thus you may attribute the likeness of the man to the man and of the woman to the woman and so on?

Crat Certainly

Soc And conversely you may attribute the likeness of the man to the woman and of the woman to the man?

Crat Very true

Soc And are both modes of assigning them right or only the first?

Crat Only the first

Soc That is to say the mode of assignment which attributes to each that which belongs to them and is like them?

Crat That is my view

Soc Now then as I am desirous that we being friends should have a good understanding about the argument let me state my view to you the first mode of assignment whether applied to figures or to names I call right and when applied to names only true as well as right and the other mode of giving and assigning the name which is unlike I call wrong and in the case of names false as well as wrong

Crat That may be true Socrates in the case of pictures they may be wrongly assigned but not in the case of names—they must be always right

Soc In as far as they are like or in as far as they are unlike?

Crat In as far as they are like

Soc Are they altogether alike?

Crat Yes for the purpose of expressing motion.

Soc And what do you say of the insertion of the λ? for that is expressive not of hardness but of softness

Crat Why perhaps the letter λ is wrongly inserted Socrates, and should be altered into ρ, as you were saying to Hermogenes and in my opinion rightly when you spoke of adding and subtracting letters upon occas on

Soc Good But still the word is intelligible to both of us when I say σκληρος (hard) you know what I mean

Crat Yes my dear friend and the explanation of that is custom

Soc And what is custom but convention? I utter a sound wh ch I understand and you know that I understand the meaning of the sound [435] this is what you are saying?

Crat Yes

Soc And if when I speak you know my meaning there is an indication given by me to you?

Crat Yes.

Soc This ind cation of my meaning may proceed from unlike as well as from like, for example in the λ of σκληροτης But if this is true, then you have made a convention with yourself and the correctness of a name turns out to be convent on since letters wh ch are unlike are indicative equally with those which are like, if they are sanctioned by custom and convent on And even *supposing that you dis*tinguish custom from convention ever so much still you must say that the signification of words is given by custom and not by likeness for custom may ind cate by the unlike as well as by the like But as we are agreed thus far Cratylus (for I shall assume that your silence gives consent) the custom and con ent on must be supposed to contribute to the ind cation of our thoughts for suppose we take the instance of number how can you ever imagine my good fr end that you will find names resembling every individual number unless you allow that which you term convention and agreement to have authority in determining the correctness of names? I quite agree with you that words should as far as possible resemble things but I fear that this dragging in of resemblance as Hermogenes says, is a shabby thing which has to be supplemented by the mechanical aid of convention with a view to correctness for I believe that if we could always or almost always use likenesses, which are perfectly appropriate this would be the most perfect state of language as the opposite *is the most imper*fect But let me ask you what is the force of names and what is the use of them?

Crat The use of names, Socrates, as I should imagine is to inform the simple truth is that he who knows names knows also the things which are expressed by them

Soc I suppose you mean to say Cratylus that as the name is so also is the thing and that he who knows the one will also know the other because they are similars and all similars fall under the same art or *science and there*fore you would say that he who knows names will also know things

Crat That is precisely what I mean

Soc But let us consider what is the nature of this information about things which according to you is given us by names Is it the best sort of information? or is there any other? What do you say?

[436] Crat I believe that to be both the only and the best sort of information about them there can be no other

Soc But do you believe that in the discovery of them he who discovers the names discovers also the things or is this only the method of instruction, and is there some other method of enquiry and discovery

Crat I certainly believe that the methods of enquiry and discovery are of the same nature as instruction

Soc Well but do you not see, Cratylus that he who follows names in the search after things and analyses their meaning is in great danger of being deceived?

Crat How so?

Soc Why clearly he who first gave names gave them according to his conception of the things which they signified—did he not?

Crat True

Soc And if his conception was erroneous, and he gave names according to his conception in what position shall we who are his followers find ourselves? Shall we not be deceived by him?

Crat But, Socrates am I not right in thinking that he must surely have known or else as I was saying his names would not be names at all? And you have a clear proof that he has not missed the truth and the proof is—that he is perfectly consistent Did you ever observe in speaking that all the words which you utter admit that one name may be correctly and an other incorrectly given and do not insist that the name shall be exactly the same with the thing but allow the occasional substitution of a wrong letter and if of a letter also of a noun in a sentence and if of a noun in a sentence also of a sentence which is not appropriate to the matter, and acknowledge that the thing may be named and described so long as the general character of the thing which you are describ ing is retained and this as you will remember [433] was remarked by Hermogenes and my self in the particular instance of the names of the letters

Crat Yes I remember

Soc Good and when the general character is preserved even if some of the proper letters are wanting still the thing is signified —well if all the letters are given not well when only a few of them are given I think that we had better admit this lest we be punished like travellers in Ægina who wander about the street late at night and be likewise told by truth herself that we have arrived too late or if not you must find out some new notion of correctness of names and no longer maintain that a name is the expression of a thing in let ters or syllables for if you say both you will be inconsistent with yourself

Crat I quite acknowledge Socrates what you say to be very reasonable

Soc Then as we are agreed thus far let us ask ourselves whether a name rightly imposed ought not to have the proper letters

Crat Yes

Soc And the proper letters are those which are like the things?

Crat Yes

Soc Enough then of names which are rightly given And in names which are incorrectly given the greater part may be supposed to be made up of proper and similar letters or there would be no likeness but there will be like wise a part which is improper and spoils the beauty and formation of the word you would admit that?

Crat There would be no use Socrates in my quarrelling with you since I cannot be satisfied that a name which is incorrectly given is a name at all

Soc Do you admit a name to be the represen tation of a thing?

Crat Yes I do

Soc But do you not allow that some nouns are primitive and some derived?

Crat Yes I do

Soc Then if you admit that primitive or first nouns are representations of things, is there any better way of framing representations than by assimilating them to the objects as much as you can or do you prefer the notion of Her mogenes and of many others who say that names are conventional and have a meaning to those who have agreed about them and who have previous knowledge of the things in tended by them and that convention is the only principle and whether you abide by our present convention or make a new and opposite one according to which you call small great and great small—that they would say makes no difference if you are only agreed Which of these two notions do you prefer?

[434] Crat Representation by likeness Soc rates is infinitely better than representation by any chance sign

Soc Very good but if the name is to be like the thing the letters out of which the first names are composed must also be like things Return ing to the image of the picture I would ask How could any one ever compose a picture which would be like anything at all if there were not pigments in nature which resembled the things imitated and out of which the pic ture is composed?

Crat Impossible

Soc No more could names ever resemble any actually existing thing unless the original ele ments of which they are compounded bore some degree of resemblance to the objects of which the names are the imitation And the original elements are letters?

Crat Yes

Soc Let me now invite you to consider what Hermogenes and I were saying about sounds Do you agree with me that the letter ρ is ex pressive of rapidity motion and hardness? Were we right or wrong in saying so?

Crat I should say that you were right

Soc And that λ was expressive of smooth ness and softness and the like?

Crat There again you were right

Soc And yet as you are aware that which is called by us σκληροτης is by the Eretrians called σκληροτηρ

Crat Very true

Soc But are the letters ρ and σ equiva lents and is there the same significance to them in the termination ρ, which there is to us in σ or is there no significance to one of us?

Crat Nay surely there is a significance to both of us

others of motion? Were we mistaken?

Crat. But I suppose one of the two not to be names at all.

Soc. And which, then, did he make, my good friend: those which are expressive of rest, or those which are expressive of motion? This is a point which, as I said before, cannot be determined by counting them.

Crat. No; not in that way, Socrates.

Soc. But if thus is a battle of names, some of them asserting that they are like the truth, others contending that they are, how or by what criterion are we to decide between them? For there are no other names to which appeal can be made, but obviously recourse must be had to another standard which, without employing names, will make clear which of the two are right: and this must be a standard which shows the truth of things.

Crat. I agree.

Soc. But if that is true, Cratylus, then I suppose that things may be known without names?

Crat. Clearly.

Soc. But how would you expect to know them? What other way can there be of knowing them, except the true and natural way, through their affinities, when they are akin to each other, and through themselves? For that which is other and different from them must signify something other and different from them.

Crat. What you are saying is, I think, true.

[439] Soc. Well, but reflect; have we not several times acknowledged that names rightly given are the likenesses and images of the things which they name?

Crat. Yes.

Soc. Let us suppose that to any extent you please you can learn things through the medium of names, and suppose also that you can learn them from the things themselves—which is likely to be the nobler and clearer way: to learn of the image, whether the image and the truth of which the image is the expression have been rightly conceived, or to learn of the truth whether the truth and the image of it have been duly executed?

Crat. I should say that we must learn of the truth.

Soc. How real existence is to be studied or discovered is, I suspect, beyond you and me. But we may admit so much, that the knowledge of things is not to be derived from names. No; they must be studied and investigated in themselves.

Crat. Clearly, Socrates.

Soc. There is another point. I should not like us to be imposed upon by the appearance of such a multitude of names, all tending in the same direction. I myself do not deny that the givers of names did really give them under the idea that all things were in motion and flux; which was their sincere but, I think, mistaken opinion. And having fallen into a kind of whirlpool themselves, they are carried round, and want to drag us in after them. There is a matter, master Cratylus, about which I often dream, and should like to ask your opinion: Tell me, whether there is or is not any absolute beauty or good, or any other absolute existence?

Crat. Certainly, Socrates, I think so.

Soc. Then let us seek the true beauty: not asking whether a face is fair, or anything of that sort, for all such things appear to be in a flux; but let us ask whether the true beauty is not always beautiful.

Crat. Certainly.

Soc. And can we rightly speak of a beauty which is always passing away, and is first this and then that; must not the same thing be born and retire and vanish while the word is in our mouths?

Crat. Undoubtedly.

Soc. Then how can that be a real thing which is never in the same state? for obviously things which are the same cannot change while they remain the same; and if they are always the same and in the same state, and never depart from their original form, they can never change or be moved.

Crat. Certainly they cannot.

[440] Soc. Nor yet can they be known by any one; for at the moment that the observer approaches, then they become other and of an other nature, so that you cannot get any further in knowing their nature or state, for you cannot know that which has no state.

Crat. True.

Soc. Nor can we reasonably say, Cratylus, that there is knowledge at all, if everything is in a state of transition and there is nothing abiding; for knowledge too cannot continue to be knowledge unless continuing always to abide and exist. But if the very nature of knowledge changes, at the time when the change occurs there will be no knowledge; and if the transition is always going on, there will always be no knowledge, and, according to this view, there will be no one to know and nothing to be known: but if that which knows and that which is known exist ever, and the beautiful and the good and every other thing also exist, have a common character and purpose?

Soc But that friend Cratylus is no answer For if he did begin in error he may have forced the remainder into agreement with the original error and with himself there would be nothing strange in this any more than in geometrical diagrams which have often a slight and invisible flaw in the first part of the process and are consistently mistaken in the long deductions which follow And this is the reason why every man should expend his chief thought and attention on the consideration of his first principles—are they or are they not rightly laid down? and when he has duly sifted them all the rest will follow Now I should be astonished to find that names are really consistent And here let us revert to our former discussion Were we not saying that all things are in motion and progress and flux and that this idea of motion is expressed by names? Do you not conceive that to be the meaning of them?

Crat Yes, that is assuredly their meaning and the true meaning

[437] Soc Let us revert to επιστημη (knowledge) and observe how ambiguous this word is seeming rather to signify stopping the soul at things than going round with them and therefore we should leave the beginning as at present and not reject the ε (cf 412 A) but make an insertion of an ι instead of an ε (not πιστημη but επιιστημη) Take another example βεβαιον (sure) is clearly the expression of station and position and not of motion Again the word ιστορια (enquiry) bears upon the face of it the stopping (ισταται) of the stream and the word πιστον (faithful) certainly indicates cessation of motion then again μνημη (memory) as any one may see expresses rest in the soul and not motion Moreover words such as αμαρτια and συμφορα which have a bad sense viewed in the light of their etymologies will be the same as συνεσις and επιστημη and other words which have a good sense (cf ομαρτειν συνιεναι επεσθαι συμφερεσθαι) and much the same may be said of αμαθια and ακολασια, for αμαθια may be explained as η αμα θεω ιοντος πορεια and ακολασια as η ακολουθια τοις πραγμασιν Thus the names which in these instances we find to have the worst sense will turn out to be framed on the same principle as those which have the best And any one I believe who would take the trouble might find many other examples in which the giver of names indicates not that things are in motion or progress but that they are at rest which is the opposite of motion

Crat Yes Socrates but observe the greater number express motion

Soc What of that Cratylus? Are we to count them like votes? and is correctness of names the voice of the majority? Are we to say of whichever sort there are most, those are the true ones?

Crat No that is not reasonable

Soc Certainly not But let us have done with this question and proceed to another about which I should like to know whether you think with me Were we not lately acknowledging that the first givers of names in states, both Hellenic and barbarous, were the legislators, and that the art which gave names was the art of the legislator?

Crat Quite true

Soc Tell me then did the first legislators, who were the givers of the first names know or not know the things which they named?

Crat They must have known Socrates

[438] Soc Why yes friend Cratylus they could hardly have been ignorant

Crat I should say not

Soc Let us return to the point from which we digressed You were saying if you remember that he who gave names must have known the things which he named are you still of that opinion?

Crat I am

Soc And would you say that the giver of the first names had also a knowledge of the things which he named?

Crat I should

Soc But how could he have learned or discovered things from names if the primitive names were not yet given? For if we are correct in our view the only way of learning and discovering things is either to discover names for ourselves or to learn them from others

Crat I think that there is a good deal in what you say Socrates

Soc But if things are only to be known through names how can we suppose that the givers of names had knowledge or were legislators before there were names at all and therefore before they could have known them?

Crat I believe Socrates the true account of the matter to be that a power more than human gave things their first names and that the names which are thus given are necessarily their true names

Soc Then how came the giver of the names if he was an inspired being or God to contradict himself? For were we not saying just now that he made some names expressive of rest and

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES, PHAEDRUS. Scene: Under a plane-tree by the banks of the Ilissus

[227] Socrates. My dear Phaedrus, whence come you, and whither are you going?

Phaedrus. I come from Lysias the son of Cephalus, and I am going to take a walk outside the wall, for I have been sitting with him the whole morning; and our common friend Acumenus tells me that it is much more refreshing to walk in the open air than to be shut up in a cloister.

Soc. There he is right. Lysias then, I suppose, was in the town?

Phaedr. Yes, he was staying with Epicrates, here at the house of Morychus; that house which is near the temple of Olympian Zeus.

Soc. And how did he entertain you? Can I be wrong in supposing that Lysias gave you a feast of discourse?

Phaedr. You shall hear, if you can spare time to accompany me.

Soc. And should I not deem the conversation of you and Lysias "a thing of higher import," as I may say in the words of Pindar, "than any business"?

Phaedr. Will you go on?

Soc. And will you go on with the narration?

Phaedr. My tale, Socrates, is one of your sort, for love was the theme which occupied us—love after a fashion: Lysias has been writing about a fair youth who was being tempted, but not by a lover; and this was the point: he ingeniously proved that the non-lover should be accepted rather than the lover.

Soc. O that is noble of him! I wish that he would say the poor man rather than the rich, and the old man rather than the young one;—then he would meet the case of me and of many a man; his words would be quite refreshing, and he would be a public benefactor. For my part, I do so long to hear his speech, that if you walk all the way to Megara, and when you have reached the wall come back, as Herodicus recommends, without going in, I will keep you company.

Phaedr. What do you mean, my good Socrates? How can you imagine that my unpractised memory can do justice to an elaborate work, [228] which the greatest rhetorician of the age spent a long time in composing. Indeed, I cannot; I would give a great deal if I could.

Soc. I believe that I know Phaedrus about as well as I know myself, and I am very sure that the speech of Lysias was repeated to him, not once only, but again and again;—he insisted on hearing it many times over and Lysias was very willing to gratify him; at last, when nothing else would do, he got hold of the book, and looked at what he most wanted to see,—this occupied him during the whole morning;—and then when he was tired with sitting, he went out to take a walk, not until, by the dog, as I believe, he had simply learned by heart the entire discourse, unless it was unusually long, and he went to a place outside the wall that he might practise his lesson. There he saw a certain lover of discourse who had a similar weakness;—he saw and rejoiced; now thought he, I shall have a partner in my revels. And he invited him to come and walk with him. But when the lover of discourse begged that he would repeat the tale, he gave himself airs and said, "No I cannot," as if he were indisposed; although, if the hearer had refused, then I do not think that they can resemble a process or flux as we were just now supposing Whether there is this eternal nature in things or whether the truth is what Heracleitus and his followers and many others say, is a question hard to determine and no man of sense will like to put himself or the education of his mind in the power of names neither will he so far trust names or the givers of names as to be confident in any knowledge which condemns himself and other existences to an unhealthy state of unreality he will not believe that all things leak like a pot or imagine that the world is a man who has a running at the nose This may be true Cratylus but is also very likely to be untrue and therefore I would not have you be too easily persuaded of it Reflect well and like a man and do not easily accept such a doctrine for you are young and of an age to learn And when you have found the truth, come and tell me

Crat I will do as you say though I can assure you Socrates that I have been considering the matter already and the result of a great deal of trouble and consideration is that I incline to Heracleitus

Soc Then another day my friend when you come back you shall give me a lesson but at present go into the country as you are intending, and Hermogenes shall set you on your way

Crat Very good Socrates I hope, however that you will continue to think about these things yourself

PHAEDRUS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES; PHAEDRUS. Scene: Under a plane tree by the banks of the Ilissus

[227] Socrates. My dear Phaedrus, whence come you, and whither are you going?

he would sooner or later have been compelled by him to listen whether he would or no There fore Phaedrus bid him do at once what he will soon do whether bidden or not

Phaedr I see that you will not let me off until I speak in some fashion or other verily therefore my best plan is to speak as I best can

Soc A very true remark, that of yours

Phaedr I will do as I say but believe me, Socrates I did not learn the very words—O no nevertheless I have a general notion of what he said and will give you a summary of the points in which the lover differed from the non lover Let me begin at the beginning

Soc Yes my sweet one but you must first of all show what you have in your left hand under your cloak for that roll as I suspect is the actual discourse Now much as I love you I would not have you suppose that I am going to have your memory exercised at my expense if you have Lysias himself here

Phaedr Enough I see that I have no hope of practising my art upon you But if I am to read where would you please to sit? [229]

Soc Let us turn aside and go by the Ilissus we will sit down at some quiet spot

Phaedr I am fortunate in not having my sandals and as you never have any I think that we may go along the brook and cool our feet in the water this will be the easiest way and at midday and in the summer is far from being unpleasant

Soc Lead on and look out for a place in which we can sit down

Phaedr Do you see the tallest plane tree in the distance?

Soc Yes

Phaedr There are shade and gentle breezes and grass on which we may either sit or lie down

Soc Move forward

Phaedr I should like to know Socrates whether the place is not somewhere here at which Boreas is said to have carried off Orithyia from the banks of the Ilissus?

Soc Such is the tradition

Phaedr And is this the exact spot? The little stream is delightfully clear and bright I can fancy that there might be maidens playing near

Soc I believe that the spot is not exactly here but about a quarter of a mile lower down where you cross to the temple of Artemis and there is I think some sort of an altar of Boreas at the place

Phaedr I have never noticed it but I beseech you to tell me, Socrates, do you believe this tale?

Soc The wise are doubtful and I should not be singular if like them I too doubted. I might have a rational explanation that Orithyia was playing with Pharmacia when a northern gust carried her over the neighbouring rocks and this being the manner of her death she was said to have been carried away by Boreas. There is a discrepancy however about the locality according to another version of the story she was taken from Areopagus and not from this place Now I quite acknowledge that these allegories are very nice but he is not to be envied who has to invent them much labour and ingenuity will be required of him and when he has once begun he must go on and rehabilitate Hippocentaurs and chimeras dire. Gorgons and winged steeds flow in apace and numberless other inconceivable and portentous natures And if he is sceptical about them and would fain reduce them one after another to the rules of probability this sort of crude philosophy will take up a great deal of time Now I have no leisure for such enquiries shall I tell you why? I must first know myself as the Delphian inscription says [230] to be curious about that which is not my concern while I am still in ignorance of my own self would be ridiculous And therefore I bid farewell to all this the common opinion is enough for me. For as I was saying I want to know not about this but about myself am I a monster more complicated and swollen with passion than the serpent Typho or a creature of a gentler and simpler sort to whom Nature has given a diviner and lowlier destiny? But let me ask you, friend have we not reached the plane tree to which you were conducting us?

Phaedr Yes this is the tree

Soc By Herè, a fair resting place full of summer sounds and scents Here is this lofty and spreading plane tree and the agnus castus high and clustering in the fullest blossom and the greatest fragrance and the stream which flows beneath the plane tree is deliciously cold to the feet Judging from the ornaments and images, this must be a spot sacred to Achelous and the Nymphs How delightful is the breeze —so very sweet and there is a sound in the air shrill and summerlike which makes answer to the chorus of the cicadae But the greatest charm of all is the grass like a pillow gently sloping to the head My dear Phaedrus you have been an admirable guide

Phaedr What an incomprehensible being

you are Socrates when you are in the country as you say you really are like some stranger who is led about by a guide Do you ever cross the border? I rather think that you never venture even outside the gates

Soc Very true, my good friend and I hope that you will excuse me when you hear the reason which is that I am a lover of knowledge, and the men who dwell in the city are my teachers, and not the trees or the country Though I do indeed believe that you have found a spell with which to draw me out of the city into the country like a hungry cow before whom a bough or a bunch of fruit is waved For only hold up before me in like manner a book, and you may lead me all round Attica and over the wide world And now having arrived I intend to lie down and do you choose any posture in which you can read best Begin

Phaedr Listen You know how matters stand with me and how as I conceive, [231] this affair may be arranged for the advantage of both of us And I maintain that I ought not to fail in my suit, because I am not your lover for lovers repent of the kindnesses which they have shown when their passion ceases but to the non lovers who are free and not under any compulsion no time of repentance ever comes for they confer their benefits according to the measure of their ability in the way which is most conducive to their own interest Then again, lovers consider how by reason of their love they have neglected their own concerns and rendered service to others and when to these benefits conferred they add on the troubles which they have endured they think that they have long ago made to the beloved a very ample return But the non lover has no such tormenting recollections he has never neglected his affairs or quarrelled with his relations he has no troubles to add up or excuse to invent and being well rid of all these evils why should he not freely do what will gratify the beloved?

If you say that the lover is more to be esteemed because his love is thought to be greater for he is willing to say and do what is hateful to other men in order to please his beloved —that if true is only a proof that he will prefer any future love to his present, and will injure his old love at the pleasure of the new And how in a matter of such infinite importance, can a man be right in trusting himself to one who is afflicted with a malady which no experienced person would attempt to cure for the patient himself admits that he is not in his right mind and acknowledges that he is wrong in his mind but says that he is unable to control himself? And if he came to his right mind would he ever imagine that the desires were good which he conceived when in his wrong mind? Once more there are many more non-lovers than lovers and if you choose the best of the lovers, you will not have many to choose from but if from the non lovers, the choice will be larger and you will be far more likely to find among them a person who is worthy of your friendship If public opinion be your dread and you would avoid reproach in all probability the lover who is always thinking that other men are as emulous of him as he is of [232] them will boast to some one of his successes, and make a show of them openly in the pride of his heart —he wants others to know that his labour has not been lost but the non lover is more his own master and is desirous of solid good and not of the opinion of mankind Again the lover may be generally noted or seen following the beloved (this is his regular occupation) and whenever they are observed to exchange two words they are supposed to meet about some affair of love either past or in contemplation but when non lovers meet, no one asks the reason why because people know that talking to another is natural whether friendship or mere pleasure be the motive

Once more, if you fear the fickleness of friendship consider that in any other case a quarrel might be a mutual calamity but now when you have given up what is most precious to you you will be the greater loser and therefore, you will have more reason in being afraid of the lover for his vexations are many and he is always fancying that every one is leagued against him Wherefore also he debars his beloved from society he will not have you intimate with the wealthy lest they should exceed him in wealth or with men of education lest they should be his superiors in understanding and he is equally afraid of anybody's influence who has any other advantage over himself If he can persuade you to break with them you are left without a friend in the world or if out of a regard to your own interest you have more sense than to comply with his desire, you will have to quarrel with him But those who are non lovers, and whose success in love is the reward of their merit, will not be jealous of the companions of their beloved and will rather hate those who refuse to be his associates thinking that their favour is slighted by the latter and benefited by the former for more love than hatred may be expected to come to him out of his friendship with others Many lovers too have loved the person of a youth before they knew his character or his b longings so that when their passion has pa sed away there is no knowing whether they will continue to be his friends, [233] whereas in the case of non lovers who were always friends the friendship is not lessened by the favours granted but the recollection of these remains with them and is an earnest of good things to come

Further I say that you are likely to be im proved by me whereas the lover will spoil you For they praise your words and actions in a wrong way partly because they are afraid of offending you and also their judgment is weakened by passion Such are the feats which love exhibits he makes things painful to the disappointed which give no pain to others he compels the successful lover to praise what ought not to give him pleasure and therefore the beloved is to be pitied rather than envied But if you listen to me in the first place I in my intercourse with you shall not merely re gard present enjoyment but also future ad vantage being not mastered by love but my own master nor for small causes taking violent dislikes but even when the cause is great slow ly laying up little wrath—unintentional of fences I shall forgive and intentional ones I shall try to prevent and these are the marks of a friendship which will last

Do you think that a lover only can be a firm friend? reflect —if this were true we should set small value on sons or fathers or mothers nor should we ever have loyal friends for our love of them arises not from passion but from other associations Further if we ought to shower favours on those who are the most eager suitors —on that principle we ought al ways to do good not to the most virtuous but to the most needy for they are the persons who will be most relieved and will therefore be the most grateful and when you make a feast you should invite not your friend but the beggar and the empty soul for they will love you and attend you and come about your doors and will be the best pleased and the most grateful and will invoke many a blessing on your head Yet surely you ought not to be granting favours to those who besiege you with prayer but to those who are best able to reward you nor to the lover only but to those who are worthy of love nor to those who will enjoy the bloom of your youth [234] but to those who will share their possessions with you in age nor to those who, having succeeded will glory in their suc cess to others, but to those who will be modest and tell no tales nor to those who care about you for a moment only but to tho e who will continue your friends through life nor to those who when their passion is over will pick a quarrel with you but rather to those who, when the charm of youth has left you will show their own virtue Remember what I have said and consider yet this further point friends admonish the lover under the idea that his way of life is bad but no one of his kindred ever yet censured the non lover or thought that he was ill advised about his own interests

Perhaps you will ask me whether I propose that you should indulge every non lover To which I reply that not even the lover would ad vise you to indulge all lovers for the indiscrim inate favour is less esteemed by the rational recipient and less easily hidden by him who would escape the censure of the world Now love ought to be for the advantage of both par ties and for the injury of neither

I believe that I have said enough but if there is anything more which you desire or which in your opinion needs to be supplied ask and I will answer

Now Socrates what do you think? Is not the discourse excellent more especially in the mat ter of the language?

Soc Yes quite admirable the effect on me was ravishing And this I owe to you Phae drus for I observed you while reading to be in an ecstasy and thinking that you are more ex perienced in these matters than I am I fol lowed your example and like you my divine darling I became inspired with a phrenzy

Phaedr Indeed you are pleased to be merry

Soc Do you mean that I am not in earnest?

Phaedr Now don t talk in that way Socra tes but let me have your real opinion I adjure you by Zeus the god of friendship to tell me whether you think that any Hellene could have said more or spoken better on the same subject

Soc Well but are you and I expected to praise the sentiments of the author or only the clearness and roundness and finish and tour nure of the language? As to the first I willingly submit to your better judgment [235] for I am not worthy to form an opinion having only at tended to the rhetorical manner and I was doubting whether this could have been defend ed even by Lysias himself I thought though I speak under correction that he repeated him self two or three times either from want of words or from want of pains and also, he appeared to me ostentatiously to exult in showing how well he could say the same thing in two or three ways

Phaedr Nonsense Socrates what you call repetition was the especial merit of the speech for he omitted no topic of which the subject rightly allowed and I do not think that any one could have spoken better or more exhaustively

Soc There I cannot go along with you Ancient sages, men and women, who have spoken and written of these things would rise up in judgment against me, if out of complaisance I assented to you.

Phaedr Who are they and where did you hear anything better than this?

Soc I am sure that I must have heard but at this moment I do not remember from whom perhaps from Sappho the fair or Anacreon the wise or possibly from a prose writer Why do I say so? Why because I perceive that my bosom is full and that I could make another speech as good as that of Lysias, and different. Now I am certain that this is not an invention of my own, who am well aware that I know nothing and therefore I can only infer that I have been filled through the ears, like a pitcher from the waters of another though I have actually forgotten in my stupidity who was my informant

Phaedr That is grand —but never mind where you heard the discourse or from whom let that be a mystery not to be divulged even at my earnest desire Only as you say promise to make another and better oration equal in length and entirely new on the same subject and I like the nine Archons, will promise to set up a golden image at Delphi not only of myself, but of you and as large as life

Soc You are a dear golden ass if you suppose me to mean that Lysias has altogether missed the mark, and that I can make a speech from which all his arguments are to be excluded The worst of authors will say something which is to the point Who for example, [236] could speak on this thesis of yours without praising the discretion of the non lover and blaming the indiscretion of the lover? These are the commonplaces of the subject which must come in (for what else is there to be said?) and must be allowed and excused the only merit is in the arrangement of them for there can be none in the invention but when you leave the commonplaces, then there may be some originality

Phaedr I admit that there is reason in what you say and I too will be reasonable, and will allow you to start with the premiss that the lover is more disordered in his wits than the non lover if in what remains you make a longer and better speech than Lysias, and use other arguments, then I say again that a statue you shall have of beaten gold and take your place by the colossal offerings of the Cypselids at Olympia

Soc How profoundly in earnest is the lover because to tease him I lay a finger upon his love! And so, Phaedrus, you really imagine that I am going to improve upon the ingenuity of Lysias?

Phaedr There I have you as you had me, and you must just speak as you best can " Do not let us exchange tu quoque as in a farce or compel me to say to you as you said to me, "I know Socrates as well as I know myself and he was wanting to speak, but he gave himself airs. Rather I would have you consider that from this place we stir not until you have unbosomed yourself of the speech for here are we all alone, and I am stronger remember and younger than you —Wherefore perpend, and do not compel me to use violence

Soc But, my sweet Phaedrus, how ridiculous it would be of me to compete with Lysias in an extempore speech! He is a master in his art and I am an untaught man

Phaedr You see how matters stand and therefore let there be no more pretences for indeed, I know the word that is irresistible.

Soc Then don t say it.

Phaedr Yes, but I will and my word shall be an oath I say or rather swear"—but what god will be witness of my oath?— By this plane tree I swear that unless you repeat the discourse here in the face of this very plane tree I will never tell you another never let you have word of another!

Soc Villain! I am conquered the poor lover of discourse has no more to say Phaedr Then why are you still at your tricks?

Soc I am not going to play tricks now that you have taken the oath, for I cannot allow myself to be starved

Phaedr Proceed

[237] Soc Shall I tell you what I will do?

Phaedr What?

Soc I will veil my face and gallop through the discourse as fast as I can for if I see you I shall feel ashamed and not know what to say

Phaedr Only go on and you may do any thing else which you please

Soc Come O ye Muses melodious as ye are called whether you have received this name from the character of your strains, or be cause the Melians are a musical race help O help me in the tale which my good friend here desires me to rehearse in order that his friend whom he always deemed wise may seem to him to be wiser than ever

Once upon a time there was a fair boy or more properly speaking a youth he was very fair and had a great many lovers and there was one special cunning one who had per suaded the youth that he did not love him but he really loved him all the same and one day when he was paying his addresses to him he used this very argument—that he ought to ac cept the non lover rather than the lover, his words were as follows —

All good counsel begins in the same way a man should know what he is advising about or his counsel will all come to nought But peo ple imagine that they know about the nature of things when they don t know about them and not having come to an understanding at first because they think that they know they end as might be expected in contradicting one an other and themselves Now you and I must not be guilty of this fundamental error which we condemn in others but as our question is whether the lover or non lover is to be pre ferred let us first of all agree in defining the nature and power of love and then keeping our eyes upon the definition and to this appeal ing let us further enquire whether love brings advantage or disadvantage

Every one sees that love is a desire and we know also that non lovers desire the beautiful and good Now in what way is the lover to be distinguished from the non lover? Let us note that in every one of us there are two guiding and ruling principles which lead us whither they will one is the natural desire of pleasure the other is an acquired opinion which aspires after the best and these two are sometimes in harmony and then again at war and some times the one sometimes the other conquers When opinion by the help of reason leads us to the best the conquering principle is called temperance [238] but when desire which is devoid of reason rules in us and drags us to pleasure that power of misrule is called excess Now excess has many names and many mem bers and many forms, and any of these forms when very marked gives a name neither hon ourable nor creditable to the bearer of the name. The desire of eating for example which gets the better of the higher reason and the other desires is called gluttony and he who is possessed by it is called a glutton the tyrannical desire of drink which inclines the possessor of the desire to drink has a name which is only too obvious and there can be as little doubt by what name any other appetite of the same family would be called —it will be the name of that which happens to be dominant And now I think that you will perceive the drift of my discourse but as every spoken word is in a manner plainer than the unspoken I had bet ter say further that the irrational desire which overcomes the tendency of opinion towards right and is led away to the enjoyment of beauty and especially of personal beauty by the desires which are her own kindred—that supreme desire I say which by leading con quers and by the force of passion is reinforced, from this very force receiving a name, is called love (ερρωμενως ερως)

And now, dear Phaedrus I shall pause for an instant to ask whether you do not think me, as I appear to myself inspired?

Phaedr Yes So rates you seem to have a very unusual flow of words

Soc Listen to me then in silence for surely the place is holy so that you must not wonder if as I proceed I appear to be in a divine fury for already I am getting into dithyrambics

Phaedr Nothing can be truer

Soc The responsibility rests with you But hear what follows and perhaps the fit may be averted all is in their hands above I will go on talking to my youth Listen

Thus my friend we have declared and de fined the nature of the subject Keeping the definition in view let us now enquire what ad vantage or disadvantage is likely to ensue from the lover or the non lover to him who accepts their advances

He who is the victim of his passions and the slave of pleasure will of course desire to make his beloved as agreeable to himself as possible. Now to him who has a mind diseased anything is agreeable which is not opposed to him but that which is equal or superior is hateful to him and therefore the lover will not brook any superiority or equality on the part of his be loved [239] he is always employed in reduc ing him to inferiority And the ignorant is the inferior of the wise the coward of the brave, the slow of speech of the speaker the dull of the clever These and not these only are the mental defects of the beloved —defects which when implanted by nature are necessarily a de light to the lover and when not implanted, he must contrive to implant them in him, if he would not be deprived of his fleeting joy And therefore he cannot help being jealous, and will debar his beloved from the advantages of society which would make a man of him, and especially from that society which would have given him wisdom, and thereby he cannot fail to do him great harm. That is to say in his excessive fear lest he should come to be despised in his eyes he will be compelled to banish from him divine philosophy and there is no greater injury which he can inflict upon him than this. He will contrive that his beloved shall be wholly ignorant, and in everything shall look to him he is to be the delight of the lover's heart, and a curse to himself Verily a lover is a profitable guardian and associate for him in all that relates to his mind.

Let us next see how his master whose law of life is pleasure and not good, will keep and train the body of his servant. Will he not choose a beloved who is delicate rather than sturdy and strong? One brought up in shady bowers and not in the bright sun a stranger to manly exercises and the sweat of toil, accustomed only to a soft and luxurious diet, instead of the hues of health having the colours of paint and ornament, and the rest of a piece?—such a life as any one can imagine and which I need not detail at length But I may sum up all that I have to say in a word, and pass on Such a person in war or in any of the great crises of life, will be the anxiety of his friends and also of his lover and certainly not the terror of his enemies which nobody can deny

And now let us tell what advantage or disadvantage the beloved will receive from the guardianship and society of his lover in the matter of his property this is the next point to be considered The lover will be the first to see what, indeed, will be sufficiently evident to all men, that he desires above all things to deprive his beloved of his dearest and best and holiest possessions, [240] father mother kindred, friends, of all whom he thinks may be hinderers or reprovers of their most sweet converse he will even cast a jealous eye upon his gold and silver or other property because these make him a less easy prey and when caught less manageable hence he is of necessity displeased at his possession of them and rejoices at their loss and he would like him to be wifeless, childless, homeless, as well and the longer the better for the longer he is all this, the longer he will enjoy him.

There are some sort of animals, such as flatterers, who are dangerous and mischievous enough, and yet nature has mingled a temporary pleasure and grace in their composition You may say that a courtesan is hurtful, and disapprove of such creatures and their practices, and yet for the time they are very pleasant. But the lover is not only hurtful to his love he is also an extremely disagreeable companion The old proverb says that "birds of a feather flock together" I suppose that equality of years inclines them to the same pleasures, and similarity begets friendship yet you may have more than enough even of this and verily constraint is always said to be grievous. Now the lover is not only unlike his beloved, but he forces himself upon him. For he is old and his love is young, and neither day nor night will he leave him if he can help necessity and the sting of desire drive him on, and allure him with the pleasure which he receives from seeing hearing touching perceiving him in every way And therefore he is delighted to fasten upon him and to minister to him. But what pleasure or consolation can the beloved be receiving all this time? Must he not feel the extremity of disgust when he looks at an old shrivelled face and the remainder to match, which even in a description is disagreeable, and quite detestable when he is forced into daily contact with his lover moreover he is jealously watched and guarded against everything and everybody and has to hear misplaced and exaggerated praises of himself, and censures equally inappropriate, which are intolerable when the man is sober and, besides being intolerable, are published all over the world in all their indelicacy and wearisomeness when he is drunk

And not only while his love continues is he mischievous and unpleasant, but when his love ceases he becomes a perfidious enemy of him on whom he showered his oaths and prayers and promises, [241] and yet could hardly prevail upon him to tolerate the tedium of his company even from motives of interest. The hour of payment arrives, and now he is the servant of another master instead of love and infatuation, wisdom and temperance are his bosom's lords but the beloved has not discovered the change which has taken place in him, when he asks for a return and recalls to his recollection former sayings and doings he believes himself to be speaking to the same person, and the other not having the courage to confess the truth, and not knowing how to fulfil the oaths and promises which he made when under the dominion of folly and having now grown wise and temperate does not want to do as he did or to be as he was before And so he runs away and is constrained to be a defaulter the oyster shell has fallen with the other side uppermost—he changes pursuit into flight while the other is compelled to follow him with passion and imprecation not knowing that he ought never from the first to have accepted a demented lover instead of a sensible non lover and that in making such a choice he was giving himself up to a faithless morose envious disagreeable being hurtful to his estate hurtful to his bodily health and still more hurtful to the cultivation of his mind than which there neither is nor ever will be anything more honoured in the eyes both of gods and men Consider this fair youth and know that in the friendship of the lover there is no real kindness he has an appetite and wants to feed upon you

As wolves love lambs so lovers love their loves

But I told you so I am speaking in verse and therefore I had better make an end enough

Pha dr I thought that you were only half way and were going to make a similar speech about all the advantages of accepting the non lover Why do you not proceed?

Soc Does not your simplicity observe that I have got out of dithyrambics into heroics when only uttering a censure on the lover? And if I am to add the praises of the non lover what will become of me? Do you not perceive that I am already overtaken by the Nymphs to whom you have mischievously exposed me? And therefore I will only add that the non lover has all the advantages in which the lover is accused of being deficient And now I will say no more there has been enough of both of them Leaving the tale to its fate [242] I will cross the river and make the best of my way home lest a worse thing be inflicted upon me by you

Phaedr Not yet Socrates not until the heat of the day has passed do you not see that the hour is almost noon? there is the midday sun standing still as people say in the meridian Let us rather stay and talk over what has been said and then return in the cool

Soc Your love of discourse Phaedrus is superhuman simply marvellous and I do not believe that there is any one of your contemporaries who has either made or in one way or another has compelled others to make an equal number of speeches I would except Simmias the Theban but all the rest are far behind you And now I do verily believe that you have been the cause of another

Phaedr That is good news But what do you mean?

Soc I mean to say that as I was about to cross the stream the usual sign was given to me—that sign which always forbids but never bids, me to do anything which I am going to do and I thought that I heard a voice saying in my ear that I had been guilty of impiety and that I must not go away until I had made an atonement Now I am a diviner though not a very good one but I have enough religion for my own use, as you might say of a bad writer—his writing is good enough for him and I am beginning to see that I was in error O my friend, how prophetic is the human soul! At the time I had a sort of misgiving and like Ibycus I was troubled I feared that I might be buying honour from men at the price of sinning against the gods Now I recognize my error

Phaedr What error?

Soc That was a dreadful speech which you brought with you and you made me utter one as bad

Phaedr How so?

Soc It was foolish I say—to a certain extent impious can anything be more dreadful?

Phaedr Nothing if the speech was really such as you describe

Soc Well and is not Eros the son of Aphrodite and a god?

Phaedr So men say

Soc But that was not acknowledged by Lysias in his speech nor by you in that other speech which you by a charm drew from my lips For if love be as he surely is a divinity he cannot be evil Yet this was the error of both the speeches There was also a simplicity about them which was refreshing [243] having no truth or honesty in them nevertheless they pretended to be something hoping to succeed in deceiving the manikins of earth and gain celebrity among them Wherefore I must have a purgation And I bethink me of an ancient purgation of mythological error which was devised not by Homer for he never had the wit to discover why he was blind but by Stesichorus who was a philosopher and knew the reason why and therefore when he lost his eyes, for that was the penalty which was inflicted upon him for reviling the lovely Helen he at once purged himself And the purgation was a recantation which began thus,—

[1] In allusion to a game in which two parties fled or pursued according as an oyster shell which was thrown into the air fell with the dark or light side uppermost.

False is that word of mine—the truth is that thou didst not embark in ships nor ever go to the walls of Troy and when he had completed his poem which is called the recantation immediately his sight returned to him Now I will be wiser than either Stesichorus or Homer in that I am going to make my recantation for reviling love before I suffer and this I will attempt, not as before veiled and ashamed, but with forehead bold and bare

Phaedr Nothing could be more agreeable to me than to hear you say so

Soc Only think, my good Phaedrus, what an utter want of delicacy was shown in the two discourses I mean in my own and in that which you recited out of the book Would not any one who was himself of a noble and gentle nature, and who loved or ever had loved a nature like his own when we tell of the petty causes of lovers jealousies and of their exceeding animosities, and of the injuries which they do to their beloved have imagined that our ideas of love were taken from some haunt of sailors to which good manners were unknown —he would certainly never have admitted the justice of our censure?

Phaedr I dare say not Socrates

Soc Therefore because I blush at the thought of this person and also because I am afraid of Love himself I desire to wash the brine out of my ears with water from the spring and I would counsel Lysias not to delay but to write another discourse which shall prove that ceteris paribus the lover ought to be accepted rather than the non lover

Phaedr Be assured that he shall You shall speak the praises of the lover and Lysias shall be compelled by me to write another discourse on the same theme.

Soc You will be true to your nature in that and therefore I believe you

Phaedr Speak, and fear not

Soc But where is the fair youth whom I was addressing before, and who ought to listen now lest, if he hear me not, he should accept a non lover before he knows what he is doing?

Phaedr He is close at hand, and always at your service

Soc Know then fair youth that the former discourse was the word of Phaedrus, [244] the son of Vain Man who dwells in the city of Myrrhina (Myrrhinusius) And this which I am about to utter is the recantation of Stesichorus the son of Godly Man (Euphemus) who comes from the town of Desire (Himera) and is to the following effect I told a lie when I said that the beloved ought to accept the non lover when he might have the lover because the one is sane, and the other mad It might be so if madness were simply an evil but there is also a madness which is a divine gift, and the source of the chiefest blessings granted to men For prophecy is a madness and the prophetess at Delphi and the priestesses at Dodona when out of their senses have conferred great benefits on Hellas both in public and private life, but when in their senses few or none. And I might also tell you how the Sibyl and other inspired persons have given to many an one many an intimation of the future which has saved them from falling But it would be tedious to speak of what every one knows

There will be more reason in appealing to the ancient inventors of names who would never have connected prophecy (μαντική) which foretells the future and is the noblest of arts with madness (μανική) or called them both by the same name, if they had deemed madness to be a disgrace or dishonour —they must have thought that there was an inspired madness which was a noble thing for the two words μαντική and μανική are really the same, and the letter τ is only a modern and tasteless insertion And this is confirmed by the name which was given by them to the rational investigation of futurity whether made by the help of birds or of other signs—this for as much as it is an art which supplies from the reasoning faculty mind (νοῦς) and information (ἱστορία) to human thought (οἴησις) they originally termed οἰονοιστική but the word has been lately altered and made sonorous by the modern introduction of the letter Omega (οἰωνιστική and οἰωνιστική) and in proportion as prophecy (μαντική) is more perfect and august than augury both in name and fact in the same proportion as the ancients testify is madness superior to a sane mind (σωφροσύνη) for the one is only of human but the other of divine origin Again, where plagues and mightiest woes have bred in certain families owing to some ancient blood guiltiness there madness has entered with holy prayers and rites, and by inspired utterances found a way of deliverance for those who are in need and he who has part in this gift, and is truly possessed and duly out of his mind is by the use of purifications and mysteries made whole and except from evil future as well as present and has a release from the calamity which was afflicting him [245] The third kind is the madness of those who are possessed by the Muses which taking hold of a delicate and virgin soul and there inspiring frenzy awakens lyrical and all other numbers with these adorning the myriad actions of ancient heroes for the instruction of posterity But he who having no touch of the Muses madness in his soul comes to the door and thinks that he will get into the temple by the help of art—he I say and his poetry are not admitted the sane man disappears and is nowhere when he enters into rivalry with the madman

I might tell of many other noble deeds which have sprung from inspired madness And therefore let no one frighten or flutter us by saying that the temperate friend is to be chosen rather than the inspired but let him further show that love is not sent by the gods for any good to lover or beloved if he can do so we will allow him to carry off the palm And we on our part will prove in answer to him that the madness of love is the greatest of heaven s blessings and the proof shall be one which the wise will receive and the witling disbelieve But first of all let us view the affections and actions of the soul divine and human and try to ascertain the truth about them The beginning of our proof is as follows —

The soul through all her being is immortal for that which is ever in motion is immortal but that which moves another and is moved by another in ceasing to move ceases also to live Only the self moving never leaving self never ceases to move and is the fountain and beginning of motion to all that moves besides Now the beginning is unbegotten for that which is begotten has a beginning but the beginning is begotten of nothing for if it were begotten of something then the begotten would not come from a beginning But if unbegotten it must also be indestructible for if beginning were destroyed there could be no beginning out of anything nor anything out of a beginning and all things must have a beginning And therefore the self moving is the beginning of motion and this can neither be destroyed nor begotten else the whole heavens and all creation would collapse and stand still and never again have motion or birth But if the self moving is proved to be immortal he who affirms that self motion is the very idea and essence of the soul will not be put to confusion For the body which is moved from without is soulless but that which is moved from within has a soul for such is the nature of the soul But if this be true must not the soul be the self moving and therefore of necessity unbegotten and immortal? [246] Enough of the soul s immortality

Of the nature of the soul though her true form be ever a theme of large and more than mortal discourse let me speak briefly and in a figure And let the figure be composite—a pair of winged horses and a charioteer Now the winged horses and the charioteers of the gods are all of them noble and of noble descent but those of other races are mixed the human charioteer drives his in a pair and one of them is noble and of noble breed and the other is ignoble and of ignoble breed and the driving of them of necessity gives a great deal of trouble to him I will endeavour to explain to you in what way the mortal differs from the immortal creature The soul in her totality has the care of inanimate being everywhere and traverses the whole heaven in divers forms appearing —when perfect and fully winged she soars upward and orders the whole world whereas the imperfect soul losing her wings and drooping in her flight at last settles on the solid ground—there finding a home she receives an earthly frame which appears to be self moved but is really moved by her power and this composition of soul and body is called a living and mortal creature For immortal no such union can be reasonably believed to be although fancy not having seen nor surely known the nature of God may imagine an immortal creature having both a body and also a soul which are united throughout all time Let that however be as God wills and be spoken of acceptably to him And now let us ask the reason why the soul loses her wings!

The wing is the corporeal element which is most akin to the divine and which by nature tends to soar aloft and carry that which gravitates downwards into the upper region which is the habitation of the gods The divine is beauty wisdom goodness and the like and by these the wing of the soul is nourished and grows apace but when fed upon evil and foulness and the opposite of good wastes and falls away Zeus the mighty lord holding the reins of a winged chariot leads the way in heaven ordering all and taking care of all and there follows him the array of gods and demigods [247] marshalled in eleven bands Hestia alone abides at home in the house of heaven of the rest they who are reckoned among the princely twelve march in their appointed order. They see many blessed sights in the inner heaven, and there are many ways to and fro along which the blessed gods are passing, every one doing his own work; he may follow who will and can, for jealousy has no place in the celestial choir. But when they go to banquet and festival, then they move up the steep to the top of the vault of heaven. The chariots of the gods in even poise, obeying the rein, glide rapidly; but the others labour, for the vicious steed goes heavily, weighing down the charioteer to the earth when his steed has not been thoroughly trained:—and this is the hour of agony and extremest conflict for the soul. For the immortals, when they are at the end of their course, go forth and stand upon the outside of heaven, and the revolution of the spheres carries them round, and they behold the things beyond. But of the heaven which is above the heavens, what earthly poet ever did or ever will sing worthily? It is such as I will describe; for I must dare to speak the truth, when truth is my theme. There abides the very being with which true knowledge is concerned; the colourless, formless, intangible essence, visible only to mind, the pilot of the soul. The divine intelligence, being nurtured upon mind and pure knowledge, and the intelligence of every soul which is capable of receiving the food proper to it, rejoices at beholding reality, and once more gazing upon truth, is replenished and made glad, until the revolution of the worlds brings her round again to the same place. In the revolution she beholds justice, and temperance, and knowledge absolute, not in the form of generation or of relation, which men call existence, but knowledge absolute in existence absolute; and beholding the other true existences in like manner, and feasting upon them, she passes down into the interior of the heavens and returns home; and there the charioteer putting up his horses at the stall, gives them ambrosia to eat and nectar to drink.

[248] Such is the life of the gods; but of other souls, that which follows God best and is likest to him lifts the head of the charioteer into the outer world, and is carried round in the revolution, troubled indeed by the steeds, and with difficulty beholding true being; while another only rises and falls, and sees, and again fails to see by reason of the unruliness of the steeds. The rest of the souls are also longing after the upper world and they all follow, but not being strong enough they are carried round below the surface, plunging, treading on one another, each striving to be first; and there is confusion and perspiration and the extremity of effort; and many of them are lamed or have their wings broken through the ill-driving of the charioteers; and all of them after a fruitless toil, not having attained to the mysteries of true being, go away, and feed upon opinion. The reason why the souls exhibit this exceeding eagerness to behold the plain of truth is that pasturage is found there, which is suited to the highest part of the soul; and the wing on which the soul soars is nourished with this. And there is a law of Destiny, that the soul which attains any vision of truth in company with a god is preserved from harm until the next period, and if attaining always is always unharmed. But when she is unable to follow, and fails to behold the truth, and through some ill-hap sinks beneath the double load of forgetfulness and vice, and her wings fall from her and she drops to the ground, then the law ordains that this soul shall at her first birth pass, not into any other animal, but only into man; and the soul which has seen most of truth shall come to the birth as a philosopher, or artist, or some musical and loving nature; that which has seen truth in the second degree shall be some righteous king or warrior chief; the soul which is of the third class shall be a politician, or economist, or trader; the fourth shall be a lover of gymnastic toils, or a physician; the fifth shall lead the life of a prophet or hierophant; to the sixth the character of a poet or some other imitative artist will be assigned; to the seventh the life of an artisan or husbandman; to the eighth that of a sophist or demagogue; to the ninth that of a tyrant;—all these are states of probation, in which he who does righteously improves, and he who does unrighteously deteriorates his lot.

Ten thousand years must elapse before the soul of each one can return to the place from whence she came, [249] for she cannot grow her wings in less; only the soul of a philosopher, guileless and true, or the soul of a lover, who is not devoid of philosophy, may acquire wings in the third of the recurring periods of a thousand years; he is distinguished from the ordinary good man who gains wings in three thousand years:—and they who choose this life three times in succession have wings given them, and go away at the end of three thousand years. But the others receive judgment when they have completed their first life, and after the judgment they go, some of them to the houses of correction which are under the earth and are punished others to some place in heaven whither they are lightly borne by justice and there they live in a manner worthy of the life which they led here when in the form of men And at the end of the first thousand years the good souls and also the evil souls both come to draw lots and choose their second life and they may take any which they please The soul of a man may pass into the life of a beast or from the beast return again into the man But the soul which has never seen the truth will not pass into the human form For a man must have intelligence of universals and be able to proceed from the many particulars of sense to one conception of reason —this is the recollection of those things which our soul once saw while following God—when regard less of that which we now call being she raised her head up towards the true being And there fore the mind of the philosopher alone has wings and this is just for he is always accord ing to the measure of his abilities clinging in recollection to those things in which God abides and in beholding which He is what He is And he who employs aright these memories is ever being initiated into perfect mysteries and alone becomes truly perfect But as he forgets earthly interests and is rapt in the divine the vulgar deem him mad and rebuke him they do not see that he is inspired

Thus far I have been speaking of the fourth and last kind of madness which is imputed to him who when he sees the beauty of earth is transported with the recollection of the true beauty he would like to fly away but he can not he is like a bird fluttering and looking upward and careless of the world below and he is therefore thought to be mad And I have shown this of all inspirations to be the noblest and highest and the offspring of the highest to him who has or shares in it and that he who loves the beautiful is called a lover because he partakes of it For as has been already said every soul of man has in the way of nature be held true being this was the condition of her passing into the form of man But all souls do not easily recall the things of the other world [250] they may have seen them for a short time only or they may have been unfortunate in their earthly lot and having had their hearts turned to unrighteousness through some cor rupting influence they may have lost the memory of the holy things which once they saw Few only retain an adequate remem brance of them and they when they behold here any image of that other world are rapt in amazement but they are ignorant of what this rapture means because they do not clearly perceive For there is no light of justice or temperance or any of the higher ideas which are precious to souls in the earthly copies of them they are seen through a glass dimly and there are few who going to the images behold in them the realities and these only with difficulty There was a time when with the rest of the happy band they saw beauty shining in brightness —we philosophers following in the train of Zeus others in company with other gods and then we beheld the beatific vision and were initiated into a mystery which may be truly called most blessed celebrated by us in our state of innocence before we had any ex perience of evils to come when we were ad mitted to the sight of apparitions innocent and simple and calm and happy which we beheld shining in pure light pure ourselves and not yet enshrined in that living tomb which we carry about now that we are imprisoned in the body like an oyster in his shell Let me linger over the memory of scenes which have passed away

But of beauty I repeat again that we saw her there shining in company with the celestial forms and coming to earth we find her here too shining in clearness through the clearest aperture of sense For sight is the most piercing of our bodily senses though not by that is wisdom seen her loveliness would have been transporting if there had been a visible image of her and the other ideas if they had visible counter parts would be equally lovely But this is the privilege of beauty that being the loveliest she is also the most palpable to sight Now he who is not newly initiated or who has become cor rupted does not easily rise out of this world to the sight of true beauty in the other he looks only at her earthly namesake and instead of being awed at the sight of her he is given over to pleasure and like a brutish beast he rushes on to enjoy and beget [251] he consorts with wantonness and is not afraid or ashamed of pursuing pleasure in violation of nature But he whose initiation is recent and who has been the spectator of many glories in the other world, is amazed when he sees any one having a god like face or form which is the expression of divine beauty and at first a shudder runs through him and again the old awe steals over him then looking upon the face of his beloved as of a god he reverences him and if he were not afraid of being thought a downright mad man he would sacrifice to his beloved as to the image of a god then while he gazes on him there is a sort of reaction and the shudder passes into an unusual heat and perspiration for as he receives the effluence of beauty through the eyes, the wing moistens and he warms And as he warms, the parts out of which the wing grew and which had been hitherto closed and rig d, and had prevented the wing from shoot ing forth are melted and as nourishment streams upon him the lower end of the wings begins to swell and grow from the root upwards and the growth extends under the whole soul—for once the whole was winged

During this process the whole soul is all in a state of ebullition and effervescence,—which may be compared to the irritation and uneasiness in the gums at the time of cutting teeth — bubbles up and has a feeling of uneasiness and tickling but hen in like manner the soul is beginning to grow wings the beauty of the beloved meets her eye and she recei es the sensible warm motion of particles which flow towards her therefore called emotion (μ ρος) and is refreshed and warmed by them and then she ceases from her pain with joy But when she is parted from her beloved and her mo sture fails, then the orifices of the passage out of which the wing shoots dry up and close and intercept the germ of the wing which be ing shut up w th the emotion throbbing as with the pulsations of an artery pricks the aperture whi h is nearest, until at length the entire soul is pierced and maddened and pained and at the recollect on of beauty is again delighted And from both of them together the soul s oppressed at the strangeness of her condition and is in a great strait and ex citement, and in her madness can neither s eep by night nor abide in her place by day And wherever she thinks that she will behold the beautiful one th ther in her desire she runs And when she has seen him, and bathed herself in the vaters of beauty her constraint is loosened and she is refreshed, and has no more pangs and pains and this is the sweetest of all pleasures at the time, [252] and is the reason why the soul of the lover will never forsake his beautiful one, whom he esteems above all he has fo gotten mothe and brethren and com pan ons, and he thinks nothing of the neglect and loss of his p operty the rules and p opri eties of life, on which he formerly pr ded him self, he now desp ses, and is ready to leep l ke a servant, where er he is allowed, as near as he can to his desired one who is the object of his worsh p and the phys c an who can alone assuage the greatness of his pa n And this state, my dear imaginary youth to whom I am talking is by men called love, and among the gods has a name at which you, in your simplic ity may be inclined to mock there are two lines in the apocryphal writings of Homer in which the name occurs One of them is rather outrageous and not altogether metrical They are as follows

Mortals call him fluttering love
But the immortals call him u nged one
B c use the gro ing of wings is a necessity to h m

You may believe this, but not unless you like. At any rate the loves of lovers and their causes are such as I have described

Now the lover who is taken to be the attendant of Zeus is better able to bear the winged god and can endure a heavier burden but the attendants and companions of Ares, when under the influence of love, if they fancy that they have been at all wronged are ready to kill and put an end to themselves and their beloved And he who follows in the train of any other god while he is unspoiled and the impression lasts, honours and imitates him as far as he is able and after the manner of his god he behaves in his intercourse with his beloved and with the rest of the world during the first period of his earthly existence. Every one chooses his love from the ranks of beauty according to his character and this he makes his god and fashions and adorns as a sort of image which he is to fall down and worship The followers of Zeus desire that their beloved should have a soul like him and therefore they seek out some one of a philosophical and imperial nature, and when they have found him and loved him they do all they can to confirm such a nature in him, and if they have no experience of such a dispos tion hitherto they learn of any one who can teach them and themselves follow in the same way And they have the less difficulty in finding the nature of their own god in themselves, [253] because they have been compelled to gaze intensely on him their recollection clings to him, and they become possessed of him and receive from him their character and d sposition so far as man can participate in God The qual ties of their god they attribute to the beloved wherefore they love him all the more and if like the Bacchic Nymphs they draw inspiration from Zeus, they pour out their own fountain upon him, wanting to make him as like as possible to their own god But those who are the followers of Herè seek a royal love, and when they have found him they do just the same with him and in like manner the followers of Apollo and of every other god walking in the ways of their god, seek a love who is to be made like him whom they serve and when they have found him, they themselves imitate their god and persuade their love to do the same and educate him into the manner and nature of the god as far as they each can for no feelings of envy or jealousy are entertained by them towards their beloved but they do their utmost to create in him the greatest likeness of themselves and of the god whom they honour Thus fair and blissful to the beloved is the desire of the inspired lover and the initiation of which I speak into the mysteries of true love if he be captured by the lover and their purpose is effected Now the beloved is taken captive in the following manner —

As I said at the beginning of this tale I divided each soul into three—two horses and a charioteer and one of the horses was good and the other bad the division may remain but I have not yet explained in what the goodness or badness of either consists and to that I will proceed The right hand horse is upright and cleanly made he has a lofty neck and an aquiline nose his colour is white and his eyes dark he is a lover of honour and modesty and temperance and the follower of true glory he needs no touch of the whip but is guided by word and admonition only The other is a crooked lumbering animal put together anyhow he has a short thick neck he is flat faced and of a dark colour with grey eyes and blood red complexion the mate of insolence and pride shag eared and deaf hardly yielding to whip and spur Now when the charioteer beholds the vision of love and has his whole soul warmed through sense and is full of the prickings and ticklings of desire [254] the obedient steed then as always under the government of shame refrains from leaping on the beloved but the other heedless of the pricks and of the blows of the whip plunges and runs away giving all manner of trouble to his companion and the charioteer whom he forces to approach the beloved and to remember the joys of love They at first indignantly oppose him and will not be urged on to do terrible and unlawful deeds but at last when he persists in plaguing them they yield and agree to do as he bids them

And now they are at the spot and behold the flashing beauty of the beloved which when the charioteer sees, his memory is carried to the true beauty whom he beholds in company with Modesty like an image placed upon a holy pedestal He sees her but he is afraid and falls backwards in adoration and by his fall is compelled to pull back the reins with such violence as to bring both the steeds on their haunches, the one willing and unresisting the unruly one very unwilling and when they have gone back a little the one is overcome with shame and wonder and his whole soul is bathed in perspiration the other when the pain is over which the bridle and the fall had given him, having with difficulty taken breath is full of wrath and reproaches which he heaps upon the charioteer and his fellow steed for want of courage and manhood declaring that they have been false to their agreement and guilty of desertion Again they refuse and again he urges them on and will scarce yield to their prayer that he would wait until another time When the appointed hour comes they make as if they had forgotten and he reminds them, fighting and neighing and dragging them on until at length he on the same thoughts intent forces them to draw near again And when they are near he stoops his head and puts up his tail and takes the bit in his teeth and pulls shamelessly Then the charioteer is worse off than ever he falls back like a racer at the barrier and with a still more violent wrench drags the bit out of the teeth of the wild steed and covers his abusive tongue and jaws with blood and forces his legs and haunches to the ground and punishes him sorely And when this has happened several times and the villain has ceased from his wanton way he is tamed and humbled and follows the will of the charioteer and when he sees the beautiful one he is ready to die of fear And from that time forward the soul of the lover follows the beloved in modesty and holy fear

[255] And so the beloved who like a god has received every true and loyal service from his lover not in pretence but in reality being also himself of a nature friendly to his admirer if in former days he has blushed to own his passion and turned away his lover because his youthful companions or others slanderously told him that he would be disgraced now as years advance at the appointed age and time is led to receive him into communion For fate which has ordained that there shall be no friendship among the evil has also ordained that there shall ever be friendship among the good And the beloved when he has received him into communion and intimacy is quite amazed at the good will of the lover; he recognises that the inspired friend is worth all other friends or kinsmen; they have nothing of friendship in them worthy to be compared with his. And when his feeling continues and he is nearer to him and embraces him, in gymnastic exercises and at other times of meeting, then the fountain of that stream, which Zeus when he was in love with Ganymede named Desire, overflows upon the lover, and some enters into his soul, and some when he is filled flows out again; and as a breeze or an echo rebounds from the smooth rocks and returns whence it came, so does the stream of beauty, passing through the eyes which are the windows of the soul, come back to the beautiful one; there arriving and quickening the passages of the wings, watering them and inclining them to grow and filling the soul of the beloved also with love. And thus he loves, but he knows not what; he does not understand and cannot explain his own state; he appears to have caught the infection of blindness from another; the lover is his mirror in whom he is beholding himself, but he is not aware of this. When he is with the lover, both cease from their pain, but when he is away then he longs as he is longed for, and has love's image, love for love (Anteros) lodging in his breast, which he calls and believes to be not love but friendship only, and his desire is as the desire of the other, but weaker; he wants to see him, touch him, kiss, embrace him, and probably not long afterwards his desire is accomplished. When they meet, the wanton steed of the lover has a word to say to the charioteer [256]; he would like to have a little pleasure in return for many pains, but the wanton steed of the beloved says not a word, for he is bursting with passion which he understands not;—he throws his arms round the lover and embraces him as his dearest friend; and, when they are side by side, he is not in a state in which he can refuse the lover anything, if he ask him; although his fellow-steed and the charioteer oppose him with the arguments of shame and reason.

After this their happiness depends upon their self-control; if the better elements of the mind which lead to order and philosophy prevail, then they pass their life here in happiness and harmony—masters of themselves and orderly—enslaving the vicious and emancipating the virtuous elements of the soul; and when the end comes, they are light and winged for flight, having conquered in one of the three heavenly or truly Olympian victories; nor can human discipline or divine inspiration confer any greater blessing on man than this. If, on the other hand, they leave philosophy and lead the lower life of ambition, then probably, after wine or in some other careless hour, the two wanton animals take the two souls when off their guard and bring them together; and they accomplish that desire of their hearts which to the many is bliss; and this having once enjoyed they continue to enjoy, yet rarely because they have not the approval of the whole soul. They too are dear, but not so dear to one another as the others, either at the time of their love or afterwards. They consider that they have given and taken from each other the most sacred pledges, and they may not break them and fall into enmity. At last they pass out of the body, unwinged, but eager to soar, and thus obtain no mean reward of love and madness. For those who have once begun the heavenward pilgrimage may not go down again to darkness and the journey beneath the earth, but they live in light always; happy companions in their pilgrimage, and when the time comes at which they receive their wings they have the same plumage because of their love.

Thus great are the heavenly blessings which the friendship of a lover will confer upon you, my youth. Whereas the attachment of the non-lover, which is alloyed with a worldly prudence and has worldly and niggardly ways of doling out benefits, will breed in your soul those vulgar qualities which the populace applaud, will send you bowling round the earth during a period of nine thousand [257] years, and leave you a fool in the world below.

And thus, dear Eros, I have made and paid my recantation, as well and as fairly as I could; more especially in the matter of the poetical figures which I was compelled to use, because Phaedrus would have them. And now forgive the past and accept the present, and be gracious and merciful to me, and do not in thine anger deprive me of sight, or take from me the art of love which thou hast given me; but grant that I may be yet more esteemed in the eyes of the fair. And if Phaedrus or I myself said anything rude in our first speeches, blame Lysias, who is the father of the brat, and let us have no more of his progeny; bid him study philosophy, like his brother Polemarchus; and then his lover Phaedrus will no longer halt between two opinions, but will dedicate himself wholly to love and to philosophical discourses.

Phaedr. I join in the prayer, Socrates, and say

also having to do with all matters great as well as small good and bad alike and is in all equally right and equally to be esteemed—that is what you have heard?

Phaedr Nay, not exactly that I should say rather that I have heard the art confined to speaking and writing in lawsuits and to speaking in public ass^mblies—not extended farther

Soc Then I suppose that you have only heard of the rhetoric of Nestor and Odysseus which they composed in their leisure hours when at Troy and never of the rhetoric of Palamedes?

Phaedr No more than of Nestor and Odys seus unless Gorgias is your Nestor and Thra symachus or Theodorus your Odysseus

Soc Perhaps that is my meaning But let us leave them And do you tell me instead what are plaintiff and defendant doing in a law court—are they not contending?

Phaedr Exactly so

Soc About the just and unjust—that is the matter in dispute?

Phaedr Yes

Soc And a professor of the art will make the same thing appear to the same persons to be at one time just, at another time if he is so inclined to be unjust?

Phaedr Exactly

Soc And when he speaks in the assembly he will make the same things seem good to the city at one time and at another time the reverse of good?

Phaedr That is true

Soc Have we not heard of the Eleatic Pala medes (Zeno), who has an art of speaking by which he makes the same things appear to his hearers like and unlike one and many at rest and in motion?

Phaedr Very true

Soc The art of disputation then is not con fined to the courts and the assembly but is one and the same in every use of language this is the art if there be such an art which is able to find a likeness of everything to which a like ness can be found and draws into the light of day the likenesses and disguises which are used by others?

Phaedr How do you mean?

Soc Let me put the matter thus When will there be more chance of deception—when the difference is large or small?

[262] Phaedr When the difference is small

Soc And you will be less likely to be dis covered in passing by degrees into the other ex treme than when you go all at once?

Phaedr Of course

Soc He then who would deceive others, and not be deceived must exactly know the real likenesses and differences of things?

Phaedr He must

Soc And if he is ignorant of the true nature of any subject how can he detect the greater or less degree of likeness in other things to that of which by the hypothesis he is ignorant?

Phaedr He cannot

Soc And when men are deceived and their notions are at variance with realities it is clear that the error slips in through resemblances?

Phaedr Yes that is the way

Soc Then he who would be a master of the art must understand the real nature of every thing or he will never know either how to make the gradual departure from truth into the opposite of truth which is effected by the help of resemblances or how to avoid it?

Phaedr He will not

Soc He then who being ignorant of the truth aims at appearances will only attain an art of rhetoric which is ridiculous and is not an art at all?

Phaedr That may be expected

Soc Shall I propose that we look for exam ples of art and want of art according to our no tion of them in the speech of Lysias which you have in your hand and in my own speech?

Phaedr Nothing could be better and indeed I think that our previous argument has been too abstract and wanting in illustrations

Soc Yes and the two speeches happen to afford a very good example of the way in which the speaker who knows the truth may, without any serious purpose steal away the hearts of his hearers This piece of good fortune I attribute to the local deities and perhaps the prophets of the Muses who are singing over our heads may have imparted their inspiration to me For I do not imagine that I have any rhetorical art of my own

Phaedr Granted if you will only please to get on

Soc Suppose that you read me the first words of Lysias speech

Phaedr You know how matters stand with me and how as I conceive they might be ar ranged for our common interest and I main tain that I ought not to fail in my suit because I am not your lover For lovers repent——

[263] Soc Enough —Now shall I point out the rhetorical error of tho e words?

Phaedr Yes

Soc Every one is aware that about some things we are agreed, whereas about other things we differ.

Phaedr. I think that I understand you; but will you explain yourself?

Soc. When any one speaks of iron and silver, is not the same thing present in the minds of all?

Phaedr. Certainly.

Soc. But when any one speaks of justice and goodness we part company and are at odds with one another and with ourselves?

Phaedr. Precisely.

Soc. Then in some things we agree, but not in others?

Phaedr. That is true.

Soc. In which are we more likely to be deceived, and in which has rhetoric the greater power?

Phaedr. Clearly, in the uncertain class.

Soc. Then the rhetorician ought to make a regular division, and acquire a distinct notion of both classes, as well of that in which the many err, as of that in which they do not err?

Phaed. He who made such a distinction would have an excellent principle.

Soc. Yes; and in the next place he must have a keen eye for the observation of particulars in speaking, and not make a mistake about the class to which they are to be referred.

Phaedr. Certainly.

Soc. Now to which class does love belong—to the debatable or to the undisputed class?

Phaedr. To the debatable, clearly; for if not, do you think that love would have allowed you to say as you did, that he is an evil both to the lover and the beloved, and also the greatest possible good?

Soc. Capital. But will you tell me whether I defined love at the beginning of my speech? for, having been in an ecstasy, I cannot well remember.

Phaedr. Yes, indeed; that you did, and no mistake.

Soc. Then I perceive that the Nymphs of Achelous and Pan the son of Hermes, who inspired me, were far better rhetoricians than Lysias the son of Cephalus. Alas! how inferior to them he is! But perhaps I am mistaken; and Lysias at the commencement of his lover's speech did insist on our supposing love to be something or other which he fancied him to be, and according to this model he fashioned and framed the remainder of his discourse. Suppose we read his beginning over again:

Phaed. If you please; but you will not find what you want.

Soc. Read, that I may have his exact words.

Phaedr. "You know how matters stand with me, and how, as I conceive, [264] they might be arranged for our common interest; and I maintain I ought not to fail in my suit because I am not your lover, for lovers repent of the kindnesses which they have shown, when their love is over."

Soc. Here he appears to have done just the reverse of what he ought; for he has begun at the end, and is swimming on his back through the flood to the place of starting. His address to the fair youth begins where the lover would have ended. Am I not right, sweet Phaedrus?

Phaedr. Yes, indeed, Socrates; he does begin at the end.

Soc. Then as to the other topics—are they not thrown down anyhow? Is there any principle in them? Why should the next topic follow next in order, or any other topic? I cannot help fancying in my ignorance that he wrote off boldly just what came into his head, but I dare say that you would recognize a rhetorical necessity in the succession of the several parts of the composition?

Phaedr. You have too good an opinion of me if you think that I have any such insight into his principles of composition.

Soc. At any rate, you will allow that every discourse ought to be a living creature, having a body of its own and a head and feet; there should be a middle, beginning, and end, adapted to one another and to the whole?

Phaedr. Certainly.

Soc. Can this be said of the discourse of Lysias? See whether you can find any more connexion in his words than in the epitaph which is said by some to have been inscribed on the grave of Midas the Phrygian.

Phaedr. What is there remarkable in the epitaph?

Soc. It is as follows:—

I am a maiden of bronze and lie on the tomb of Midas;
So long as water flows and tall trees grow,
So long here on this spot by his sad tomb abiding,
I shall declare to passers-by that Midas sleeps below.

Now in this rhyme whether a line comes first or comes last, as you will perceive, makes no difference.

Phaed. You are making fun of that oration of ours.

Soc. Well, I will say no more about your friend's speech lest I should give offence to you; although I think that it might furnish many other examples of what a man ought also having to do with all matters great as well as small good and bad alike and is in all equally right and equally to be esteemed—that is what you have heard?

[262] Phaedr When the difference is small

Soc And you will be less likely to be discovered in passing by degrees into the other extreme than when you go all at once?

Phaedr Of course

Soc He then who would deceive others, and not be deceived must exactly know the real likenesses and differences of things?

Phaedr He must

Soc And if he is ignorant of the true nature of any subject how can he detect the greater or less degree of likeness in other things to that of which by the hypothesis he is ignorant?

[263] Soc Enough —Now shall I point out the rhetorical error of those words?

Phaedr Yes

Soc Every one is aware that about some too the illustrious Parian, Evenus, who first invented insinuations and indirect praises and also indirect censures, which according to some he put into verse to help the memory But shall I "to dumb forgetfulness consign" Tisias and Gorgias, who are not ignorant that probability is superior to truth, and who by force of argument make the little appear great and the great little, disguise the new in old fashions and the old in new fashions, and have discovered forms for everything either short or going on to infinity I remember Prodicus laughing when I told him of this he said that he had himself discovered the true rule of art, which was to be neither long nor short, but of a convenient length

Phaedr Well done, Prodicus!

Soc Then there is Hippias the Elean stranger who probably agrees with him.

Phaedr Yes

Soc And there is also Polus, who has treasuries of diplasiology and gnomology and eikonology and who teaches in them the names of which Licymnius made him a present they were to give a polish

Phaedr Had not Protagoras something of the same sort?

Soc Yes, rules of correct diction and many other fine precepts for the "sorrows of a poor old man, or any other pathetic case, no one is better than the Chalcedonian giant he can put a whole company of people into a passion and out of one again by his mighty magic, and is first rate at inventing or disposing of any sort of calumny on any grounds or none. All of them agree in asserting that a speech should end in a recapitulation, though they do not all agree to use the same word.

Phaed You mean that there should be a summing up of the arguments in order to remind the hearers of them.

Soc I have now said all that I have to say of the art of rhetoric have you anything to add?

Phaed Not much nothing very important

[268] Soc Leave the unimportant and let us bring the really important question into the light of day which is What power has this art of rhetoric, and when?

Phaed A very great power in public meetings.

Soc It has. But I should like to know whether you have the same feeling as I have about the rhetoricians? To me there seem to be a great many holes in their web.

Phaed Give an example.

Soc I will. Suppose a person to come to your friend Eryximachus, or to his father Acumenus, and to say to him I know how to apply drugs which shall have either a heating or a cooling effect, and I can give a vomit and also a purge, and all that sort of thing and knowing all this, as I do, I claim to be a physician and to make physicians by imparting this knowledge to others,"—what do you suppose that they would say?

Phaedr They would be sure to ask him whether he knew "to whom" he would give his medicines, and "when," and how much"

Soc And suppose that he were to reply No I know nothing of all that I expect the patient who consults me to be able to do these things for himself"?

Phaedr They would say in reply that he is a madman or a pedant who fancies that he is a physician because he has read something in a book, or has stumbled on a prescription or two although he has no real understanding of the art of medicine.

Soc And suppose a person were to come to Sophocles or Euripides and say that he knows how to make a very long speech about a small matter and a short speech about a great matter and also a sorrowful speech, or a terrible, or threatening speech, or any other kind of speech, and in teaching this fancies that he is teaching the art of tragedy—?

Phaedr They too would surely laugh at him if he fancies that tragedy is anything but the arranging of these elements in a manner which will be suitable to one another and to the whole

Soc But I do not suppose that they would be rude or abusive to him Would they not treat him as a musician would a man who thinks that he is a harmonist because he knows how to pitch the highest and lowest notes happening to meet such an one he would not say to him savagely Fool, you are mad!" But like a musician in a gentle and harmonious tone of voice, he would answer My good friend he who would be a harmonist must certainly know this, and yet he may understand nothing of harmony if he has not got beyond your stage of knowledge, for you only know the preliminaries of harmony and not harmony itself"

Phaedr Very true.

[269] Soc And will not Sophocles say to the display of the would be tragedian, that this is not tragedy but the preliminaries of tragedy? and will not Acumenus say the same of medicine to the would-be physician?

Phaedr Quite true.

Soc And if Adrastus the mellifluous or Peri rather to avoid But I will proceed to the other speech [265] which as I think is also suggestive to students of rhetoric

Phaedr In what way?

Soc The two speeches as you may remember were unlike the one argued that the lover and the other that the non lover ought to be accepted

Phaedr And right manfully

Soc You should rather say madly and madness was the argument of them for as I said love is a madness

Phaedr Yes

Soc And of madness there were two kinds one produced by human infirmity the other was a divine release of the soul from the yoke of custom and convention

Phaedr True

Soc The divine madness was subdivided into four kinds prophetic initiatory poetic, erotic having four gods presiding over them the first was the inspiration of Apollo the second that of Dionysus the third that of the Muses the fourth that of Aphrodite and Eros In the description of the last kind of madness which was also said to be the best we spoke of the affection of love in a figure into which we introduced a tolerably credible and possibly true though partly erring myth which was also a hymn in honour of Love who is your lord and also mine, Phaedrus and the guardian of fair children and to him we sung the hymn in measured and solemn strain

Phaedr I know that I had great pleasure in listening to you

Soc Let us take this instance and note how the transition was made from blame to praise

Phaedr What do you mean?

Soc I mean to say that the composition was mostly playful Yet in these chance fancies of the hour were involved two principles of which we should be too glad to have a clearer description if art could give us one

Phaedr What are they?

Soc First the comprehension of scattered particulars in one idea as in our definition of love which whether true or false certainly gave clearness and consistency to the discourse the speaker should define his several notions and so make his meaning clear

Phaedr What is the other principle Socrates?

Soc The second principle is that of division into species according to the natural formation where the joint is not breaking any part as a bad carver might. [266] Just as our two discourses alike assumed first of all a single form of unreason and then, as the body which from being one becomes double and may be divided into a left side and right side each having parts right and left of the same name—after this manner the speaker proceeded to divide the parts of the left side and did not desist until he found in them an evil or left handed love which he justly reviled and the other discourse leading us to the madness which lay on the right side found another love also having the same name but divine which the speaker held up before us and applauded and affirmed to be the author of the greatest benefits

Phaedr Most true

Soc I am myself a great lover of these processes of division and generalization they help me to speak and to think And if I find any man who is able to see a One and Many in nature him I follow and walk in his foot steps as if he were a god And those who have this art, I have hitherto been in the habit of calling dialecticians but God knows whether the name is right or not And I should like to know what name you would give to your or to Lysias disciples and whether this may not be that famous art of rhetoric which Thrasymachus and others teach and practise? Skilful speakers they are and impart their skill to any who is willing to make kings of them and to bring gifts to them

Phaedr Yes they are royal men but their art is not the same with the art of those whom you call and rightly in my opinion dialecticians —Still we are in the dark about rhetoric

Soc What do you mean? The remains of it if there be anything remaining which can be brought under rules of art must be a fine thing and at any rate is not to be despised by you and me But how much is left?

Phaedr There is a great deal surely to be found in books of rhetoric?

Soc Yes thank you for reminding me —There is the exordium showing how the speech should begin if I remember rightly that is what you mean—the niceties of the art?

Phaedr Yes

Soc Then follows the statement of facts and upon that witnesses thirdly proofs fourthly probabilities are to come the great Byzantian word maker also speaks, if I am not mistaken of confirmation and further confirmation

Phaedr You mean the excellent Theodorus.

[267] Soc Yes and he tells how refutation or further refutation is to be managed whether in accusation or defence I ought also to men

Phaedr Exactly

Soc He will explain secondly the mode in which she acts or is acted upon

Phaedr True.

Soc Thirdly having classified men and speeches and their kinds and affections, and adapted them to one another he will tell the reasons of his arrangement, and show why one soul is persuaded by a particular form of argument, and another not

Phaedr You have hit upon a very good way

Soc Yes, that is the true and only way in which any subject can be set forth or treated by rules of art, whether in speaking or writing But the writers of the present day at whose feet you have sat, craftily conceal the nature of the soul which they know quite well Nor until they adopt our method of reading and writing can we admit that they write by rules of art?

Phaedr What is our method?

Soc I cannot give you the exact details but I should like to tell you generally as far as is in my power how a man ought to proceed according to rules of art

Phaedr Let me hear

Soc Oratory is the art of enchanting the soul and therefore he who would be an orator has to learn the differences of human souls—they are so many and of such a nature and from them come the differences between man and man Having proceeded thus far in his analysis, he will next divide speeches into their different classes.— Such and such persons, he will say are affected by this or that kind of speech in this or that way and he will tell you why The pupil must have a good theoretical notion of them first, and then he must have experience of them in actual life, and be able to follow them with all his senses about him or he will never get beyond the precepts of his masters. But when he understands what persons are persuaded by what arguments, [272] and sees the person about whom he was speaking in the abstract actually before him and knows that it is he, and can say to himself, This is the man or this is the character who ought to have a certain argument applied to him in order to convince him of a certain opinion —he who knows all this, and knows also when he should speak and when he should refrain and when he should use pithy sayings, pathetic appeals, sensational effects, and all the other modes of speech which he has learned —when, I say he knows the times and seasons of all these things, then, and not till then, he is a perfect master of ... of these points whether in speaking or teaching or writing them and yet declares that he speaks by rules of art, he who says I don't believe you" has the better of him Well the teacher will say is this, Phaedrus and Socrates, your account of the so-called art of rhetoric or am I to look for an other?

Phaedr He must take this, Socrates, for there is no possibility of another and yet the creation of such an art is not easy

Soc Very true and therefore let us consider this matter in every light and see whether we cannot find a shorter and easier road there is no use in taking a long rough round about way if there be a shorter and easier one. And I wish that you would try and remember whether you have heard from Lysias or any one else anything which might be of service to us

Phaedr If trying would avail then I might but at the moment I can think of nothing

Soc Suppose I tell you something which somebody who knows told me

Phaedr Certainly

Soc May not the wolf, as the proverb says claim a hearing"?

Phaedr Do you say what can be said for him

Soc He will argue that there is no use in putting a solemn face on these matters, or in going round and round, until you arrive at first principles for as I said at first, when the question is of justice and good or is a question in which men are concerned who are just and good either by nature or habit, he who would be a skilful rhetorician has no need of truth—for that in courts of law men literally care nothing about truth but only about conviction and this is based on probability to which he who would be a skilful orator should therefore give his whole attention. And they say also that there are cases in which the actual facts, if they are improbable, ought to be withheld, and only the probabilities should be told either in accusation or defence, and that always in speaking the orator should keep probability in view and say good bye to the truth [273] And the observance of this principle throughout a speech furnishes the whole art

Phaedr That is what the professors of rhetoric do actually say Socrates. I have not forgotten that we have quite briefly touched upon this matter already with them the point is all important

Soc I dare say that you are familiar with Tisias. Does he not define probability to be that which the many think?

Cf 59.

cles heard of these wonderful arts brachylogies and eikonologies and all the hard names which we have been endeavouring to draw into the light of day what would they say? Instead of losing temper and applying uncomplimentary epithets as you and I have been doing to the authors of such an imaginary art their superior wisdom would rather censure us as well as them Have a little patience Phaedrus and Socrates they would say you should not be in such a passion with those who from some want of dialectical skill are unable to define the nature of rhetoric and consequently suppose that they have found the art in the preliminary conditions of it and when these have been taught by them to others fancy that the whole art of rhetoric has been taught by them but as to using the several instruments of the art effectively or making the composition a whole —an application of it such as this is they regard as an easy thing which their disciples may make for themselves

Phaedr I quite admit Socrates that the art of rhetoric which these men teach and of which they write is such as you describe—there I agree with you But I still want to know where and how the true art of rhetoric and persuasion is to be acquired

Soc The perfection which is required of the finished orator is or rather must be like the perfection of anything else partly given by nature but may also be assisted by art If you have the natural power and add to it knowledge and practice you will be a distinguished speaker if you fall short in either of these you will be to that extent defective But the art as far as there is an art of rhetoric does not lie in the direction of Lysias or Thrasymachus

Phaedr In what direction then?

Soc I conceive Pericles to have been the most accomplished of rhetoricians

Phaedr What of that?

Soc All the great arts require discussion and high speculation about the truths of nature [270] hence come loftiness of thought and completeness of execution And this as I conceive was the quality which in addition to his natural gifts Pericles acquired from his intercourse with Anaxagoras whom he happened to know He was thus imbued with the higher philosophy and attained the knowledge of Mind and the negative of Mind which were favourite themes of Anaxagoras and applied what suited his purpose to the art of speaking

Phaedr Explain

Soc Rhetoric is like medicine

Phaedr How so?

Soc Why because medicine has to define the nature of the body and rhetoric of the soul —if we would proceed not empirically but scientifically in the one case to impart health and strength by giving medicine and food in the other to implant the conviction or virtue which you desire by the right application of words and training

Phaedr There Socrates I suspect that you are right

Soc And do you think that you can know the nature of the soul intelligently without knowing the nature of the whole?

Phaedr Hippocrates the Asclepiad says that the nature even of the body can only be understood as a whole

Soc Yes friend and he was right —still we ought not to be content with the name of Hippocrates but to examine and see whether his argument agrees with his conception of nature

Phaedr I agree

Soc Then consider what truth as well as Hippocrates says about this or about any other nature Ought we not to consider first whether that which we wish to learn and to teach is a simple or multiform thing and if simple then to enquire what power it has of acting or being acted upon in relation to other things and if multiform then to number the forms and see first in the case of one of them and then in the case of all of them what is that power of acting or being acted upon which makes each and all of them to be what they are?

Phaedr You may very likely be right, Socrates

Soc The method which proceeds without analysis is like the groping of a blind man Yet, surely he who is an artist ought not to admit of a comparison with the blind or deaf The rhetorician who teaches his pupil to speak scientifically will particularly set forth the nature of that being to which he addresses his speeches and this I conceive to be the soul

Phaedr Certainly

[271] Soc His whole effort is directed to the soul for in that he seeks to produce conviction

Phaedr Yes

Soc Then clearly Thrasymachus or any one else who teaches rhetoric in earnest will give an exact description of the nature of the soul which will enable us to see whether she be single and same or like the body multiform That is what we should call showing the nature of the soul

Cf. Charmides 156

cause they will not use their memories; they will trust to the external written characters and not remember of themselves. The specific which you have discovered is an aid not to memory, but to reminiscence, and you give your disciples not truth, but only the semblance of truth; they will be hearers of many things and will have learned nothing; they will appear to be omniscient and will generally know nothing; they will be tiresome company, having the show of wisdom without the reality.

Phaedr. Yes, Socrates, you can easily invent tales of Egypt, or of any other country.

Soc. There was a tradition in the temple of Dodona that oaks first gave prophetic utterances. The men of old, unlike in their simplicity to young philosophy, deemed that if they heard the truth even from "oak or rock," it was enough for them; whereas you seem to consider not whether a thing is or is not true, but who the speaker is and from what country the tale comes.

Phaedr. I acknowledge the justice of your rebuke; and I think that the Theban is right in his view about letters.

Soc. He would be a very simple person, and quite a stranger to the oracles of Thamus or Ammon, who should leave in writing or receive in writing any art under the idea that the written word would be intelligible or certain; or who deemed that writing was at all better than knowledge and recollection of the same matters?

Phaedr. That is most true.

Soc. I cannot help feeling, Phaedrus, that writing is unfortunately like painting; for the creations of the painter have the attitude of life, and yet if you ask them a question they preserve a solemn silence. And the same may be said of speeches. You would imagine that they had intelligence, but if you want to know anything and put a question to one of them, the speaker always gives one unvarying answer. And when they have been once written down they are tumbled about anywhere among those who may or may not understand them, and know not to whom they should reply, to whom not: and, if they are maltreated or abused, they have no parent to protect them; and they cannot protect or defend themselves.

Phaedr. That again is most true.

Soc. Is there not another kind of word or speech far better than this, [276] and having far greater power—a son of the same family, but lawfully begotten?

Phaedr. Whom do you mean, and what is his origin?

Soc. I mean an intelligent word graven in the soul of the learner, which can defend itself, and knows when to speak and when to be silent.

Phaedr. You mean the living word of knowledge which has a soul, and of which the written word is properly no more than an image?

Soc. Yes, of course that is what I mean. And now may I be allowed to ask you a question: Would a husbandman, who is a man of sense, take the seeds, which he values and which he wishes to bear fruit, and in sober seriousness plant them during the heat of summer in some garden of Adonis, that he may rejoice when he sees them in eight days appearing in beauty? at least he would do so, if at all, only for the sake of amusement and pastime. But when he is in earnest he sows in fitting soil, and practises husbandry, and is satisfied if in eight months the seeds which he has sown arrive at perfection?

Phaedr. Yes, Socrates, that will be his way when he is in earnest; he will do the other, as you say, only in play.

Soc. And can we suppose that he who knows the just and good and honourable has less understanding than the husbandman, about his own seeds?

Phaedr. Certainly not.

Soc. Then he will not seriously incline to "write" his thoughts "in water" with pen and ink, sowing words which can neither speak for themselves nor teach the truth adequately to others?

Phaedr. No, that is not likely.

Soc. No, that is not likely—in the garden of letters he will sow and plant, but only for the sake of recreation and amusement; he will write them down as memorials to be treasured against the forgetfulness of old age, by himself, or by any other old man who is treading the same path. He will rejoice in beholding their tender growth; and while others are refreshing their souls with banqueting and the like, this will be the pastime in which his days are spent.

Phaedr. A pastime, Socrates, as noble as the other is ignoble, the pastime of a man who can be amused by serious talk, and can discourse merrily about justice and the like.

Soc. True, Phaedrus. But nobler far is the serious pursuit of the dialectician, who, finding a congenial soul, by the help of science sows and plants therein words which are able to help themselves and him who planted them

Phaedr Certainly he does

Soc I believe that he has a clever and ingenious case of this sort —He supposes a feeble and valiant man to have assaulted a strong and cowardly one and to have robbed him of his coat or of something or other he is brought into court and then Tisias says that both parties should tell lies the coward should say that he was assaulted by more men than one the other should prove that they were alone and should argue thus How could a weak man like me have assaulted a strong man like him? The complainant will not like to confess his own cowardice and will therefore invent some other lie which his adversary will thus gain an opportunity of refuting And there are other devices of the same kind which have a place in the system Am I not right Phaedrus?

Phaedr Certainly

Soc Bless me what a wonderfully mysterious art is this which Tisias or some other gentleman in whatever name or country he rejoices has discovered Shall we say a word to him or not?

Phaedr What shall we say to him?

Soc Let us tell him that before he appeared you and I were saying that the probability of which he speaks was engendered in the minds of the many by the likeness of the truth and we had just been affirming that he who knew the truth would always know best how to discover the resemblances of the truth If he has anything else to say about the art of speaking we should like to hear him but if not we are satisfied with our own view that unless a man estimates the various characters of his hearers and is able to divide all things into classes and to comprehend them under single ideas he will never be a skilful rhetorician even within the limits of human power And this skill he will not attain without a great deal of trouble which a good man ought to undergo not for the sake of speaking and acting before men but in order that he may be able to say what is acceptable to God and always to act acceptably to Him as far as in him lies [274] for there is a saying of wiser men than ourselves that a man of sense should not try to please his fellow servants (at least this should not be his first object) but his good and noble masters and therefore if the way is long and circuitous marvel not at this for where the end is great there we may take the longer road but not for lesser ends such as yours Truly the argument may say Tisias that if you do not mind going so far rhetoric has a fair beginning here

Phaedr I think Socrates that this is admirable if only practicable

Soc But even to fail in an honourable object is honourable

Phaedr True

Soc Enough appears to have been said by us of a true and false art of speaking

Phaedr Certainly

Soc But there is something yet to be said of propriety and impropriety of writing

Phaedr Yes

Soc Do you know how you can speak or act about rhetoric in a manner which will be acceptable to God?

Phaedr No indeed Do you?

Soc I have heard a tradition of the ancients, whether true or not they only know although if we had found the truth ourselves do you think that we should care much about the opinions of men?

Phaedr Your question needs no answer but I wish that you would tell me what you say that you have heard

Phaedr But there is also a friend of yours who ought not to be forgotten

Soc Who is he?

[279] Phaedr Isocrates the fair —What message will you send to him and ho v shall we describe him?

Soc Isocrates is still young Phaedrus but I am willing to hazard a prophecy concerning him.

Ph edr What v ould you prophesy?

Soc I think that he has a gen us which soars above the orat ons of Lysias and that his char acter is cast in a finer mould My impression of him is that he will marvellously improve as he gro vs older and that all former rhetoricians will be as children in compar son of him And I believe that he will not be satisfied with rhetoric but that there is in him a divine inspiration which will lead him to things higher still For he has an element of philosophy in his nature This is the message of the gods dwelling in this place and which I will myself deliver to Isoc rates who is my delight and do you give the other to Lysias, who is yours

Phaedr I will and now as the heat is abated let us depart

Soc Should we not o fer up a prayer first of all to the local deities?

Ph e r By all means

Soc Beloved Pan and all ye other gods who haunt this place give me beauty in the inward soul and may the outward and inward man be at one May I reckon the wise to be the wealthy and may I have such a quantity of gold as a temperate man and he only can bear and carry —Anything more? The prayer I think is enough for me

Phaedr Ask the same for me for friends should have all things in common.

Soc Let us go

[277] and are not unfruitful but have in them a seed which others brought up in different soils render immortal making the possessors of it happy to the utmost extent of human happiness

Phaedr Far nobler certainly

Soc And now, Phaedrus having agreed up on the premises we decide about the conclusion

Phaedr About what conclusion?

Soc About Lysias whom we censured and his art of writing and his discourses and the rhetorical skill or want of skill which was shown in them—these are the questions which we sought to determine and they brought us to this point And I think that we are now pretty well informed about the nature of art and its opposite

Phaedr Yes I think with you but I wish that you would repeat what was said

Soc Until a man knows the truth of the several particulars of which he is writing or speaking and is able to define them as they are, and having defined them again to divide them until they can be no longer divided and until in like manner he is able to discern the nature of the soul and discover the different modes of discourse which are adapted to different natures and to arrange and dispose them in such a way that the simple form of speech may be addressed to the simpler nature and the complex and composite to the more complex nature —until he has accomplished all this he will be unable to handle arguments according to rules of art as far as their nature allows them to be subjected to art either for the purpose of teaching or persuading —such is the view which is implied in the whole preceding argument

Phaedr Yes that was our view certainly

Soc Secondly as to the censure which was passed on the speaking or writing of discourses and how they might be rightly or wrongly censured—did not our previous argument show—?

Phaedr Show what?

Soc That whether Lysias or any other writer that ever was or will be whether private man or statesman proposes laws and so becomes the author of a political treatise fancying that there is any great certainty and clearness in his performance the fact of his so writing is only a disgrace to him whatever men may say For not to know the nature of justice and injustice and good and evil and not to be able to distinguish the dream from the reality cannot in truth be otherwise than disgraceful to him even though he have the applause of the whole world

Phaedr Certainly

Soc But he who thinks that in the written word there is necessarily much which is not serious, and that neither poetry nor prose, spoken or written is of any great value, if, like the compositions of the rhapsodes, [278] they are only recited in order to be believed and not with any view to criticism or instruction and who thinks that even the best of writings are but a reminiscence of what we know and that only in principles of justice and goodness and nobility taught and communicated orally for the sake of instruction and graven in the soul which is the true way of writing is there clearness and perfection and seriousness and that such principles are a man's own and his legitimate offspring —being in the first place the word which he finds in his own bosom secondly the brethren and descendants and relations of his others —and who cares for them and no others—this is the right sort of man and you and I Phaedrus would pray that we may become like him

Phaedr That is most assuredly my desire and prayer

Soc And now the play is played out and of rhetoric enough Go and tell Lysias that to the fountain and school of the Nymphs we went down and were bidden by them to convey a message to him and to other composers of speeches —to Homer and other writers of poems whether set to music or not and to Solon and others who have composed writings in the form of political discourses which they would term laws—to all of them we are to say that if their compositions are based on knowledge of the truth and they can defend or prove them when they are put to the test by spoken arguments, which leave their writings poor in comparison of them then they are to be called not only poets orators legislators but are worthy of a higher name befitting the serious pursuit of their life

Phaedr What name would you assign to them?

Soc Wise I may not call them for that is a great name which belongs to God alone— lovers of wisdom or philosophers is their modest and befitting title

Phaedr Very suitable

Soc And he who cannot rise above his own compilations and compositions which he has been long patching and piecing adding some and taking away some may be justly called poet or speechmaker or law maker

Soc. But how did you come to have this skill about Homer only, and not about Hesiod or the other poets? Does not Homer speak of the same themes which all other poets handle? Is not war his great argument? and does he not speak of human society and of intercourse of men, good and bad, skilled and unskilled, and of the gods conversing with one another and with mankind, and about what happens in heaven and in the world below, and the generations of gods and heroes? Are not these the themes of which Homer sings?

Ion. Very true, Socrates.

Soc. And do not the other poets sing of the same?

Ion. Yes, Socrates; but not in the same way as Homer.

Soc. What, in a worse way?

Ion. Yes, in a far worse.

Soc. And Homer in a better way?

Ion. He is incomparably better.

Soc. And yet surely, my dear friend Ion, in a discussion about arithmetic, where many people are speaking, and one speaks better than the rest, there is somebody who can judge which of them is the good speaker?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And he who judges of the good will be the same as he who judges of the bad speakers?

Ion. The same.

Soc. And he will be the arithmetician?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Well, and in discussions about the wholesomeness of food, when many persons are speaking, and one speaks better than the rest, will he who recognizes the better speaker be a different person from him who recognizes the worse, or the same?

Ion. Clearly the same.

Soc. And who is he, and what is his name?

Ion. The physician.

Soc. And speaking generally, in all discussions in which the subject is the same and many men are speaking, will not he who knows the good know the bad speaker also? [532] For if he does not know the bad, neither will he know the good when the same topic is being discussed.

Ion. True.

Soc. Is not the same person skilful in both?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And you say that Homer and the other poets, such as Hesiod and Archilochus, speak of the same things, although not in the same way; but the one speaks well and the other not so well?

Ion. Yes; and I am right in saying so.

Soc. And if you knew the good speaker, you would also know the inferior speakers to be inferior?

Ion. That is true.

Soc. Then, my dear friend, can I be mistaken in saying that Ion is equally skilled in Homer and in other poets, since he himself acknowledges that the same person will be a good judge of all those who speak of the same things; and that almost all poets do speak of the same things?

Ion. Why then, Socrates, do I lose attention and go to sleep and have absolutely no ideas of the least value, when any one speaks of any other poet; but when Homer is mentioned, I wake up at once and am all attention and have plenty to say?

Soc. The reason, my friend, is obvious. No one can fail to see that you speak of Homer without any art or knowledge. If you were able to speak of him by rules of art, you would have been able to speak of all other poets; for poetry is a whole.

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And when any one acquires any other art as a whole, the same may be said of them. Would you like me to explain my meaning, Ion?

Ion. Yes, indeed, Socrates; I very much wish that you would: for I love to hear you wise men talk.

Soc. O that we were wise, Ion, and that you could truly call us so; but you rhapsodes and actors, and the poets whose verses you sing, are wise; whereas I am a common man, who only speak the truth. For consider what a very commonplace and trivial thing is this which I have said—a thing which any man might say: that when a man has acquired a knowledge of a whole art, the enquiry into good and bad is one and the same. Let us consider this matter; is not the art of painting a whole?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And there are and have been many painters good and bad?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And did you ever know any one who was skilful in pointing out the excellences and defects of Polygnotus the son of Aglaophon, but incapable of criticizing other painters; [533] and when the work of any other painter was produced, went to sleep and was at a loss, and had no ideas; but when he had to give his opinion about Polygnotus, or whoever the painter might be, and about him only, woke up

ION

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Socrates Ion

[530] Socrates WELCOME Ion Are you from your native city of Ephesus?

Ion No Socrates but from Epidaurus where I attended the festival of Asclepius

Soc And do the Epidaurians have contests of rhapsodes at the festival?

Ion O yes and of all sorts of musical performers

Soc And were you one of the competitors—and did you succeed?

Ion I obtained the first prize of all Socrates

Soc Well done and I hope that you will do the same for us at the Panathenaea

Ion And I will please heaven

Soc I often envy the profession of a rhapsode Ion for you have always to wear fine clothes and to look as beautiful as you can is a part of your art Then again you are obliged to be continually in the company of many good poets and especially of Homer who is the best and most divine of them and to understand him and not merely learn his words by rote is a thing greatly to be envied And no man can be a rhapsode who does not understand the meaning of the poet For the rhapsode ought to interpret the mind of the poet to his hearers but how can he interpret him well unless he knows what he means? All this is greatly to be envied

Ion Very true Socrates interpretation has certainly been the most laborious part of my art and I believe myself able to speak about Homer better than any man and that neither Metrodorus of Lampsacus nor Stesimbrotus of Thasos nor Glaucon nor any one else who ever was had as good ideas about Homer as I have or as many

Soc I am glad to hear you say so Ion I see that you will not refuse to acquaint me with them

Ion Certainly Socrates and you really ought to hear how exquisitely I render Homer I think that the Homeridae should give me a golden crown

Soc I shall take an opportunity of hearing your embellishments of him at some other time [531] But just now I should like to ask you a question Does your art extend to Hesiod and Archilochus, or to Homer only?

Ion To Homer only he is in himself quite enough

Soc Are there any things about which Homer and Hesiod agree?

Ion Yes in my opinion there are a good many

Soc And can you interpret better what Homer says or what Hesiod says about these matters in which they agree?

Ion I can interpret them equally well Socrates where they agree

Soc But what about matters in which they do not agree?—for example about divination of which both Homer and Hesiod have something to say—

Ion Very true

Soc Would you or a good prophet be a better interpreter of what these two poets say about divination not only when they agree but when they disagree?

Ion A prophet

Soc And if you were a prophet would you be able to interpret them when they disagree as well as when they agree?

Ion Clearly

Ion There again you are right

Soc Then you are the interpreters of interpreters?

Ion Precisely

Soc I wish you would frankly tell me Ion what I am going to ask of you When you produce the greatest effect upon the audience in the recitation of some striking passage such as the apparition of Odysseus leaping forth on the floor recognized by the suitors and casting his arrows at his feet, or the description of Achilles rushing at Hector or the sorrows of Andromache, Hecuba, or Priam—are you in your right mind? Are you not carried out of yourself and does not your soul in an ecstasy seem to be among the persons or places of which you are speaking whether they are in Ithaca or in Troy or whatever may be the scene of the poem?

Ion That proof strikes home to me Socrates For I must frankly confess that at the tale of pity my eyes are filled with tears, and when I speak of horrors, my hair stands on end and my heart throbs.

Soc Well, Ion, and what are we to say of a man who at a sacrifice or festival when he is dressed in holiday attire and has golden crowns upon his head of which nobody has robbed him, appears weeping or panic stricken in the presence of more than twenty thousand friendly faces, when there is no one despoiling or wronging him—is he in his right mind or is he not?

Ion No indeed Socrates, I must say that, strictly speaking, he is not in his right mind

Soc And are you aware that you produce similar effects on most spectators

Ion Only too well for I look down upon them from the stage, and behold the various emotions of pity wonder sternness, stamped upon their countenances when I am speaking and I am obliged to give my very best attention to them for if I make them cry I myself shall laugh, and if I make them laugh I myself shall cry when the time of payment arrives.

Soc Do you know that the spectator is the last of the rings which as I am saying receive the power of the original magnet from one another? The rhapsode like yourself and the actor are intermediate links, [536] and the poet himself is the first of them Through all these the God sways the souls of men in any direction which he pleases, and makes one man hang down from another Thus there is a vast chain of dancers and masters and undermasters of choruses, who are suspended as if from the stone at the side of the rings which hang down from the Muse And every poet has some Muse from whom he is suspended and by whom he is said to be possessed which is nearly the same thing for he is taken hold of And from these first rings, which are the poets, depend others some deriving their inspiration from Orpheus, others from Musaeus but the greater number are possessed and held by Homer Of whom, Ion, you are one and are possessed by Homer and when any one repeats the words of another poet you go to sleep and know not what to say but when any one recites a strain of Homer you wake up in a moment and your soul leaps within you, and you have plenty to say for not by art or knowledge about Homer do you say what you say but by divine inspiration and by possession just as the Corybantian revellers too have a quick perception of that strain only which is appropriated to the God by whom they are possessed and have plenty of dances and words for that but take no heed of any other And you Ion when the name of Homer is mentioned have plenty to say and have nothing to say of others. You ask 'Why is this?' The answer is that you praise Homer not by art but by divine inspiration

Ion That is good, Socrates and yet I doubt whether you will ever have eloquence enough to persuade me that I praise Homer only when I am mad and possessed and if you could hear me speak of him I am sure you would never think this to be the case

Soc I should like very much to hear you but not until you have answered a question which I have to ask On what part of Homer do you speak well?—not surely about every part

Ion There is no part, Socrates about which I do not speak well of that I can assure you

Soc Surely not about things in Homer of which you have no knowledge?

Ion And what is there in Homer of which I have no knowledge?

Soc Why does not Homer speak in many passages about arts? For example, [537] about driving if I can only remember the lines I will repeat them.

Ion I remember and will repeat them

Soc Tell me then what Nestor says to Antilochus, his son where he bids him be careful of the turn at the horse race in honour of Patroclus.

Ion He says

Bend gently in the polished chariot to the left of them and urge the horse on the right hand with whip and voice and slacken the rein And when you are at the goal let the left horse draw near yet and was attentive and had plenty to say?

Ion No indeed I have never known such a person

Soc Or did you ever know of any one in sculpture who was skilful in expounding the merits of Daedalus the son of Metion or of Epeius the son of Panopeus or of Theodorus the Samian o of any individual sculptor but when the works of sculptors in general were produced was at a loss and went to sleep and had nothing to say?

Ion No indeed no more than the other

Soc And if I am not mistaken you never met with any one among flute players or harp-players or singers to the harp or rhapsodes who was able to discourse of Olympus or Thamyras or Orpheus or Phemius the rhapsode of Ithaca but was at a loss when he came to speak of Ion of Ephesus and had no notion of his merits or defects?

Ion I cannot deny what you say Socrates Nevertheless I am conscious in my own self and the world agrees with me in thinking that I do speak better and have more to say about Homer than any other man But I do not speak equally well about others—tell me the reason of this

Soc I perceive Ion and I will proceed to explain to you what I imagine to be the reason of this The gift which you possess of speaking excellently about Homer is not an art but as I was just saying an inspiration there is a divinity moving you like that contained in the stone which Euripides calls a magnet but which is commonly known as the stone of Heraclea This stone not only attracts iron rings but also imparts to them a similar power of attracting other rings and sometimes you may see a number of pieces of iron and rings suspended from one another so as to form quite a long chain and all of them derive their power of suspension from the original stone In like manner the Muse first of all inspires men herself and from these inspired persons a chain of other persons is suspended who take the inspiration For all good poets epic as well as lyric compose their beautiful poems not by art but because they are inspired and possessed And as the Corybantian revellers when they dance are not in their right mind [534] so the lyric poets are not in their right mind when they are composing their beautiful strains but when falling under the power of music and metre they are inspired and possessed like Bacchic maidens who draw milk and honey from the rivers when they are under the influence of Dionysus but not when they are in their right mind And the soul of the lyric poet does the same as they themselves say for they tell us that they bring songs from honeyed fountains culling them out of the gardens and dells of the Muses they like the bees winging their way from flower to flower And this is true For the poet is a light and winged and holy thing and there is no invention in him until he has been inspired and is out of his senses and the mind is no longer in him when he has not attained to this state he is powerless and is unable to utter his oracles

Many are the noble words in which poets speak concerning the actions of men but like yourself when speaking about Homer they do not speak of them by any rules of art they are simply inspired to utter that to which the Muse impels them and that only and when inspired one of them will make dithyrambs another hymns of praise another choral strains another epic or iambic verses—and he who is good at one is not good at any other kind of verse for not by art does the poet sing but by power divine Had he learned by rules of art he would have known how to speak not of one theme only but of all and therefore God takes away the minds of poets and uses them as his ministers as he also uses diviners and holy prophets in order that we who hear them may know them to be speaking not of themselves who utter these priceless words in a state of unconsciousness but that God himself is the speaker and that through them he is conversing with us And Tynnichus the Chalcidian affords a striking instance of what I am saying he wrote nothing that any one would care to remember but the famous paean which is in every one s mouth one of the finest poems ever written simply an invention of the Muses as he himself says For in this way the God would seem to indicate to us and not allow us to doubt that these beautiful poems are not human or the work of man but divine and the work of God and that the poets are only the interpreters of the Gods by whom they are severally possessed Was not this the lesson which the God intended to teach when by the mouth of the worst of poets he sang the best of [535] songs? Am I not right Ion?

Ion Yes indeed Socrates I feel that you are for your words touch my soul and I am persuaded that good poets by a divine inspiration interpret the things of the Gods to us the bird which carried him on the breast by the neck, and he in pain let him fall from him to the ground into the midst of the multitude. And the eagle, with a cry, was borne afar on the wings of the wind.

Soc And you rhapsodists are the interpreters of the poets?

These are the sort of things which I should say that the prophet ought to consider and determine.

Ion. And you are quite right, Socrates, in saying so.

Soc. Yes, Ion, and you are right also. And as I have selected from the Iliad and Odyssey for you passages which describe the office of the prophet and the physician and the fisherman, do you, who know Homer so much better than I do, Ion, select for me passages which relate to the rhapsode and the rhapsode's art, and which the rhapsode ought to examine and judge of better than other men.

Ion. All passages, I should say, Socrates.

Soc. Not all, Ion, surely. Have you already forgotten what you were saying? A rhapsode ought to have a better memory.

[540] Ion. Why, what am I forgetting?

Soc. Do you not remember that you declared the art of the rhapsode to be different from the art of the charioteer?

Ion. Yes, I remember.

Soc. And you admitted that being different they would have different subjects of knowledge?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Then upon your own showing the rhapsode, and the art of the rhapsode, will not know everything?

Ion. I should exclude certain things, Socrates.

Soc. You mean to say that you would exclude pretty much the subjects of the other arts. As he does not know all of them, which of them will he know?

Ion. He will know what a man and what a woman ought to say, and what a freeman and what a slave ought to say, and what a ruler and what a subject.

Soc. Do you mean that a rhapsode will know better than the pilot what the ruler of a sea-tossed vessel ought to say?

Ion. No; the pilot will know best.

Soc. Or will the rhapsode know better than the physician what the ruler of a sick man ought to say?

Ion. He will not.

Soc. But he will know what a slave ought to say?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. Suppose the slave to be a cowherd; the rhapsode will know better than the cowherd what he ought to say in order to soothe the infuriated cows?

Ion. No, he will not.

Soc. But he will know what a spinning-woman ought to say about the working of wool?

Ion. No.

Soc. At any rate he will know what a general ought to say when exhorting his soldiers?

Ion. Yes, that is the sort of thing which the rhapsode will be sure to know.

Soc. Well, but is the art of the rhapsode the art of the general?

Ion. I am sure that I should know what a general ought to say.

Soc. Why, yes, Ion, because you may possibly have a knowledge of the art of the general as well as of the rhapsode; and you may also have a knowledge of horsemanship as well as of the lyre: and then you would know when horses were well or ill managed. But suppose I were to ask you: By the help of which art, Ion, do you know whether horses are well managed, by your skill as a horseman or as a performer on the lyre—what would you answer?

Ion. I should reply, by my skill as a horseman.

Soc. And if you judged of performers on the lyre, you would admit that you judged of them as a performer on the lyre, and not as a horseman?

Ion. Yes.

Soc. And in judging of the general's art, do you judge of it as a general or a rhapsode?

Ion. To me there appears to be no difference between them.

[541] Soc. What do you mean? Do you mean to say that the art of the rhapsode and of the general is the same?

Ion. Yes, one and the same.

Soc. Then he who is a good rhapsode is also a good general?

Ion. Certainly, Socrates.

Soc. And he who is a good general is also a good rhapsode?

Ion. No; I do not say that.

Soc. But you do say that he who is a good rhapsode is also a good general.

Ion. Certainly.

Soc. And you are the best of Hellenic rhapsodes?

Ion. Far the best, Socrates.

Soc. And are you the best general, Ion?

Ion. To be sure, Socrates; and Homer was my master.

so th t the nave of the well wrought wheel may not even seem to touch the extremity and avoid catching the stone

Soc Enough Now Ion will the charioteer or the physician be the better judge of the propriety of these lines?

Ion The charioteer clearly

Soc And will the reason be that this is his art or will there be any other reason?

Ion No that will be the reason

Soc And every art is appointed by God to have knowledge of a certain work for that which we know by the art of the pilot we do not know by the art of medicine?

Ion Certainly not

Soc Nor do we know by the art of the carpenter that which we know by the art of medicine?

Ion Certainly not

Soc And this is true of all the arts —that which we know with one art we do not know with the other? But let me ask a prior question You admit that there are differences of arts?

Ion Yes

Soc You would argue as I should that when one art is of one kind of knowledge and another of another they are different?

Ion Yes

Soc Yes surely for if the subject of knowledge were the same there would be no meaning in saying that the arts were different —if they both gave the same knowledge For example I know tha here are five fingers and you know the same And if I were to ask whether I and you became acquainted with this fact by the help of the same art of arithmetic you would acknowledge that we did?

Ion Yes

[538] Soc Tell me then what I was intending to ask you—whether this holds universally? Must the same art have the same subject of knowledge and different arts other subjects of knowledge?

Ion That is my opinion Socrates

Soc Then he who has no knowledge of a particular art will have no right judgment of the sayings and doings of that art?

Ion Very true

Soc Then which will be a better judge of the lines which you were reciting from Homer you or the charioteer?

Ion The charioteer

Soc Why yes because you are a rhapsode and not a charioteer

Ion Yes

Soc And the art of the rhapsode is different from that of the charioteer?

Ion Yes

Soc And if a different knowledge then a knowledge of different matters?

Ion True

Soc You know the passage in which Hecamede the concubine of Nestor is described as giving to the wounded Machaon a posset, as he says

Made with Pramnian wine and she grated cheese of goat s milk with a grater of bron e and at his side placed an onion which gives a relish to drink

Now would you say that the art of the rhapsode or the art of medicine was better able to judge of the propriety of these lines?

Ion The art of medicine

Soc And when Homer says

And she descended into the deep like a leaden plummet which set in the horn of ox that ranges in the fields rushes along carrying death among the ravenous fishes — will the art of the fisherman or of the rhapsode be better able to judge whether these lines are rightly expressed or not?

Ion Clearly Socrates the art of the fisherman

Soc Come now suppose that you were to say to me Since you Socrates are able to assign different passages in Homer to their corresponding arts I wish that you would tell me what are the passages of which the excellence ought to be judged by the prophet and prophetic art and you will see how readily and truly I shall answer you For there are many such passages particularly in the Odyssey as for example the passage in which Theoclymenus the prophet of the house of Melampus says to the suitors —

[539] Wretched men! what is happening to you? Your heads and your faces and your limbs underneath are shrouded in night and the voice of lamentation bursts forth and your cheeks are wet with tears And the vestibule is full and the court is full of ghosts descending into the darkness of Erebus and the sun has perished out of heaven and an evil mist is spread abroad

And there are many such passages in the Iliad also as for example in the description of the battle near the rampart where he says —

As they were eager to pass the ditch there came to them an omen a soaring eagle holding back the people on the left bore a huge bloody dragon in his talons still living and panting nor had he yet resigned the strife for he bent back and smote

SYMPOSIUM

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: APOLLODORUS, who repeats to his companion the dialogue which he had heard from Aristodemus, and had already once narrated to Glaucon; PHAEDRUS; PAUSANIAS; ERYXIMACHUS; ARISTOPHANES; AGATHON; SOCRATES; ALCIBIADES; A TROOP OF REVELLERS. Scene: The House of Agathon

[172] CONCERNING the things about which you ask to be informed I believe that I am not ill prepared with an answer. For the day before yesterday I was coming from my own home at Phalerum to the city, and one of my acquaintance, who had caught a sight of me from behind, calling out playfully in the distance, said: Apollodorus, O thou Phalerian[1] man, halt! So I did as I was bid; and then he said, I was looking for you, Apollodorus, only just now, that I might ask you about the speeches in praise of love, which were delivered by Socrates, Alcibiades, and others, at Agathon's supper. Phoenix, the son of Philip, told another person who told me of them; his narrative was very indistinct, but he said that you knew, and I wish that you would give me an account of them. Who, if not you, should be the reporter of the words of your friend? And first tell me, he said, were you present at this meeting?

Your informant, Glaucon, I said, must have been very indistinct indeed, if you imagine that the occasion was recent; or that I could have been of the party.

Why, yes, he replied, I thought so.

Impossible: I said. Are you ignorant that for many years Agathon has not resided at Athens; and not three have elapsed since I became acquainted with Socrates, and have made it my daily business to know all that he says and does. [173] There was a time when I was running about the world, fancying myself to be well employed, but I was really a most wretched being, no better than you are now. I thought that I ought to do anything rather than be a philosopher.

Well, he said, jesting apart, tell me when the meeting occurred.

In our boyhood, I replied, when Agathon won the prize with his first tragedy, on the day after that on which he and his chorus offered the sacrifice of victory.

Then it must have been a long while ago, he said; and who told you—did Socrates?

No indeed, I replied, but the same person who told Phoenix;—he was a little fellow, who never wore any shoes, Aristodemus, of the deme of Cydathenaeum. He had been at Agathon's feast; and I think that in those days there was no one who was a more devoted admirer of Socrates. Moreover, I have asked Socrates about the truth of some parts of his narrative, and he confirmed them. Then, said Glaucon, let us have the tale over again; is not the road to Athens just made for conversation? And so we walked, and talked of the discourses on love; and therefore, as I said at first, I am not ill prepared to comply with your request, and will have another rehearsal of them if you like. For to speak or to hear others speak of philosophy always gives me the greatest pleasure, to say nothing of the profit. But when I hear another strain, especially that of you rich men and traders, such conversation displeases me;

Soc But then Ion what in the name of goodness can be the reason why you who are the best of generals as well as the best of rhapsodes in all Hellas go about as a rhapsode when you might be a general? Do you think that the Hellenes want a rhapsode with his golden crown and do not want a general?

Ion Why Socrates the reason is that my countrymen the Ephesians are the servants and soldiers of Athens and do not need a general and you and Sparta are not likely to have me for you think that you have enough generals of your own

Soc My good Ion did you never hear of Apollodorus of Cyzicus?

Ion Who may he be?

Soc One who though a foreigner has often been chosen their general by the Athenians and there is Phanosthenes of Andros and Heraclides of Clazomenae whom they have also appointed to the command of their armies and to other offices although aliens after they had shown their merit And will they not choose Ion the Ephesian to be their general and honour him if he prove himself worthy? Were not the Ephesians originally Athenians and Ephesus is no mean city? But indeed Ion if you are correct in saying that by art and knowledge you are able to praise Homer you do not deal fairly with me and after all your professions of knowing many glorious things about Homer and promises that you would exhibit them you are only a deceiver and so far from exhibiting the art of which you are a master will not even after my repeated entreaties explain to me the nature of it You have literally as many forms as Proteus and now you go all manner of ways, twisting and turning and like Proteus become all manner of people at once and at last slip away from me in the disguise of a general [542] in order that you may escape exhibiting your Homeric lore And if you have art then as I was saying in falsifying your promise that you would exhibit Homer you are not dealing fairly with me But if as I believe you have no art but speak all these beautiful words about Homer unconsciously under his inspiring influence then I acquit you of dishonesty and shall only say that you are inspired Which do you prefer to be thought dishonest or inspired?

Ion There is a great difference Socrates between the two alternatives and inspiration is by far the nobler

Soc Then Ion I shall assume the nobler alternative and attribute to you in your praises of Homer inspiration and not art

there is no one to give you orders hitherto I have never left you to yourselves. But on this occasion imagine that you are our hosts, and that I and the company are your guests treat us well, and then we shall commend you." After this, supper was served but still no Socrates and during the meal Agathon several times expressed a wish to send for him, but Aristodemus objected and at last when the feast was about half over—for the fit, as usual was not of long duration—Socrates entered Agathon, who was reclining alone at the end of the table, begged that he would take the place next to him that I may touch you," he said, and have the benefit of that wise thought which came into your mind in the portico, and is now in your possession for I am certain that you would not have come away until you had found what you sought."

How I wish, said Socrates, taking his place as he was desired, that wisdom could be infused by touch, out of the fuller into the emptier man as water runs through wool out of a fuller cup into an emptier one if that were so how greatly should I value the privilege of reclining at your side! For you would have filled me full with a stream of wisdom plenteous and fair whereas my own is of a very mean and questionable sort, no better than a dream. But yours is bright and full of promise, and was manifested forth in all the splendour of youth the day before yesterday in the presence of more than thirty thousand Hellenes.

You are mocking, Socrates, said Agathon, and ere long you and I will have to determine who bears off the palm of wisdom—of this Dionysus shall be the judge but at present you are better occupied with supper [176] Socrates took his place on the couch and supped with the rest and then libations were offered, and after a hymn had been sung to the god and there had been the usual ceremonies, they were about to commence drinking when Pausanias said And now my friends, how can we drink with least injury to ourselves? I can assure you that I feel severely the effect of yesterday's potations, and must have time to recover and I suspect that most of you are in the same predicament, for you were of the party yesterday Consider then How can the drinking be made easiest?

I entirely agree, said Aristophanes, that we should, by all means, avoid hard drinking for I was myself one of those who were yesterday drowned in drink.

I think that you are right, said Eryximachus, the son of Acumenus but I should still like to hear one other person speak Is Agathon able to drink hard?

I am not equal to it said Agathon

Then, said Eryximachus, the weak heads like myself Aristodemus Phaedrus, and others who never can drink, are fortunate in finding that the stronger ones are not in a drinking mood (I do not include Socrates, who is able either to drink or to abstain, and will not mind, which ever we do.) Well, as none of the company seem disposed to drink much, I may be forgiven for saying as a physician that drinking deep is a bad practice, which I never follow if I can help and certainly do not recommend to another least of all to any one who still feels the effects of yesterday's carouse.

I always do what you advise and especially what you prescribe as a physician, rejoined Phaedrus the Myrrhinusian, and the rest of the company if they are wise, will do the same.

It was agreed that drinking was not to be the order of the day but that they were all to drink only so much as they pleased.

Then said Eryximachus, as you are all agreed that drinking is to be voluntary and that there is to be no compulsion, I move in the next place, that the flute girl who has just made her appearance, be told to go away and play to herself or if she likes, to the women who are within. To-day let us have conversation instead and, [177] if you will allow me I will tell you what sort of conversation. This proposal having been accepted, Eryximachus proceeded as follows —

I will begin he said after the manner of Melanippe in Euripides,

Not mine the word which I am about to speak but that of Phaedrus. For often he says to me in an indignant tone —"What a strange thing it is, Eryximachus, that, whereas other gods have poems and hymns made in their honour the great and glorious god Love, has no encomiast among all the poets who are so many There are the worthy sophists too—the excellent Prodicus for example who have descanted in prose on the virtues of Heracles and other heroes and what is still more extraordinary I have met with a philosophical work in which the utility of salt has been made the theme of an eloquent discourse and many other like things have had a like honour bestowed upon them. And only to think that there should have been an eager and I pity you who are my companions because you think that you are doing something when in reality you are doing nothing And I dare say that you pity me in return whom you regard as an unhappy creature and very probably you are right But I certainly know of you what you only think of me—there is the difference

Companion I see Apollodorus that you are just the same—always speaking evil of yourself and of others and I do believe that you pity all mankind with the exception of Socrat s yourself first of all true in this to your old name which however deserved I know not how you acquired, of Apollodorus the madman for you are always raging against yourself and everybody but Socrates

Apollodorus Yes friend and the reason why I am said to be mad and out of my wits is just because I have these notions of myself and you no other evidence is required

Com No more of that Apollodorus but let me renew my request that you would repeat the conversation

Apoll Well the tale of love was on this wise —But perhaps I had better begin at the beginning [174] and endeavour to give you the exact words of Aristodemus

He said that he met Socrates fresh from the bath and sandalled and as the sight of the sandals was unusual he asked him whither he was going that he had been converted into such a beau —

To a banquet at Agathon s he replied whose invitation to his sacrifice of victory I refused yesterday fearing a crowd but promising that I would come to-day instead and so I have put on my finery because he is such a fine man What say you to going with me unasked?

I will do as you bid me I replied

Follow then he said and let us demolish the proverb

To the feasts of inferior men the good unbidden go

instead of which our proverb will run —

To the feasts of the good the good unbidden go and this alteration may be supported by the authority of Homer himself who not only demolishes but literally outrages the proverb For after picturing Agamemnon as the most valiant of men he makes Menelaus who is but a faint hearted warrior come unbidden to the banquet of Agamemnon who is feasting and offering sacrifices not the better to the worse but the worse to the better

I rather fear Socrates said Aristodemus lest this may still be my case and that like Menelaus in Homer I shall be the inferior person, who

To the feasts of the wise unbidden goes

But I shall say that I was bidden of you and then you will have to make an excuse

Two going together

he replied in Homeric fashion one or other of them may invent an excuse by the way

This was the style of their conversation as they went along Socrates dropped behind in a fit of abstraction and desired Aristodemus who was waiting to go on before him When he reached the house of Agathon he found the doors wide open and a comical thing happened A servant coming out met him and led him at once into the banqueting hall in which the guests were reclining for the banquet was about to begin Welcome Aristodemus said Agathon as soon as he appeared—you are just in time to sup with us if you come on any other matter put it off and make one of us as I was looking for you yesterday and meant to have asked you if I could have found you But what have you done with Socrates?

I turned round but Socrates was nowhere to be seen and I had to explain that he had been with me a moment before and that I came by his invitation to the supper

You were quite right in coming said Agathon but where is he himself?

[175] He was behind me just now as I entered he said and I cannot think what has become of him

Go and look for him boy said Agathon and bring him in and do you Aristodemus meanwhile take the place by Eryximachus

The servant then assisted him to wash and he lay down and presently another servant came in and reported that our friend Socrates had retired into the portico of the neighbouring house There he is fixed said he and when I call to him he will not stir

How strange said Agathon then you must call him again and keep calling him

Let him alone said my informant he has a way of stopping anywhere and losing himself without any reason I believe that he will soon appear do not therefore disturb him

Well if you think so I will leave him said Agathon And then turning to the servants, he added Let us have supper without waiting for him Serve up whatever you please, for love But Orpheus, the son of Oeagrus, the harper they sent empty away and presented to him an apparition only of her whom he sought, but herself they would not give up, because he showed no spirit he was only a harp-player and did not dare like Alcestis to die for love but was contriving how he might enter Hades alive moreover they afterwards caused him to suffer death at the hands of women as the punishment of his cowardliness Very different was the reward of the true love of Achilles towards his lover Patroclus—his lover and not his love (the notion that Patroclus was the beloved one is a foolish error into which Aeschylus has fallen, for Achilles was surely the fairer of the two, fairer also than all the other heroes and as Homer informs us, he was still beardless and younger far) [180] And greatly as the gods honour the virtue of love still the return of love on the part of the beloved to the lover is more admired and valued and rewarded by them for the lover is more divine because he is inspired by God Now Achilles was quite aware, for he had been told by his mother that he might avoid death and return home and live to a good old age, if he abstained from slaying Hector Nevertheless he gave his life to revenge his friend and dared to die not only in his defence, but after he was dead Wherefore the gods honoured him even above Alcestis, and sent him to the Islands of the Blest. These are my reasons for affirming that Love is the eldest and noblest and mightiest of the gods, and the chiefest author and giver of virtue in life and of happiness after death

This, or something like this, was the speech of Phaedrus and some other speeches followed which Aristodemus did not remember the next which he repeated was that of Pausanias Phaedrus, he said the argument has not been set before us I think, quite in the right form—we should not be called upon to praise Love in such an indiscriminate manner If there were only one Love then what you said would be well enough but since there are more Loves than one, you should have begun by determining which of them was to be the theme of our praises I will amend this defect and first of all I will tell you which Love is deserving of praise, and then try to hymn the praiseworthy one in a manner worthy of him For we all know that Love is inseparable from Aphrodite and if there were only one Aphrodite there would be only one Love but as there are two goddesses there must be two Loves

And am I not right in asserting that there are two goddesses? The elder one, having no mother who is called the heavenly Aphrodite—she is the daughter of Uranus the younger who is the daughter of Zeus and Dione—her we call common and the Love who is her fellow worker is rightly named common as the other love is called heavenly All the gods ought to have praise given to them, but not without distinction of their natures and therefore I must try to distinguish the characters of the two Loves. Now actions vary according to the manner of their performance [181] Take for example that which we are now doing drinking singing and talking—these actions are not in themselves either good or evil but they turn out in this or that way according to the mode of performing them and when well done they are good and when wrongly done they are evil and in like manner not every love but only that which has a noble purpose is noble and worthy of praise The Love who is the offspring of the common Aphrodite is essentially common and has no discrimination being such as the meaner sort of men feel and is apt to be of women as well as of youths, and is of the body rather than of the soul—the most foolish beings are the objects of this love which desires only to gain an end but never thinks of accomplishing the end nobly and therefore does good and evil quite indiscriminately The goddess who is his mother is far younger than the other and she was born of the union of the male and female, and partakes of both

But the offspring of the heavenly Aphrodite is derived from a mother in whose birth the female has no part —she is from the male only this is that love which is of youths, and the goddess being older there is nothing of wantonness in her Those who are inspired by this love turn to the male, and delight in him who is the more valiant and intelligent nature any one may recognise the pure enthusiasts in the very character of their attachments For they love not boys, but intelligent beings whose reason is beginning to be developed much about the time at which their beards begin to grow And in choosing young men to be their companions they mean to be faithful to them and pass their whole life in company with them not to take them in their inexperience and deceive them, and play the fool with them or run away from one to another of them. But the love of young boys should be forbidden by law because their future is uncertain they may turn out good or bad, either in body or soul and much noble enthusiasm may be thrown away upon them interest created about them and yet that to this day no one has ever dared worthily to hymn Love s praises! So entirely has this great deity been neglected Now in this Phaedrus seems to me to be quite right and therefore I want to offer him a contribution also I think that at the present moment we who are here assembled cannot do better than honour the god Love If you agree with me there will be no lack of conversation for I mean to propose that each of us in turn going from left to right shall make a speech in honour of Love Let him give us the best which he can and Phaedrus because he is sitting first on the left hand and because he is the father of the thought shall begin

No one will vote against you Eryximachus said Socrates How can I oppose your motion who profess to understand nothing but matters of love nor I presume will Agathon and Pausanias and there can be no doubt of Aristophanes whose whole concern is with Dionysus and Aphrodite nor will any one disagree of those whom I see around me The proposal as I am aware may seem rather hard upon us whose place is last but we shall be contented if we hear some good speeches first Let Phaedrus begin the praise of Love and good luck to him All the company expressed their assent [178] and desired him to do as Socrates bade him

Aristodemus did not recollect all that was said nor do I recollect all that he related to me but I will tell you what I thought most worthy of remembrance and what the chief speakers said

Phaedrus began by affirming that Love is a mighty god and wonderful among gods and men but especially wonderful in his birth For he is the eldest of the gods which is an honour to him and a proof of his claim to this honour is that of his parents there is no memorial neither poet nor prose writer has ever affirmed that he had any As Hesiod says

First Chaos came and then broad bosomed Earth
The everlasting seat of all that is
And Love

In other words after Chaos the Earth and Love these two came into being Also Parmenides sings of Generation

First in the train of gods he fashioned Love

And Acusilaus agrees with Hesiod Thus numerous are the witnesses who acknowledge Love to be the eldest of the gods And not only is he the eldest he is also the source of the greatest benefits to us For I know not any greater blessing to a young man who is beginning life than a virtuous lover or to the lover than a beloved youth For the principle which ought to be the guide of men who would nobly live—that principle, I say neither kindred nor honour nor wealth nor any other motive is able to implant so well as love Of what am I speaking? Of the sense of honour and dishonour without which neither states nor individuals ever do any good or great work And I say that a lover who is detected in doing any dishonourable act or submitting through cowardice when any dishonour is done to him by another will be more pained at being detected by his beloved than at being seen by his father or by his companions or by any one else The beloved too when he is found in any disgraceful situation has the same feeling about his lover And if there were only some way of contriving that a state or an army should be made up of lovers and their loves they would be the very best governors of their own city abstaining from all dishonour and emulating one another in honour [179] and when fighting at each others side although a mere handful they would overcome the world For what lover would not choose rather to be seen by all mankind than by his beloved either when abandoning his post or throwing away his arms? He would be ready to die a thousand deaths rather than endure this Or who would desert his beloved or fail him in the hour of danger? The veriest coward would become an inspired hero equal to the bravest at such a time Love would inspire him That courage which as Homer says the god breathes into the souls of some heroes, Love of his own nature infuses into the lover

Love will make men dare to die for their beloved—love alone and women as well as men Of this Alcestis the daughter of Pelias is a monument to all Hellas for she was willing to lay down her life on behalf of her husband when no one else would although he had a father and mother but the tenderness of her love so far exceeded theirs that she made them seem to be strangers in blood to their own son and in name only related to him and so noble did this action of hers appear to the gods as well as to men that among the many who have done virtuously she is one of the very few to whom in admiration of her noble action they have granted the privilege of returning alive to earth such exceeding honour is paid by the gods to the devotion and virtue of

ing both the lover and beloved in contests and trials, until they show to which of the two classes they respectively belong And this is the reason why in the first place, a hasty attachment is held to be dishonourable, because time is the true test of this as of most other things and secondly there is a dishonour in being overcome by the love of money or of wealth, or of political power whether a man is frightened into surrender by the loss of them or having experienced the benefits of money and political corruption, is unable to rise above the seductions of them For none of these things are of a permanent or lasting nature not to mention that no generous friendship ever sprang from them. There remains, then only one way of honourable attachment which custom allows in the beloved, and this is the way of virtue for as we admitted that any service which the lover does to him is not to be accounted flattery or a dishonour to himself, so the beloved has one way only of voluntary service which is not dishonourable, and this is virtuous service

For we have a custom, and according to our custom any one who does service to another under the idea that he will be improved by him either in wisdom, or in some other particular of virtue—such a voluntary service, I say is not to be regarded as a dishonour and is not open to the charge of flattery And these two customs one the love of youth, and the other the practice of philosophy and virtue in general, ought to meet in one, and then the beloved may honourably indulge the lover For when the lover and beloved come together having each of them a law and the lover thinks that he is right in doing any service which he can to his gracious loving one and the other that he is right in showing any kindness which he can to him who is making him wise and good the one capable of communicating wisdom and virtue the other seeking to acquire them with a view to education and wisdom when the two laws of love are fulfilled and meet in one—then, and then only may the beloved yield with honour to the lover Nor when love is of this disinterested sort is there any disgrace in being deceived but in every other case there is equal disgrace in being or not being deceived For he who is gracious to his lover under the impression that he is rich, [185] and is disappointed of his gains because he turns out to be poor is disgraced all the same for he has done his best to show that he would give himself up to any one's "uses base" for the sake of money but this is not honourable And on the same principle he who gives himself to a lover because he is a good man, and in the hope that he will be improved by his company shows himself to be virtuous, even though the object of his affection turn out to be a villain and to have no virtue and if he is deceived he has committed a noble error For he has proved that for his part he will do anything for any body with a view to virtue and improvement than which there can be nothing nobler Thus noble in every case is the acceptance of another for the sake of virtue. This is that love which is the love of the heavenly goddess, and is heavenly and of great price to individuals and cities, making the lover and the beloved alike eager in the work of their own improvement. But all other loves are the offspring of the other who is the common goddess. To you, Phaedrus, I offer this my contribution in praise of love, which is as good as I could make extempore

Pausanias came to a pause—this is the balanced way in which I have been taught by the wise to speak and Aristodemus said that the turn of Aristophanes was next, but either he had eaten too much, or from some other cause he had the hiccough and was obliged to change turns with Eryximachus the physician, who was reclining on the couch below him Eryximachus, he said, you ought either to stop my hiccough, or to speak in my turn until I have left off

I will do both said Eryximachus I will speak in your turn and do you speak in mine and while I am speaking let me recommend you to hold your breath and if after you have done so for some time the hiccough is no better then gargle with a little water and if it still continues, tickle your nose with something and sneeze and if you sneeze once or twice even the most violent hiccough is sure to go I will do as you prescribe said Aristophanes, and now get on.

Eryximachus spoke as follows Seeing that Pausanias made a fair beginning [186] and but a lame ending, I must endeavour to supply his deficiency I think that he has rightly distinguished two kinds of love. But my art further informs me that the double love is not merely an affection of the soul of man towards the fair or towards anything but is to be found in the bodies of all animals and in productions of the earth, and I may say in all that is such is the conclusion which I seem to have gathered from my own art of medicine, whence I learn how great and wonderful and universal is the deity of love, whose empire extends over all in this matter the good are a law to themselves and the coarser sort of lovers ought to be restrained by force as we restrain or attempt to restrain them from fixing their affections on women of free birth [182] These are the persons who bring a reproach on love and some have been led to deny the lawfulness of such attachments because they see the impropriety and evil of them for surely nothing that is decorously and lawfully done can justly be censured

Now here and in Lacedaemon the rules about love are perplexing but in most cities they are simple and easily intelligible in Elis and Boeotia and in countries having no gifts of eloquence they are very straightforward the law is simply in favour of these connexions and no one whether young or old has anything to say to their discredit the reason being as I suppose that they are men of few words in those parts and therefore the lovers do not like the trouble of pleading their suit In Ionia and other places and generally in countries which are subject to the barbarians the custom is held to be dishonourable loves of youths share the evil repute in which philosophy and gymnastics are held because they are inimical to tyranny for the interests of rulers require that their subjects should be poor in spirit and that there should be no strong bond of friendship or society among them which love above all other motives is likely to inspire as our Athenian tyrants learned by experience for the love of Aristogeiton and the constancy of Harmodius had a strength which undid their power And therefore the ill repute into which these attachments have fallen is to be ascribed to the evil condition of those who make them to be ill reputed that is to say to the self seeking of the governors and the cowardice of the governed on the other hand the indiscriminate honour which is given to them in some countries is attributable to the laziness of those who hold this opinion of them In our own country a far better principle prevails but as I was saying the explanation of it is rather perplexing For observe that open loves are held to be more honourable than secret ones and that the love of the noblest and highest even if their persons are less beautiful than others is especially honourable

Consider too how great is the encouragement which all the world gives to the lover neither is he supposed to be doing anything dishonourable but if he succeeds he is praised and if he fail he is blamed And in the pursuit of his love the custom of mankind allows him to do many strange things which philosophy would bitterly censure if they were done from any motive of interest [183] or wish for office or power He may pray and entreat, and supplicate and swear and lie on a mat at the door and endure a slavery worse than that of any slave—in any other case friends and enemies would be equally ready to prevent him but now there is no friend who will be ashamed of him and admonish him and no enemy will charge him with meanness or flattery the actions of a lover have a grace which ennobles them and custom has decided that they are highly commendable and that there is no loss of character in them and what is strangest of all he only may swear and forswear himself (so men say) and the gods will forgive his transgression for there is no such thing as a lover's oath Such is the entire liberty which gods and men have allowed the lover according to the custom which prevails in our part of the world From this point of view a man fairly argues that in Athens to love and to be loved is held to be a very honourable thing But when parents forbid their sons to talk with their lovers and place them under a tutor's care, who is appointed to see to these things and their companions and equals cast in their teeth anything of the sort which they may observe, and their elders refuse to silence the reprovers and do not rebuke them—any one who reflects on all this will on the contrary think that we hold these practices to be most disgraceful But as I was saying at first the truth as I imagine is that whether such practices are honourable or whether they are dishonourable is not a simple question they are honourable to him who follows them honourably dishonourable to him who follows them dishonourably There is dishonour in yielding to the evil or in an evil manner but there is honour in yielding to the good or in an honourable manner

Evil is the vulgar lover who loves the body rather than the soul inasmuch as he is not even stable because he loves a thing which is in itself unstable and therefore when the bloom of youth which he was desiring is over he takes wing and flies away in spite of all his words and promises whereas the love of the noble disposition is life long for it becomes one with the everlasting The custom of our country would have both of them proven well and truly [184] and would have us yield to the one sort of lover and avoid the other and therefore encourages some to pursue, and others to fly test is the peacemaker of gods and men, working by a knowledge of the religious or irreligious tendencies which exist in human loves. Such is the great and mighty, or rather omnipotent force of love in general. And the love, more especially, which is concerned with the good, and which is perfected in company with temperance and justice, whether among gods or men, has the greatest power, and is the source of all our happiness and harmony, and makes us friends with the gods who are above us, and with one another. I dare say that I too have omitted several things which might be said in praise of Love, but this was not intentional, and you, Aristophanes, may now supply the omission or take some other line of commendation; for I perceive that you are rid of the hiccough.

[189] Yes, said Aristophanes, who followed, the hiccough is gone; not, however, until I applied the sneezing; and I wonder whether the harmony of the body has a love of such noises and ticklings, for I no sooner applied the sneezing than I was cured.

Eryximachus said: Beware, friend Aristophanes, although you are going to speak, you are making fun of me; and I shall have to watch and see whether I cannot have a laugh at your expense, when you might speak in peace.

You are quite right, said Aristophanes, laughing. I will unsay my words; but do you please not to watch me, as I fear that in the speech which I am about to make, instead of others laughing with me, which is to the manner born of our muse and would be all the better, I shall only be laughed at by them.

Do you expect to shoot your bolt and escape, Aristophanes? Well, perhaps if you are very careful and bear in mind that you will be called to account, I may be induced to let you off.

Aristophanes professed to open another vein of discourse; he had a mind to praise Love in another way, unlike that either of Pausanias or Eryximachus. Mankind, he said, judging by their neglect of him, have never, as I think, at all understood the power of Love. For if they had understood him they would surely have built noble temples and altars, and offered solemn sacrifices in his honour; but this is not done, and most certainly ought to be done: since of all the gods he is the best friend of men, the helper and the healer of the ills which are the great impediment to the happiness of the race. I will try to describe his power to you, and you shall teach the rest of the world what I am teaching you. In the first place, let me treat of the nature of man and what has happened to it; for the original human nature was not like the present, but different. The sexes were not two as they are now, but originally three in number; there was man, woman, and the union of the two, having a name corresponding to this double nature, which had once a real existence, but is now lost, and the word "Androgynous" is only preserved as a term of reproach. In the second place, the primeval man was round, his back and sides forming a circle; and he had four hands and four feet, one head with two faces, looking opposite ways, [190] set on a round neck and precisely alike; also four ears, two privy members, and the remainder to correspond. He could walk upright as men now do, backwards or forwards as he pleased, and he could also roll over and over at a great pace, turning on his four hands and four feet, eight in all, like tumblers going over and over with their legs in the air; this was when he wanted to run fast. Now the sexes were three, and such as I have described them; because the sun, moon, and earth are three; and the man was originally the child of the sun, the woman of the earth, and the man-woman of the moon, which is made up of sun and earth, and they were all round and moved round and round like their parents. Terrible was their might and strength, and the thoughts of their hearts were great, and they made an attack upon the gods; of them is told the tale of Otys and Ephialtes who, as Homer says, dared to scale heaven, and would have laid hands upon the gods. Doubt reigned in the celestial councils. Should they kill them and annihilate the race with thunderbolts, as they had done the giants, then there would be an end of the sacrifices and worship which men offered to them; but, on the other hand, the gods could not suffer their insolence to be unrestrained.

At last, after a good deal of reflection, Zeus discovered a way. He said: "Methinks I have a plan which will humble their pride and improve their manners; men shall continue to exist, but I will cut them in two and then they will be diminished in strength and increased in numbers; this will have the advantage of making them more profitable to us. They shall walk upright on two legs, and if they continue insolent and will not be quiet, I will split them again and they shall hop about on a single leg." He spoke and cut men in two, like a sorb-apple which is halved for pickling, or as you might divide an egg with a hair; and as he cut them one after another, he bade Apollo give the face and the half of the neck a turn in order that the things divine as well as human And from medicine I will begin that I may do honour to my art There are in the human body these two kinds of love which are confessedly different and unlike and being unlike they have loves and desires which are unlike and the desire of the healthy is one and the desire of the diseased is another and as Pausanias was just now saying that to indulge good men is honourable and bad men dishonourable —so too in the body the good and healthy elements are to be indulged and the bad elements and the elements of disease are not to be indulged but discouraged And this is what the physician has to do and in this the art of medicine consists for medicine may be regarded generally as the knowledge of the loves and desires of the body and how to satisfy them or not and the best physician is he who is able to separate fair love from foul or to convert one into the other and he who knows how to eradicate and how to implant love whichever is required and can reconcile the most hostile elements in the constitution and make them loving friends is a skilful practitioner Now the most hostile are the most opposite such as hot and cold bitter and sweet moist and dry and the like And my ancestor Asclepius knowing how to implant friendship and accord in these elements was the creator of our art as our friends the poets here tell us and I believe them and not only medicine in every branch but the arts of gymnastic and husbandry are under his dominion

[187] Any one who pays the least attention to the subject will also perceive that in music there is the same reconciliation of opposites and I suppose that this must have been the meaning of Heracleitus although his words are not accurate for he says that The One is united by disunion like the harmony of the bow and the lyre Now there is an absurdity in saying that harmony is discord or is composed of elements which are still in a state of discord But what he probably meant was that harmony is composed of differing notes of higher or lower pitch which disagreed once but are now reconciled by the art of music for if the higher and lower notes still disagreed there could be no harmony—clearly not For harmony is a symphony and symphony is an agreement but an agreement of disagreements while they disagree there cannot be you cannot harmonize that which disagrees In like manner rhythm is compounded of elements short and long once differing and now in accord which accordance as in the former instance medicine so in all these other cases music implants making love and unison to grow up among them and thus music too is concerned with the principles of love in their application to harmony and rhythm Again in the essential nature of harmony and rhythm there is no difficulty in discerning love which has not yet become double But when you want to use them in actual life, either in the composition of songs or in the correct performance of airs or metres composed already which latter is called education then the difficulty begins and the good artist is needed Then the old tale has to be repeated of fair and heavenly love—the love of Urania the fair and heavenly muse and of the duty of accepting the temperate and those who are as yet intemperate only that they may become temperate and of preserving their love and again of the vulgar Polyhymnia who must be used with circumspection that the pleasure be enjoyed but may not generate licentiousness just as in my own art it is a great matter so to regulate the desires of the epicure that he may gratify his tastes without the attendant evil of disease Whence I infer that in music in medicine in all other things human as well as divine both loves ought to be noted as far as may be [188] for they are both present

The course of the seasons is also full of both these principles and when as I was saying the elements of hot and cold moist and dry attain the harmonious love of one another and blend in temperance and harmony they bring to men animals and plants health and plenty and do them no harm whereas the wanton love, getting the upper hand and affecting the seasons of the year is very destructive and injurious being the source of pestilence and bringing many other kinds of diseases on animals and plants for hoar frost and hail and blight spring from the excesses and disorders of these elements of love which to know in relation to the revolutions of the heavenly bodies and the seasons of the year is termed astronomy Furthermore all sacrifices and the whole province of divination which is the art of communion between gods and men—these I say are concerned only with the preservation of the good and the cure of the evil love For all manner of impiety is likely to ensue if instead of accepting and honouring and reverencing the harmonious love in all his actions a man honours the other love whether in his feelings towards gods or parents towards the living or the dead. Wherefore the business of divination is to see to these loves and to heal them and divination were dispersed into villages by the Lacedaemonians. And if we are not obedient to the gods, there is a danger that we shall be split up again and go about in basso-relievo, like the profile figures having only half a nose which are sculptured on monuments, and that we shall be like tallies.

Wherefore let us exhort all men to piety, that we may avoid evil, and obtain the good of which Love is to us the lord and minister; and let no one oppose him—he is the enemy of the gods who oppose him. For if we are friends of the God and at peace with him we shall find our own true loves, which rarely happens in this world at present. I am serious, and therefore I must beg Eryximachus not to make fun or to find any allusion in what I am saying to Pausanias and Agathon, who, as I suspect, are both of the manly nature, and belong to the class which I have been describing. But my words have a wider application—they include men and women everywhere; and I believe that if our loves were perfectly accomplished, and each one returning to his primeval nature had his original true love, then our race would be happy. And if this would be best of all, the best in the next degree and under present circumstances must be the nearest approach to such an union; and that will be the attainment of a congenial love. Wherefore, if we would praise him who has given to us the benefit, we must praise the god Love, who is our greatest benefactor, both leading us in this life back to our own nature, and giving us high hopes for the future, for he promises that if we are pious, he will restore us to our original state, and heal us and make us happy and blessed. This, Eryximachus, is my discourse of love, which, although different to yours, I must beg you to leave unassailed by the shafts of your ridicule, in order that each may have his turn; each, or rather either, for Agathon and Socrates are the only ones left.

Indeed, I am not going to attack you, said Eryximachus, for I thought your speech charming, and did I not know that Agathon and Socrates are masters in the art of love, I should be really afraid that they would have nothing to say, after the world of things which have been said already. But, for all that, I am not without hopes.

[194] Socrates said: You played your part well, Eryximachus; but if you were as I am now, or rather as I shall be when Agathon has spoken, you would, indeed, be in a great strait.

Cf. Aristot., Pol. ii. 2, 1261 a 30.

You want to cast a spell over me, Socrates, said Agathon, in the hope that I may be disconcerted at the expectation raised among the audience that I shall speak well.

I should be strangely forgetful, Agathon, replied Socrates, of the courage and magnanimity which you showed when your own compositions were about to be exhibited, and you came upon the stage with the actors and faced the vast theatre altogether undismayed, if I thought that your nerves could be fluttered at a small party of friends.

Do you think, Socrates, said Agathon, that my head is so full of the theatre as not to know how much more formidable to a man of sense a few good judges are than many fools?

Nay, replied Socrates, I should be very wrong in attributing to you, Agathon, that or any other want of refinement. And I am quite aware that if you happened to meet with any whom you thought wise, you would care for their opinion much more than for that of the many. But then we, having been a part of the foolish many in the theatre, cannot be regarded as the select wise; though I know that if you chanced to be in the presence, not of one of ourselves, but of some really wise man, you would be ashamed of disgracing yourself before him—would you not?

Yes, said Agathon.

But before the many you would not be ashamed, if you thought that you were doing something disgraceful in their presence?

Here Phaedrus interrupted them, saying: Do not answer him, my dear Agathon; for if he can only get a partner with whom he can talk, especially a good-looking one, he will no longer care about the completion of our plan. Now I love to hear him talk; but just at present I must not forget the encomium on Love which I ought to receive from him and from every one. When you and he have paid your tribute to the god, then you may talk.

Very good, Phaedrus, said Agathon; I see no reason why I should not proceed with my speech, as I shall have many other opportunities of conversing with Socrates. Let me say first how I ought to speak, and then speak:—

The previous speakers, instead of praising the god Love, or unfolding his nature, appear to have congratulated mankind on the benefits which he confers upon them. [195] But I would rather praise the god first, and then speak of his gifts; this is always the right way of praising everything. May I say without impiety or offence, that of all the blessed gods he man might contemplate the section of himself he would thus learn a lesson of humility Apollo was also bidden to heal their wounds and compose their forms So he gave a turn to the face and pulled the skin from the sides all over that which in our language is called the belly like the purses which draw in and he made one mouth at the centre which he fastened in a knot (the same which is called the navel) [191] he also moulded the breast and took out most of the wrinkles much as a shoemaker might smooth leather upon a last he left a few, however in the region of the belly and navel as a memorial of the primeval state After the division the two parts of man each desiring his other half came together and throwing their arms about one another entwined in mutual embraces longing to grow into one they were on the point of dying from hunger and self neglect because they did not like to do any thing apart and when one of the halves died and the other survived the survivor sought an other mate man or woman as we call them — being the sections of entire men or women — and clung to that They were being destroyed when Zeus in pity of them invented a new plan he turned the parts of generation round to the front for this had not been always their posi tion and they sowed the seed no longer as hitherto like grasshoppers in the ground but in one another and after the transposition the male generated in the female in order that by the mutual embraces of man and woman they might breed and the race might continue or if man came to man they might be satisfied and rest and go their ways to the business of life so ancient is the desire of one another which is implanted in us reuniting our original na ture making one of two and healing the state of man

Each of us when separated having one side only like a flat fish is but the indenture of a man and he is always looking for his other half Men who are a section of that double na ture which was once called Androgynous are lovers of women adulterers are generally of this breed and also adulterous women who lust after men the women who are a section of the woman do not care for men but have female attachments the female companions are of this sort But they who are a section of the male follow the male and while they are young being slices of the original man [192] they hang about men and embrace them and they are themselves the best of boys and youths be cause they have the most manly nature Some indeed assert that they are shameless, but this is not true for they do not act thus from any want of shame but because they are valiant and manly, and have a manly countenance and they embrace that which is like them And these when they grow up become our statesmen and these only which is a great proof of the truth of what I am saying When they reach manhood they are lovers of youth and are not naturally inclined to marry or beget children — if at all they do so only in obedience to the law but they are satisfied if they may be allowed to live with one another unwedded and such a nature is prone to love and ready to return love always embracing that which is akin to him And when one of them meets with his other half the ac tual half of himself whether he be a lover of youth or a lover of another sort the pair are lost in an amazement of love and friendship and intimacy and will not be out of the other's sight as I may say even for a moment these are the people who pass their whole lives together yet they could not explain what they desire of one another For the intense yearning which each of them has towards the other does not appear to be the desire of lover's intercourse but of something else which the soul of either evidently desires and cannot tell and of which she has only a dark and doubtful presentiment Suppose Hephaestus with his instruments to come to the pair who are lying side by side and to say to them What do you people want of one another? they would be unable to explain And suppose further that when he saw their perplexity he said Do you desire to be wholly one always day and night to be in one another's company? for if this is what you desire I am ready to melt you into one and let you grow to gether so that being two you shall become one and while you live live a common life as if you were a single man and after your death in the world below still be one departed soul instead of two — I ask whether this is what you lovingly desire and whether you are satisfied to attain this? — there is not a man of them who when he heard the proposal would deny or would not acknowledge that this meeting and melting into one another this becoming one instead of two was the very expression of his ancient need And the reason is that human nature was originally one and we were a whole [193] and the desire and pursuit of the whole is called love There was a time I say when we were one but now because of the wickedness of man kind God has dispersed us as the Arcadians were dispersed into villages by the Lacedaemonians.[1] And if we are not obedient to the gods, there is a danger that we shall be split up again and go about in basso-relievo, like the profile figures having only half a nose which are sculptured on monuments, and that we shall be like tallies.

Cf Aristotle Politics ii 4 1262b14

May I say without impiety or offence, that of all the blessed gods he is the most blessed because he is the fairest and best? And he is the fairest for in the first place he is the youngest and of his youth he is himself the witness fleeing out of the way of age who is swift enough swifter truly than most of us like —Love hates him and will not come near him but youth and love live and move together—like to like as the proverb says Many things were said by Phaedrus about Love in which I agree with him but I cannot agree that he is older than Iapetus and Kronos —not so I maintain him to be the youngest of the gods, and youthful ever The ancient doings among the gods of which Hesiod and Parmenides spoke if the tradition of them be true were done of Necessity and not of Love had Love been in those days there would have been no chaining or mutilation of the gods or other violence but peace and sweetness as there is now in heaven since the rule of Love began

Love is young and also tender he ought to have a poet like Homer to describe his tenderness as Homer says of Ate that she is a goddess and tender

Her feet are tender for she sets her steps
Not on the ground but on the heads of men

herein is an excellent proof of her tenderness —that she walks not upon the hard but upon the soft Let us adduce a similar proof of the tenderness of Love for he walks not upon the earth nor yet upon the skulls of men which are not so very soft but in the hearts and souls of both gods and men which are of all things the softest in them he walks and dwells and makes his home Not in every soul without exception for where there is hardness he departs where there is softness there he dwells and nestling always with his feet and in all manner of ways in the softest of soft places how can he be other than the softest of all things? [196] Of a truth he is the tenderest as well as the youngest and also he is of flexile form for if he were hard and without flexure he could not enfold all things or wind his way into and out of every soul of man undiscovered And a proof of his flexibility and symmetry of form is his grace which is universally admitted to be in an especial manner the attribute of Love ungrace and love are always at war with one another The fairness of his complexion is revealed by his habitation among the flowers for he dwells not amid bloomless or fading beauties whether of body or soul or aught else but in the place of flowers and scents there he sits and abides Concerning the beauty of the god I have said enough and yet there remains much more which I might say Of his virtue I have now to speak his greatest glory is that he can neither do nor suffer wrong to or from any god or any man for he suffers not by force if he suffers force comes not near him neither when he acts does he act by force. For all men in all things serve him of their own free will and where there is voluntary agreement, there, as the laws which are the lords of the city say is justice And not only is he just but exceedingly temperate for Temperance is the acknowledged ruler of the pleasures and desires and no pleasure ever masters Love he is their master and they are his servants and if he conquers them he must be temperate indeed As to courage even the God of War is no match for him he is the captive and Love is the lord for love, the love of Aphrodite masters him as the tale runs and the master is stronger than the servant And if he conquers the bravest of all others, he must be himself the bravest.

Of his courage and justice and temperance I have spoken but I have yet to speak of his wisdom and according to the measure of my ability I must try to do my best In the first place he is a poet (and here like Eryximachus I magnify my art) and he is also the source of poesy in others which he could not be if he were not himself a poet And at the touch of him every one becomes a poet even though he had no music in him before this also is a proof that Love is a good poet and accomplished in all the fine arts for no one can give to another that which he has not himself or teach that of which he has no knowledge Who will deny that the creation of the animals is his doing? Are they not all the works of his wisdom [197] born and begotten of him? And as to the artists, do we not know that he only of them whom love inspires has the light of fame?—he whom Love touches not walks in darkness The arts of medicine and archery and divination were discovered by Apollo under the guidance of love and desire so that he too is a disciple of Love Also the melody of the Muses the metallurgy of Hephaestus the weaving of Athene the empire of Zeus over gods and men are all due to Love who was the inventor of them And so Love set in order the empire of the gods —the love of beauty as is evident for with deformity Love has no concern In the days of old as I began by saying dreadful deeds were done among the gods for they were ruled by Necessity but now since the birth of Love and from the Love of the beautiful has sprung every good in heaven and earth Therefore Phaedrus, I say of Love that he is the fairest and best in himself and the cause of what is fairest and best in all other things And there comes into my mind a line of poetry in which he is said to be the god who

Gives peace on earth and calms the stormy deep
Who stills the winds and bids the sufferer sleep

This is he who empties men of disaffection and fills them with affection who makes them to meet together at banquets such as these in sacrifices feasts, dances, he is our lord— who sends courtesy and sends away discourtesy who gives kindness ever and never gives unkindness the friend of the good the wonder of the wise the amazement of the gods desired by those who have no part in him and precious to those who have the better part in him parent of delicacy luxury desire fondness, softness, grace regardful of the good regardless of the evil in every word work wish fear —saviour pilot comrade helper glory of gods and men leader best and brightest in whose footsteps let every man follow sweetly singing in his honour and joining in that sweet strain with which love charms the souls of gods and men Such is the speech Phaedrus half playful yet having a certain measure of seriousness, which according to my ability I dedicate to the god

[198] When Agathon had done speaking Aristodemus said that there was a general cheer the young man was thought to have spoken in a manner worthy of himself and of the god And Socrates looking at Eryximachus said Tell me son of Acumenus was there not reason in my fears? and was I not a true prophet when I said that Agathon would make a wonderful oration and that I should be in a strait?

The part of the prophecy which concerns Agathon replied Eryximachus, appears to me to be true but not the other part—that you will be in a strait

Why my dear friend said Socrates must not I or any one be in a strait who has to speak after he has heard such a rich and varied discourse? I am especially struck with the beauty of the concluding words—who could listen to them without amazement? When I reflected on the immeasurable inferiority of my own powers I was ready to run away for shame if there had been a possibility of escape For I was reminded of Gorgias, and at the end of his speech I fancied that Agathon was shaking at me the Gorginian or Gorgonian head of the great master of rhetoric which was simply to turn me and my speech into stone as Homer says and strike me dumb And then I perceived how foolish I had been in consenting to take my turn with you in praising love and saying that I too was a master of the art when I really had no conception how anything ought to be praised For in my simplicity I imagined that the topics of praise should be true and that this being presupposed out of the true the speaker was to choose the best and set them forth in the best manner And I felt quite proud thinking that I knew the nature of true praise and should speak well Whereas I now see that the intention was to attribute to Love every species of greatness and glory whether really belonging to him or not, without regard to truth or falsehood—that was no matter for the original proposal seems to have been not that each of you should really praise Love but only that you should appear to praise him And so you attribute to Love every imaginable form of praise which can be gathered anywhere and you say that "he is all this" and "the cause of all that" [199] making him appear the fairest and best of all to those who know him not for you cannot impose upon those who know him And a noble and solemn hymn of praise have you rehearsed But as I misunderstood the nature of the praise when I said that I would take my turn I must beg to be absolved from the promise which I made in ignorance and which (as Euripides would say) was a promise of the lips and not of the mind Farewell then to such a strain for I do not praise in that way no indeed I cannot But if you like to hear the truth about love I am ready to speak in my own manner though I will not make myself ridiculous by entering into any rivalry with you Say then Phaedrus whether you would like to have the truth about love spoken in any words and in any order which may happen to come into my mind at the time Will that be agreeable to you?

Aristodemus said that Phaedrus and the company bid him speak in any manner which he thought best. Then he added let me have your permission first to ask Agathon a few more questions in order that I may take his admissions as the premisses of my discourse.

I grant the permission said Phaedrus put your questions. Socrates then proceeded as follows —

In the magnificent oration which you have just uttered I think that you were right my dear Agathon, in proposing to speak of the nature of Love first and afterwards of his works —that is a way of beginning which I very much approve And as you have spoken so eloquently of his nature may I ask you further Whether love is the love of something or of nothing? And here I must explain myself I do not want you to say that love is the love of a father or the love of a mother—that would be ridiculous but to answer as you would if I asked is a father a father of something? to which you would find no difficulty in replying of a son or daughter and the answer would be right

Very true said Agathon

And you would say the same of a mother?

He assented

Yet let me ask you one more question in order to illustrate my meaning Is not a brother to be regarded essentially as a brother of some thing?

Certainly he replied

That is of a brother or sister?

Yes he said

And now said Socrates I will ask about Love —Is Love of something or of nothing?

[200] Of something surely he replied

Keep in mind what this is and tell me what I want to know—whether Love desires that of which love is

Yes surely

And does he possess or does he not possess that which he loves and desires?

Probably not I should say

Nay replied Socrates I would have you consider whether necessarily is not rather the word The inference that he who desires something is in want of something and that he who desires nothing is in want of nothing is in my judgment Agathon absolutely and necessarily true What do you think?

I agree with you said Agathon

Very good Would he who is great desire to be great or he who is strong desire to be strong?

That would be inconsistent with our previous admissions

True For he who is anything cannot want to be that which he is?

Very true

And yet added Socrates if a man being strong desired to be strong or being swift desired to be swift or being healthy desired to be healthy in that case he might be thought to desire something which he already has or is I give the example in order that we may avoid misconception For the possessors of these qualities Agathon must be supposed to have their respective advantages at the time whether they choose or not and who can desire that which he has? Therefore when a person says I am well and wish to be well or I am rich and wish to be rich and I desire simply to have what I have—to him we shall reply You, my friend having wealth and health and strength want to have the continuance of them for at this moment whether you choose or no you have them And when you say I desire that which I have and nothing else is not your meaning that you want to have what you now have in the future? He must agree with us—must he not?

He must replied Agathon

Then said Socrates he desires that what he has at present may be preserved to him in the future which is equivalent to saying that he desires something which is non-existent to him, and which as yet he has not got

Very true he said

Then he and every one who desires desires that which he has not already and which is future and not present and which he has not, and is not and of which he is in want —these are the sort of things which love and desire seek?

Very true he said

Then now said Socrates let us recapitulate the argument First is not love of somethin and of something too which is wanting to a man?

[201] Yes he replied

Remember further what you said in your speech or if you do not remember I will remind you you said that the love of the beautiful set in order the empire of the gods for that of deformed things there is no love—did you not say something of that kind?

Yes said Agathon

Yes my friend and the remark was a just one And if this is true Love is the love of beauty and not of deformity?

He assented

And the admission has been already made that Love is of something which a man wants and has not?

True he said

Then Love wants and has not beauty?

Certainly he replied

And would you call that beautiful which wants and does not possess beauty?

Certainly not

Then would you still say that love is beautiful?

Agathon replied I fear that I did not understand what I was saying

You made a very good speech Agathon, replied Socrates but there is yet one small question wh ch I ould fain ask —Is not the good also the beautiful?

Yes.

Then in wanting the beautiful love wants also the good?

I cannot refute you, Socrates, sa d Agathon —Let us assum that what you say is true

Say rather beloved Agathon, that you cannot refute the truth for Socrates is easily refuted

And now taking my leave of you, I will rehearse a tale of love which I heard from Diotima of Mantineia, a oman ise in this and in many other k nds of knowledge, who in the days of old, wh n the Athenians offered sacrifice before the coming of the plague delayed th disease ten years She was my instructress in the art of lo e, and I shall repeat to you what she said to me, beginning with the admissions made by Agathon, which are nearly if not quite the same which I made to the wise woman when she questioned me I think that this will be the easiest way and I shall take both parts myself as well as I can As you, Agathon, suggested I must speak first of the being and nature f Love, and then of his works First I said to her in nearly the same words hich he used to me, that Love was a mighty god and likewise fair and she proved to me as I p oved to him that, by my own sho ing Love was neither fair nor good Wh t do you mean, Diotima, I said, is l ve then evil and foul?" Hush he cried must that be foul which is not fair? [202] Certainly I said And is that which is not wise, ignorant? do you not see that there is a mean between wisdom and ignorance? And what may that be I said. Right opinion she replied which, as you know being incapable of giving a reason, is not knowledge (f h w can knowledge be de d of reason? nor again gnorance, for neither can ignorance attain the truth) but is clearly something which is a mean between ignorance and wisd m Quite true, I replied Do not then insist, she said that what is not fair is of necessity foul or what is not good evil or infer that because lo e is not fair and good he is therefore f ul and vil for he is in a mean between them Well," I said, Love is surely admitted by all to be a great god. By those who know or by those who do not know?" By all And how Socrates," she said with a smile can Love be ackn ledged to be a great god by those who say that he is not a god at all?" "And who are they?" I said. You and I are two of them," she replied. How can that be?" I said It is quite intelligible, she replied "for you yourself would acknowledge that the gods are happy and fair—of course you would— ould you dare to say that any god was not?" Certainly not, I replied "And you mean by the happy those who are the possessors of things good or fair?" "Yes. "And you admitted that Love because he was in want, desires those good and fair things of which he is in want?" "Yes I did"

But how can he be a god who has no portion in what is either good or fair?" "Impossible." "Then you see that you also deny the divinity of Lo e

What then is Love? I asked "Is he mortal?" No "What then?" "As in th former instance he is neither mortal nor immortal, but in a mean between the two" What is he, Diotima? He is a great spirit (δαίμων) and like all spirits he is intermediate between the divine and the mortal "And what," I said, is his power?" "He interprets, she replied, between gods and men conveying and taking across to the gods the prayers and sacr fices of men and to men the commands and replies of the gods he is the mediator who spans the chasm which di ides them, and therefore in him all is bound together and through him the arts of the prophet and the priest, [203] their sacrifices and mysteries and charms, and all prophecy and incantat on find th ir way For God mingles not w th man but through Love all the intercourse and converse of god with man, whether awake or asleep is carried on The wisdom wh ch understands this is spiritual al other wisdom such as that of arts and handicrafts is mean and vulgar Now these spirits or intermediate po ers are many and d verse, and one of them is Lo e" "And who, I said was his father and who his mother?" "The tale, she said, will take time nevertheless I ill tell you On the birthday of Aphrodite there was a feast of the gods, at which the god Poros or Plenty who is the son of Metis or Discretion was one of the guests. When the feast was over Penia or Poverty as the manner is on such occasions, came about the doors to beg Now Plenty who was the worse for nectar (there was no wine in those days) went into the garden of Zeus and fell into a heavy sleep and Poverty considering her own straitened circumstances plotted to have a child by him and accordingly she lay down at his side and conceived Love who partly be cause he is naturally a lover of the beautiful and because Aphrodite is herself beautiful and also because he was born on her birthday is her follower and attendant And as his parentage is so also are his fortunes In the first place he is always poor, and anything but ten der and fair as the many imagine him and he is rough and squalid and has no shoes nor a house to dwell in on the bare earth exposed he lies under the open heaven in the streets or at the doors of houses taking his rest and like his mother he is always in distress Like his father too whom he also partly resembles he is always plotting against the fair and good he is bold enterprising strong a mighty hunt er always weaving some intrigue or other keen in the pursuit of wisdom fertile in re sources a philosopher at all times terrible as an enchanter sorcerer sophist He is by nature neither mortal nor immortal but alive and flourishing at one moment when he is in plenty and dead at another moment and again alive by reason of his father s nature But that which is always flowing in is always flowing out and so he is never in want and never in wealth and further, he is in a mean between ignorance and knowledge The truth of the matter is this No god is a philosopher or seeker after wisdom for he is wise already nor does any man who is wise seek after wisdom Neither do the ignorant seek after wisdom [204] For herein is the evil of ignorance that he who is neither good nor wise is nevertheless satisfied with himself he has no desire for that of which he feels no want But who then Diotima I said are the lovers of wisdom if they are neither the wise nor the foolish? A child may answer that question she replied they are those who are in a mean between the two Love is one of them For wisdom is a most beautiful thing and Love is of the beautiful and therefore Love is also a philosopher or lover of wisdom and being a lover of wisdom is in a mean between the wise and the igno- rant And of this too his birth is the cause for his father is wealthy and wise and his mother poor and foolish Such my dear Socrates is the nature of the spirit Love The error in your conception of him was very natural and as I imagine from what you say has arisen out of a confusion of love and the beloved which made you think that love was all beautiful For the beloved is the truly beautiful and delicate, and perfect and blessed but the principle of love is of another nature and is such as I have described

I said O thou stranger woman, thou sayest well but assuming Love to be such as you say what is the use of him to men That, Soc rates she replied I will attempt to unfold of his nature and birth I have already spoken and you acknowledge that love is of the beauti ful But some one will say Of the beautiful in what Socrates and Diotima?—or rather let me put the question more clearly and ask When a man loves the beautiful what does he desire? I answered her That the beautiful may be his Still she said the answer su gests a further question What is given by the possession of beauty? To what you have asked I replied I have no answer ready Then she said let me put the word good in the place of the beautiful and repeat the question once more If he who loves loves the good what is it then that he loves? The possession of the good I said And what does he gain who possesses the good? Happiness, I replied there is less difficulty in answering that question [205] Yes she said the happy are made happy by the acquisition of good things Nor is there any need to ask why a man desires happiness the answer is already final "You are right I said And is this wish and this desire common to all? and do all men always desire their own good or only some men?—what say you? All men I re plied the desire is common to all Why then she rejoined, are not all men Socrates, said to love but only some of them? whereas you say that all men are always loving the same things I myself wonder I said why this is There is nothing to wonder at she re plied the reason is that one part of love is separated off and receives the name of the whole but the other parts have other names

Give an illustration I said She answered me as follows There is poetry which as you know is complex and manifold All creation or passage of non being into being is poetry or making and the processes of all art are crea tive and the masters of arts are all poets or makers Very true Still she said you know that they are not called poets but have other names only that portion of the art which is separated off from the rest and is concerned with music and metre is termed poetry and they who possess poetry in this sense of the word are called poets "Very true I said

And the same holds of love. For you may say generally that all desire of good and happiness is only the great and subtle power of love but they who are drawn towards him by any other path, whether the path of money making or gymnastics or philosophy are not called lovers —the name of the whole is appropriated to those whose affection takes one form only— they alone are said to love, or to be lovers."

I dare say I replied, "that you are right.

Yes, she added, and you hear people say that lovers are seeking for their other half but I say that they are seeking neither for the half of themselves, nor for the whole, unless the half or the whole be also a good And they will cut off their own hands and feet and cast them away if they are evil for they love not what is their own, unless perchance there be some one who calls what belongs to him the good, [206] and what belongs to another the evil For there is nothing which men love but the good. Is there anything? Certainly I should say that there is nothing Then, she said, "the simple truth is, that men love the good. "Yes, I said. "To which must be added that they love the possession of the good?

Yes, that must be added And not only the possession, but the everlasting possession of the good? "That must be added too "Then love, she said, may be described generally as the love of the everlasting possession of the good? "That is most true.

"Then if this be the nature of love, can you tell me further" she said, what is the manner of the pursuit? what are they doing who show all this eagerness and heat which is called love? and what is the object which they have in view? Answer me. Nay Diotima, I replied, if I had known, I should not have wondered at your wisdom, neither should I have come to learn from you about this very matter" Well, she said, I will teach you —The object which they have in view is birth in beauty whether of body or soul I do not understand you, I said the oracle requires an explanation. I will make my meaning clearer she replied

I mean to say that all men are bringing to the birth in their bodies and in their souls. There is a certain age at which human nature is desirous of procreation—procreation which must be in beauty and not in deformity and this procreation is the union of man and woman, and is a divine thing for conception and generation are an immortal principle in the mortal creature, and in the inharmonious they can never be. But the deformed is always inharmonious with the divine, and the beautiful harmonious. Beauty then, is the destiny or goddess of parturition who presides at birth, and therefore when approaching beauty the conceiving power is propitious, and diffusive, and benign, and begets and bears fruit at the sight of ugliness she frowns and contracts and has a sense of pain, and turns away and shrivels up, and not without a pang refrains from conception. And this is the reason why when the hour of conception arrives, and the teeming nature is full there is such a flutter and ecstasy about beauty whose approach is the alleviation of the pain of travail For love, Socrates, is not, as you imagine, the love of the beautiful only"

What then?" "The love of generation and of birth in beauty" "Yes," I said Yes, indeed" she replied. But why of generation?" Because to the mortal creature, generation is a sort of eternity and immortality" she replied and if as has been already admitted, love is of the everlasting possession of the good, all men will necessarily desire immortality together with good [207] Wherefore love is of immortality

All this she taught me at various times when she spoke of love. And I remember her once saying to me, "What is the cause, Socrates, of love, and the attendant desire? See you not how all animals, birds, as well as beasts, in their desire of procreation, are in agony when they take the infection of love, which begins with the desire of union whereto is added the care of offspring on whose behalf the weakest are ready to battle against the strongest even to the uttermost, and to die for them, and will let themselves be tormented with hunger or suffer anything in order to maintain their young Man may be supposed to act thus from reason but why should animals have these passionate feelings? Can you tell me why?" Again I replied that I did not know She said to me And do you expect ever to become a master in the art of love, if you do not know this? But I have told you already Diotima, that my ignorance is the reason why I come to you for I am conscious that I want a teacher tell me then the cause of this and of the other mysteries of love." Marvel not," she said, "if you believe that love is of the immortal as we have several times acknowledged for here again, and on the same principle too, the mortal nature is seeking as far as is possible to be everlasting and immortal and this is only to be attained by generation, because generation always leaves behind a new existence in the place of the old.

Nay even in the life of the same individual there is succession and not absolute unity a man is called the same and yet in the short interval which elapses between youth and age and in which every animal is said to have life and identity he is undergoing a perpetual process of loss and reparation—hair, flesh bones blood and the whole body are always changing Which is true not only of the body but also of the soul whose habits tempers opinions desires pleasures pains fears, never remain the same in any one of us but are always coming and going and equally true of knowledge and what is still more surprising to us mortals [208] not only do the sciences in general spring up and decay so that in respect of them we are never the same but each of them individually experiences a like change For what is implied in the word recollection but the departure of knowledge which is ever being forgotten and is renewed and preserved by recollection and appears to be the same although in reality new according to that law of succession by which all mortal things are preserved not absolutely the same but by substitution the old worn-out mortality leaving another new and similar existence behind—unlike the divine which is always the same and not another? And in this way Socrates the mortal body or mortal anything partakes of immortality but the immortal in another way Marvel not then at the love which all men have of their offspring for that universal love and interest is for the sake of immortality

I was astonished at her words and said Is this really true O thou wise Diotima? And she answered with all the authority of an accomplished sophist Of that Socrates you may be assured —think only of the ambition of men and you will wonder at the senseless ness of their ways unless you consider how they are stirred by the love of an immortality of fame They are ready to run all risks greater far than they would have run for their children and to spend money and undergo any sort of toil and even to die for the sake of leaving behind them a name which shall be eternal Do you imagine that Alcestis would have died to save Admetus or Achilles to avenge Patroclus or your own Codrus in order to preserve the kingdom for his sons if they had not imagined that the memory of their virtues which still survives among us would be immortal? Nay she said I am persuaded that all men do all things and the better they are the more they do them in hope of the glorious fame of immortal virtue for they desire th immortal

Those who are pregnant in the body onl betake themselves to women and beget chil dren—this is the character of their love the offspring as they hope will preserve the memory and give them the blessedness an immortality which they desire in the futur But souls which are pregnant—for there cer tainly are men who are [209] more creativ in their souls than in their bodies—conceiv that which is proper for the soul to conceiv or contain And what are these conceptions?—wisdom and virtue in general And such crea tors are poets and all artists who are deserving of the name inventor But the greatest and fair est sort of wisdom by far is that which is con cerned with the ordering of states and families, and which is called temperance and justice. And he who in youth has the seed of these implanted in him and is himself inspired when he comes to maturity desires to beget and generate He wanders about seeking beauty that he may beget offspring—for in deformity he will beget nothing—and naturally embraces the beautiful rather than the deformed body above all when he finds a fair and noble and well nurtured soul he embraces the two in one person and to such an one he is full of speech about virtue and the nature and pursuits of a good man and he tries to educate him and at the touch of the beautiful which is ever present to his memory even when absent, he brings forth that which he had conceived long before, and in company with him tends that which he brings forth and they are married by a far nearer tie and have a closer friendship than those who beget mortal children for the chil dren who are their common offspring are fairer and more immortal Who when he thinks of Homer and Hesiod and other great poets, would not rather have their children than or dinary human ones? Who would not emulate them in the creation of children such as theirs, which have preserved their memory and given them everlasting glory? Or who would no have such children as Lycurgus left behind him to be the saviours not only of Lacedaemon but of Hellas as one may say? There is Solon too, who is the revered father of Athenian laws and many others there are in many other places, both among Hellenes and barbarians who have given to the world many noble works and have been the parents of virtue of every kind and many temples have been raised in their honour for the sake of children such as theirs which were never raised in honour of any one for the sake of his mortal children.

"These are the lesser mysteries of love, into which even you, Socrates, {210} may enter to the greater and more hidden ones which are the crown of these, and to which if you pursue them in a right spirit, they will lead I know not whether you will be able to attain But I will do my utmost to inform you, and do you follow if you can For he who would proceed aright in this matter should begin in youth to visit beautiful forms and first, if he be guided by his instructor aright, to love one such form only—out of that he should create fair thoughts and soon he will of himself perceive that the beauty of one form is akin to the beauty of another and then if beauty of form in general is his pursuit, how foolish would he be not to recognize that the beauty in every form is one and the same! And when he perceives this he will abate his violent love of the one, which he will despise and deem a small thing, and will become a lover of all beautiful forms in the next stage he will consider that the beauty of the mind is more honourable than the beauty of the outward form So that if a virtuous soul have but a little comeliness, he will be content to love and tend him, and will search out and bring to the birth thoughts which may improve the young, until he is compelled to contemplate and see the beauty of institutions and laws, and to understand that the beauty of them all is of one family and that personal beauty is a trifle and after laws and institutions he will go on to the sciences that he may see their beauty being not like a servant in love with the beauty of one youth or man or institution, himself a slave mean and narrow minded, but drawing towards and contemplating the vast sea of beauty he will create many fair and noble thoughts and notions in boundless love of wisdom until on that shore he grows and waxes strong and at last the vision is revealed to him of a single science, which is the science of beauty everywhere. To this I will proceed please to give me your very best attention

He who has been instructed thus far in the things of love, and who has learned to see the beautiful in due order and succession, when he comes toward the end will suddenly perceive nature of wondrous beauty (and this, {211} Socrates, is the final cause of all our t rmer toils)—a nature which in the first place is everlasting not growing and decaying, or waxing and waning secondly not fair in one point of view and foul in another or at one time or in one relation or at one place fair at another time or in another relation or at an other place foul as if fair to some and foul to others, or in the likeness of a face or hands or any other part of the bodily frame, or in any form of speech or knowledge or existing in any other being as for example, in an animal or in heaven, or in earth or in any other place but beauty absolute separate, simple and ever lasting, which without diminution and with out increase, or any change is imparted to the ever growing and perishing beauties of all other things. He who from these ascending under the influence of true love, begins to perceive that beauty is not far from the end And the true order of going, or being led by another to the things of love is to begin from the beauties of earth and mount upwards for the sake of that other beauty using these as steps only and from one going on to two and from two to all fair forms, and from fair forms to fair practices, and from fair practices to fair notions, until from fair notions he arrives at the notion of absolute beauty and at last knows what the essence of beauty is. This, my dear Socrates, said the stranger of Mantineia, "is that life above all others which man should live, in the contemplation of beauty absolute a beauty which if you once beheld, you would se not to be after the measure of gold, and garments, and fair boys and youths whose presence now entrances you and you and many a one would be content to live seeing them only and conversing with them without meat or drink, if that were possible—you only want to look at them and to be with them But what if man had eyes to see the true beauty—the divine beauty I mean, pure and clear and unalloyed, not clogged with the pollutions of mortality and all the colours and vanities of human life —thither looking and holding converse with the true beauty simple and divine? {212} Re member how in that communion only beholding beauty with the eye of the mind, he will be enabled to bring forth, not images of beauty but realities (for he has hold not of an image but of a reality) and bringing forth and nourishing true virtue to become the friend of God and be immortal if mortal man may Would that be an ignoble life?

Such, Phaedrus—and I speak not only to you, but to all of you—were the words of Diotima and I am persuaded of their truth And being persuaded of them, I try to persuade others, that in the attainment of this end human nature will not easily find a helper better than love And therefore also I say that every man ought to honour him as I myself honour him and walk in his ways and exhort others to do the same and praise the power and spirit of love according to the measure of my ability now and ever

The words which I have spoken you Phaedrus may call an encomium of love or any thing else which you please

When Socrates had done speaking the company applauded and Aristophanes was beginning to say something in answer to the allusion which Socrates had made to his own speech[2] when suddenly there was a great knocking at the door of the house as of revellers and the sound of a flute girl was heard Agathon told the attendants to go and see who were the intruders If they are friends of ours he said invite them in but if not say that the drink*ing is over* A little while afterwards they heard the voice of Alcibiades resounding in the court he was in a great state of intoxication and kept roaring and shouting Where is Agathon? Lead me to Agathon and at length supported by the flute girl and some of his attendants he found his way to them Hail friends he said appearing at the door crowned with a massive garland of ivy and violets his head flowing with ribands Will you have a very drunken man as a companion of your revels? Or shall I crown Agathon which was my intention in coming and go away? For I was unable to come yesterday and therefore I am here to day carrying on my head these ribands that taking them from my own head I may crown the head of this fairest and wisest of men as I may be allowed to call him Will you laugh at me because I am drunk? Yet I know very well that I am speaking the truth [213] although you may laugh But first tell me if I come in shall we have the understanding of which I spoke? Will you drink with me or not?

The company were vociferous in begging that he would take his place among them and Agathon specially invited him Thereupon he was led in by the people who were with him and as he was being led intending to crown Agathon he took the ribands from his own head and held them in front of his eyes he was thus prevented from eeing Socrates who made way for him and Alcibiades took the vacant place between Agathon and Socrates

[1] Cf 205

[2] Supra 212 Will you have a very drunken man? etc.

and in taking the place he embraced Agathon and crowned him Take off his sandals said Agathon and let him make a third on the same couch

By all means but who makes the third partner in our revels? said Alcibiades turning round and starting up as he caught sight of Socrates By Heracles he said what is this? here is Socrates always lying in wait for me, and always as his way is coming out at all sorts of unsuspected places and now what have you to say for yourself and why are you lying here where I perceive that you have contrived to find a place not by a joker or lover of jokes like Aristophanes, but by the fairest of the company?

Socrates turned to Agathon and said I must ask you to protect me Agathon for the passion of this man has grown quite a serious matter to me Since I became his admirer I have never been allowed to speak to any other fair one or so much as to look at them If I do he goes wild with envy and jealousy and not only abuses me but can hardly keep his hands off me and at this moment he may do me some harm Please to see to this and either reconcile me to him or if he attempts violence protect me as I am in bodily fear of his mad and passionate attempts

There can never be reconciliation between you and me said Alcibiades but for the present I will defer your chastisement And I must be you Agathon to give me back some of the ribands that I may crown the marvellous head of this universal despot—I would not have him complain of me for crowning you and neglecting him who in conversation is the conqueror of all mankind and this not only once as you were the day before yesterday but always Whereupon taking some of the ribands he crowned Socrates and again reclined

Then he said You seem my friends to be sober which is a thing not to be endured you must drink—for that was the agreement under which I was admitted—and I elect myself master of the feast until you are well drunk Let us have a large goblet Agathon or rather he said addressing the attendant bring me that wine-cooler The wine-cooler which had caught his eye was a vessel holding more than two quarts—this he filled and emptied [214] and bade the attendant fill it again for Socrates Observe my friends said Alcibiades that this ingenious trick of mine will have no effect on Socrates for he can drink any quantity of wine and not be at all nearer being drunk Socrates drank the cup which the attendant filled for him.

Eryximachus said What is this, Alcibiades? Are we to have neither conversation nor singing over our cups but simply to drink as if we were thirsty?

Alcibiades replied Hail, worthy son of a most wise and worthy sire!

The same to you, said Eryximachus but what shall we do?

That I leave to you, said Alcibiades

The wise physician skilled our wounds to heal

shall prescribe and we will obey What do you want?

Well, said Eryximachus, before you appeared we had passed a resolution that each one of us in turn should make a speech in praise of love, and as good a one as he could the turn was passed round from left to right and as all of us have spoken, and you have not spoken but have well drunken, you ought to speak and then impose upon Socrates any task which you please, and he on his right hand neighbour and so on.

That is good, Eryximachus said Alcibiades and yet the comparison of a drunken man's speech with those of sober men is hardly fair and I should like to know sweet friend whether you really believe what Socrates was just now saying, for I can assure you that the very reverse is the fact and that if I praise any one but himself in his presence, whether God or man, he will hardly keep his hands off me

For shame said Socrates.

Hold your tongue said Alcibiades, for by Poseidon, there is no one else whom I will praise when you are of the company

Well then, said Eryximachus if you like praise Socrates

What do you think, Eryximachus? said Alcibiades shall I attack him and inflict the punishment before you all?

What are you about said Socrates are you going to raise a laugh at my expense? Is that the meaning of your praise?

I am going to speak the truth if you will permit me

I not only permit, but exhort you to speak the truth.

Then I will begin at once, said Alcibiades, and if I say anything which is not true, you may interrupt me if you will and say that is a lie," though my intention is to speak the truth But you must not wonder if I speak any how as things come into my mind for the fluent and orderly enumeration of all your singularities is not a task which is easy to a man in my condition

[215] And now my boys I shall praise Socrates in a figure which will appear to him to be a caricature, and yet I speak not to make fun of him but only for the truth's sake I say that he is exactly like the busts of Silenus, which are set up in the statuaries shops, holding pipes and flutes in their mouths and they are made to open in the middle and have images of gods inside them I say also that he is like Marsyas the satyr You yourself will not deny Socrates, that your face is like that of a satyr Aye and there is a resemblance in other points too For example you are a bully as I can prove by witnesses, if you will not confess And are you not a flute player? That you are and a performer far more wonderful than Marsyas He indeed with instruments used to charm the souls of men by the powers of his breath and the players of his music do so still for the melodies of Olympus are derived from Marsyas who taught them and these whether *they are play*ed by a great master or by a miserable flute girl have a power which no others have they alone possess the soul and reveal the wants of those who have need of gods and mysteries, because they are divine But you produce the same effect with your words only and do not require the flute that is the difference between you and him When we hear any other speaker even a very good one he produces absolutely no effect upon us, or not much whereas the mere frag*ments* of you and your words, even at second hand and however imperfectly repeated amaze and possess the souls of every man woman and child who comes within hearing of them And if I were not afraid that you would think me hopelessly drunk, I would have sworn as well as spoken to the influence which they have always had and still have over me For my heart leaps within me more than that of any Corybant and reveller and my eyes rain tears when I hear them And I observe that many others are affected in the same manner I have heard Pericles and other great orators, and I thought that they spoke well but I never had any similar feeling my soul was not stirred by them nor was I angry at the thought of my own slavish state But this Marsyas has often brought me to such a pass that I have felt as if I could hardly endure the life which I am leading [216] (this, Socrates, you will admit) and I am conscious that if I did not shut my ears against him and fly as from the voice of the siren, my fate would be like that of others, —he would transfix me and I should grow old sitting at his feet For he makes me confess that I ought not to live as I do neglecting the wants of my own soul and busying myself with the concerns of the Athenians therefore I hold my ears and tear myself away from him And he is the only person who ever made me ashamed which you might think not to be in my nature and there is no one else who does the same For I know that I cannot answer him or say that I ought not to do as he bids but when I leave his presence the love of popularity gets the better of me And therefore I run away and fly from him and when I see him I am ashamed of what I have confessed to him Many a time have I wished that he were dead and yet I know that I should be much more sorry than glad if he were to die so that I am at my wit s end

And this is what I and many others have suffered from the flute playing of this satyr Yet hear me once more while I show you how exact the image is and how marvellous his power For let me tell you none of you know him but I will reveal him to you having begun I must go on See you how fond he is of the fair? He is always with them and is always being smitten by them and then again he knows nothing and is ignorant of all things—such is the appearance which he puts on Is he not like a Silenus in this? To be sure he is his outer mask is the carved head of the Silenus but O my companions in drink when he is opened what temperance there is residing within! Know you that beauty and wealth and honour at which the many wonder are of no account with him and are utterly despised by him he regards not at all the persons who are gifted with them mankind are nothing to him all his life is spent in mocking and flouting at them But when I opened him and looked within at his serious purpose I saw in him divine and golden images of such fascinating beauty that I was ready to do in a [217] moment whatever Socrates commanded they may have escaped the observation of others but I saw them Now I fancied that he was seriously enamoured of my beauty and I thought that I should therefore have a grand opportunity of hearing him tell what he knew for I had a wonderful opinion of the attractions of my youth In the prosecution of this design when I next went to him I sent away the attendant who usually accompanied me (I will confess the whole truth and beg you to listen and if I speak falsely do you Socrates expose the falsehood) Well he and I were alone together and I thought that when there was nobody with us I should hear him speak the language which lovers use to their loves when they are by themselves and I was delighted Nothing of the sort he conversed as usual and spent the day with me and then went away Afterwards I challenged him to the palaestra and he wrestled and closed with me several times when there was no one present I fancied that I might succeed in this manner Not a bit I made no way with him Lastly as I had failed hitherto I thought that I must take stronger measures and attack him boldly and as I had begun not give him up but see how matters stood between him and me So I invited him to sup with me just as if he were a fair youth and I a designing lover He was not easily persuaded to come he did however after a while accept the invitation, and when he came the first time he wanted to go away at once as soon as supper was over and I had not the face to detain him The second time still in pursuance of my design after we had supped, I went on conversing far into the night, and when he wanted to go away I pretended that the hour was late and that he had much better remain So he lay down on the couch next to me the same on which he had supped and there was no one but ourselves sleeping in the apartment All this may be told without shame to any one But what follows I could hardly tell you if I were sober Yet as the proverb says In vino veritas whether with boys or without them and therefore I must speak Nor again should I be justified in concealing the lofty actions of Socrates when I come to praise him Moreover I have felt the serpent s sting and he who has suffered as they say is willing to tell his fellow sufferers only as they alone will be likely to understand him [218] and will not be extreme in judging of the sayings or doings which have been wrung from his agony For I have been bitten by a more than viper s tooth I have known in my soul or in my heart or in some other part that worst of pangs more violent in ingenuous youth than any serpent s tooth the pang of philosophy which will make a man say or do anything And you whom I see around me Phaedrus and Agathon and Eryximachus and Pausanias and Aristodemus and Aristophanes all of you and I need not say Socrates himself have had experience of the same madness and passion in your longing after wisdom. Therefore listen and excuse my doings then and my sayings now But let the attendants and other profane and unmannered persons close up the doors of their ears.

When the lamp was put out and the servants had gone away I thought that I must be plain with him and have no more ambiguity So I gave him a shake, and I said "Socrates, are you asleep?" "No," he said "Do you know what I am meditating?" "What are you meditating," he said. "I think," I replied, "that of all the lovers whom I have ever had you are the only one who is worthy of me, and you appear to be too modest to speak. Now I feel that I should be a fool to refuse you this or any other favour and therefore I come to lay at your feet all that I have and all that my friends have, in the hope that you will assist me in the way of virtue, which I desire above all things, and in which I believe that you can help me better than any one else. And I should certainly have more reason to be ashamed of what wise men would say if I were to refuse a favour to such as you, than of what the world, who are mostly fools, would say of me if I granted it. To these words he replied in the ironical manner which is so characteristic of him —

"Alcibiades, my friend, you have indeed an elevated aim if what you say is true and if there really is in me any power by which you may become better truly you must see in me some rare beauty of a kind infinitely higher than any which I see in you And therefore, if you mean to share with me and to exchange beauty for beauty you will have greatly the advantage of me you will gain true beauty in return for appearance—like Diomede [219] gold in exchange for brass But look again, sweet friend, and see whether you are not deceived in me. The mind begins to grow critical when the bodily eye fails, and it will be a long time before you get old." Hearing this, I said

I have told you my purpose, which is quite serious, and do you consider what you think best for you and me." "That is good," he said at some other time then we will consider and act as seems best about this and about other matters. Whereupon, I fancied that he was smitten, and that the words which I had uttered like arrows had wounded him, and so without waiting to hear more I got up, and throwing my coat about him crept under his threadbare cloak, as the time of year was winter and there I lay during the whole night having this wonderful monster in my arms. This again, Socrates, will not be denied by you And yet, notwithstanding all he was so superior to my solicitations, so contemptuous and derisive and disdainful of my beauty—which really as I fancied, had some attractions —hear O judges for judges you shall be of the haughty virtue of Socrates—nothing more happened, but in the morning when I awoke (let all the gods and goddesses be my witnesses) I arose as from the couch of a father or an elder brother

What do you suppose must have been my feelings, after this rejection, at the thought of my own dishonour? And yet I could not help wondering at his natural temperance and self restraint and manliness. I never imagined that I could have met with a man such as he is in wisdom and endurance. And therefore I could not be angry with him or renounce his company any more than I could hope to win him. For I well knew that if Ajax could not be wounded by steel much less he by money and my only chance of captivating him by my personal attractions had failed. So I was at my wit's end no one was ever more hopelessly enslaved by another All this happened before he and I went on the expedition to Potidaea there we messed together and I had the opportunity of observing his extraordinary power of sustaining fatigue. His endurance was simply marvellous when, [220] being cut off from our supplies, we were compelled to go without food —on such occasions which often happen in time of war he was superior not only to me but to everybody there was no one to be compared to him. Yet at a festival he was the only person who had any real powers of enjoyment though not willing to drink, he could if compelled beat us all at that,—wonderful to relate! no human being had ever seen Socrates drunk and his powers, if I am not mistaken will be tested before long His fortitude in enduring cold was also surprising There was a severe frost, for the winter in that region is really tremendous, and everybody else either remained indoors, or if they went out had on an amazing quantity of clothes, and were well shod, and had their feet swathed in felt and fleeces in the midst of this, Socrates with his bare feet on the ice and in his ordinary dress marched better than the other soldiers who had shoes, and they looked daggers at him because he seemed to despise them.

I have told you one tale, and now I must tell you another which is worth hearing Of the doings and sufferings of the enduring man while he was on the expedition One morning he was thinking about something which he could not resolve he would not give it up but continued thinking from early dawn until noon—there he stood fixed in thought and at noon attention was drawn to him and the rumour ran through the wondering crowd that Socrates had been standing and thinking about something ever since the break of day At last in the evening after supper some Ionians out of curiosity (I should explain that this was not in winter but in summer), brought out their mats and slept in the open air that they might watch him and see whether he would stand all night There he stood until the following morning and with the return of light he offered up a prayer to the sun and went his way [1] I will also tell if you please—and indeed I am bound to tell—of his courage in battle for who but he saved my life? Now this was the engagement in which I received the prize of valour for I was wounded and he would not leave me, but he rescued me and my arms and he ought to have received the prize of valour which the generals wanted to confer on me partly on account of my rank and I told them so (this again Socrates will not impeach or deny) but he was more eager than the generals that I and not he should have the prize There was another occasion on which his behaviour was very remarkable [221]—in the flight of the army after the battle of Delium where he served among the heavy armed—I had a better opportunity of seeing him than at Potidaea for I was myself on horseback and therefore comparatively out of danger He and Laches were retreating for the troops were in flight and I met them and told them not to be discouraged and promised to remain with them and there you might see him, Aristophanes as you describe just as he is in the streets of Athens stalking like a pelican and rolling his eyes calmly contemplating enemies as well as friends and making very intelligible to anybody even from a distance that whoever attacked him would be likely to meet with a stout resistance and in this way he and his companion escaped—for this is the sort of man who is never touched in war those only are pursued who are running away headlong I particularly observed how superior he was to Laches in presence of mind Many are the marvels which I might narrate in praise of Socrates most of his ways might perhaps be paralleled in another man but his absolute unlikeness to any human being that is or ever has been is perfectly astonishing You may imagine Brasidas and others to have been like Achilles or you may imagine Nestor and Antenor to have been like Pericles and the same may be said of other famous men but of this strange being you will never be able to find any likeness however remote either among men who now are or who ever have been—other than that which I have already suggested of Silenus and the satyrs and they represent in a figure not only himself but his words For although I forgot to mention this to you before his words are like the images of Silenus which open they are ridiculous when you first hear them he clothes himself in language that is like the skin of the wanton satyr—for his talk is of pack asses and smiths and cobblers and curriers and he is always repeating the same things in the same words, so that any ignorant or inexperienced person might feel disposed to laugh at him [222] but he who opens the bust and sees what is within will find that they are the only words which have a meaning in them and also the most divine abounding in fair images of virtue, and of the widest comprehension or rather extending to the whole duty of a good and honourable man

This friends is my praise of Socrates I have added my blame of him for his ill treatment of me and he has ill treated not only me but Charmides the son of Glaucon and Euthydemus the son of Diocles and many others in the same way—beginning as their lover he has ended by making them pay their addresses to him Wherefore I say to you Agathon Be not deceived by him learn from me and take warning and do not be a fool and learn by experience as the proverb says

When Alcibiades had finished there was a laugh at his outspokenness for he seemed to be still in love with Socrates You are sober Alcibiades said Socrates or you would never have gone so far about to hide the purpose of your satyr s praises for all this long story is only an ingenious circumlocution of which the point comes in by the way at the end you want to get up a quarrel between me and Agathon and your notion is that I ought to love you and nobody else and that you and you only ought to love Agathon But the plot of this Satyric or Silenic drama has been detected and you must not allow him Agathon to set us at variance

I believe you are right said Agathon and I am disposed to think that his intention in placing himself between you and me was only to divide us; but he shall gain nothing by that move; for I will go and lie on the couch next to you.

Yes, yes, replied Socrates, by all means come here and lie on the couch below me.

Alas, said Alcibiades, how I am fooled by this man; he is determined to get the better of me at every turn. I do beseech you, allow Agathon to lie between us.

Certainly not, said Socrates, as you praised me, and I in turn ought to praise my neighbour on the right, he will be out of order in praising me again when he ought rather to be praised by me, and I must entreat you to consent to this, and not be jealous, for I have a great desire to praise the youth. [223]

Hurrah! cried Agathon, I will rise instantly, that I may be praised by Socrates.

The usual way, said Alcibiades; where Socrates is, no one else has any chance with the fair; and now how readily has he invented a specious reason for attracting Agathon to himself.

Agathon arose in order that he might take his place on the couch by Socrates, when suddenly a band of revellers entered, and spoiled the order of the banquet. Some one who was going out having left the door open, they had found their way in, and made themselves at home; great confusion ensued, and every one was compelled to drink large quantities of wine. Aristodemus said that Eryximachus, Phaedrus, and others went away—he himself fell asleep, and as the nights were long took a good rest: he was awakened towards daybreak by a crowing of cocks, and when he awoke, the others were either asleep or had gone away; there remained only Socrates, Aristophanes, and Agathon, who were drinking out of a large goblet which they passed round, and Socrates was discoursing to them. Aristodemus was only half awake, and he did not hear the beginning of the discourse; the chief thing which he remembered was Socrates compelling the other two to acknowledge that the genius of comedy was the same with that of tragedy, and that the true artist in tragedy was an artist in comedy also. To this they were constrained to assent, being drowsy, and not quite following the argument. And first of all Aristophanes dropped off, then, when the day was already dawning, Agathon. Socrates, having laid them to sleep, rose to depart; Aristodemus, as his manner was, following him. At the Lyceum he took a bath, and passed the day as usual. In the evening he retired to rest at his own home.

MENO

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE Meno, Socrates A Slave of Meno, Anytus

[70] Meno CAN you tell me Socrates whether virtue is acquired by teaching or by practice or if neither by teaching nor practice then whether it comes to man by nature or in what other way?

Socrates O Meno there was a time when the Thessalians were famous among the other Hellenes only for their riches and their riding but now if I am not mistaken they are equally famous for their wisdom especially at Larisa which is the native city of your friend Aristippus And this is Gorgias doing for when he came there the flower of the Aleuadae among them your admirer Aristippus and the other chiefs of the Thessalians fell in love with his wisdom And he has taught you the habit of answering questions in a grand and bold style which becomes those who know and is the style in which he himself answers all comers and any Hellene who likes may ask him any thing How different is our lot my dear Meno [71] Here at Athens there is a dearth of the commodity and all wisdom seems to have emigrated from us to you I am certain that if you were to ask any Athenian whether virtue was natural or acquired he would laugh in your face and say Stranger you have far too good an opinion of me if you think that I can answer your question For I literally do not know what virtue is and much less whether it is acquired by teaching or not And I myself Meno living as I do in this region of poverty am as poor as the rest of the world and I confess with shame that I know literally nothing about virtue and when I do not know the quid of anything how can I know the quale? How if I knew nothing at all of Meno could I tell if he was fair or the opposite of fair rich and noble or the reverse of rich and noble? Do you think that I could?

Men No Indeed But are you in earnest, Socrates in saying that you do not know what virtue is? And am I to carry back this report of you to Thessaly?

Soc Not only that my dear boy but you may say further that I have never known of any one else who did in my judgment

Men Then you have never met Gorgias when he was at Athens?

Soc Yes I have

Men And did you not think that he knew?

Soc I have not a good memory Meno and therefore I cannot now tell what I thought of him at the time And I dare say that he did know and that you know what he said please therefore to remind me of what he said or if you would rather tell me your own view for I suspect that you and he think much alike

Men Very true

Soc Then as he is not here never mind him, and do you tell me By the gods Meno be generous and tell me what you say that virtue is for I shall be truly delighted to find that I have been mistaken and that you and Gorgias do really have this knowledge although I have been just saying that I have never found any body who had

Men There will be no difficulty Socrates in answering your question Let us take first the virtue of a man—he should know how to administer the state and in the administration of it to benefit his friends and harm his enemies and he must also be careful not to suffer harm himself A woman s virtue if you wish to know about that, may also be easily described her duty is to order her house and keep what is indoors, and obey her husband Every age every condition of life, young or old male or female, bond or free [72] has a different virtue there are virtues numberless, and no lack of definitions of them for virtue is relative to the actions and ages of each of us in all that we do And the same may be said of vice Socrates

Soc How fortunate I am Meno! When I ask you for one virtue, you present me with a swarm of them, which are in your keeping Suppose that I carry on the figure of the swarm, and ask of you, What is the nature of the bee? and you answer that there are many kinds of bees and I reply But do bees differ as bees, because there are many and different kinds of them or are they not rather to be distinguished by some other quality as for example beauty size, or shape? How would you answer me?

Men I should answer that bees do not differ from one another as bees

Soc And if I went on to say That is what I desire to know Meno tell me what is the quality in which they do not differ but are all alike —would you be able to answer?

Men I should

Soc And so of the virtues, however many and different they may be, they have all a common nature which makes them virtues and on this he who would answer the question What is virtue? would do well to have his eye fixed Do you understand?

Men I am beginning to understand but I do not as yet take hold of the question as I could wish

Soc When you say Meno that there is one virtue of a man another of a woman, another of a child and so on does this apply only to virtue or would you say the same of health and size and strength? Or is the nature of health always the same, whether in man or woman?

Men I should say that health is the same both in man and woman.

Soc And is not this true of size and strength? If a woman is strong, she will be strong by reason of the same form and of the same strength subsisting in her which there is in the man I mean to say that strength as strength whether of man or woman is the same Is there any difference?

Men I think not

[73] Soc And will not virtue as virtue be the same, whether in a child or in a grown up person, in a woman or in a man?

Men I cannot help feeling Socrates that this case is different from the others

Soc But why? Were you not saying, that the virtue of a man was to order a state and the virtue of a woman was to order a house?

Men I did say so

Soc And can either house or state or anything be well ordered without temperance and without justice?

Men Certainly not.

Soc Then they who order a state or a house temperately or justly order them with temperance and justice?

Men Certainly

Soc Then both men and women if they are to be good men and women must have the same virtues of temperance and justice?

Men True

Soc And can either a young man or an elder one be good if they are intemperate and unjust?

Men They cannot.

Soc They must be temperate and just?

Men Yes.

Soc Then all men are good in the same way and by participation in the same virtues?

Men Such is the inference

Soc And they surely would not have been good in the same way unless their virtue had been the same?

Men They would not

Soc Then now that the sameness of all virtue has been proven, try and remember what you and Gorgias say that virtue is

Men Will you have one definition of them all?

Soc That is what I am seeking

Men If you want to have one definition of them all I know not what to say but that virtue is the power of governing mankind

Soc And does this definition of virtue include all virtue? Is virtue the same in a child and in a slave, Meno? Can the child govern his father or the slave his master and would he who governed be any longer a slave?

Men I think not, Socrates

Soc No indeed there would be small reason in that Yet once more, fair friend according to you, virtue is the power of governing but do you not add justly and not unjustly ?

Men Yes Socrates I agree there for justice is virtue

Soc Would you say virtue Meno or "a virtue"?

Cf. Aristotle, Politics i 13 1260 a 3 28
Cf Theaetetus 146

Men What do you mean?

Soc I mean as I might say about anything that a round, for example is a figure and not simply figure and I should adopt this mode of speaking because there are other figures

Men Quite right and that is just what I am saying about virtue—that there are other virtues as well as justice

[74] Soc What are they? tell me the names of them as I would tell you the names of the other figures if you asked me

Men Courage and temperance and wisdom and magnanimity are virtues and there are many others

Soc Yes Meno and again we are in the same case in searching after one virtue we have found many though not in the same way as before but we have been unable to find the common virtue which runs through them all

Men Why Socrates even now I am not able to follow you in the attempt to get at one common notion of virtue as of other things

Soc No wonder but I will try to get nearer if I can for you know that all things have a common notion Suppose now that some one asked you the question which I asked before Meno he would say what is figure? And if you answered roundness he would reply to you in my way of speaking by asking whether you would say that roundness is figure or a figure and you would answer a figure

Men Certainly

Soc And for this reason—that there are other figures?

Men Yes

Soc And if he proceeded to ask What other figures are there? you would have told him

Men I should

Soc And if he similarly asked what colour is and you answered whiteness and the questioner rejoined Would you say that whiteness is colour or a colour? you would reply A colour because there are other colours as well

Men I should

Soc And if he had said Tell me what they are?—you would have told him of other colours which are colours just as much as whiteness

Men Yes

Soc And suppose that he were to pursue the matter in my way he would say Ever and anon we are landed in particulars but this is not what I want tell me then since you call them by a common name and say that they are all figures even when opposed to one another what is that common nature which you designate as figure—which contains straight as well as round and is no more one than the other—that would be your mode of speaking?

Men Yes

Soc And in speaking thus you do not mean to say that the round is round any more than straight or the straight any more straight than round?

Men Certainly not

Soc You only assert that the round figure is not more a figure than the straight or the straight than the round?

Men Very true

Soc To what then do we give the name of figure? Try and answer Suppose that when a person asked you this question either about figure or colour you were to reply Man I do not understand what you want [75] or know what you are saying he would look rather astonished and say Do you not understand that I am looking for the simile in multis? And then he might put the question in another form Meno he might say what is that simile in multis which you call figure and which includes not only round and straight figures but all? Could you not answer that question Meno? I wish that you would try the attempt will be good practice with a view to the answer about virtue

Men I would rather that you should answer Socrates

Soc Shall I indulge you?

Men By all means

Soc And then you will tell me about virtue?

Men I will

Soc Then I must do my best for there is a prize to be won

Men Certainly

Soc Well I will try and explain to you what figure is What do you say to this answer — Figure is the only thing which always follows colour Will you be satisfied with it as I am sure that I should be if you would let me have a similar definition of virtue?

Men But Socrates it is such a simple answer

Soc Why simple?

Men Because according to you figure is that which always follows colour

(Soc Granted)

Men But if a person were to say that he does not know what colour is, any more than what figure is—what sort of answer would you have given him?

Soc I should have told him the truth And if he were a philosopher of the eristic and antagonistic sort, I should say to him You have my answer and if I am wrong your business is to take up the argument and refute me But if we were friends, and were talking as you and I are now I should reply in a milder strain and more in the dialectician s vein that is to say I should not only speak the truth but I should make use of premisses which the person interrogated would be willing to admit And this is the way in which I shall endeavour to approach you You will acknowledge, will you not, that there is such a thing as an end or termination, or extremity?—all which words I use in the same sense although I am aware that Prodicus might draw distinctions about them but still you I am sure would speak of a thing as ended or terminated—that is all which I am saying—not anything very difficult

Men Yes I should and I believe that I understand your meaning

[76] Soc And you would speak of a surface and also of a solid as for example in geometry

Men Yes

Soc Well then you are now in a condition to understand my definition of figure I define figure to be that in which the solid ends or more concisely the limit of solid

Men And now Socrates what is colour?

Soc You are outrageous Meno in thus plaguing a poor old man to give you an answer when you will not take the trouble of remembering what is Gorgias definition of virtue

Men When you have told me what I ask I will tell you Socrates

Soc A man who was blindfolded has only to hear you talking and he would know that you are a fair creature and have still many lovers

Men Why do you think so?

Soc Why because you always speak in imperatives like all beauties when they are in their prime you are tyrannical and also as I suspect, you have found out that I have a weakness for the fair and therefore to humour you I must answer

Men Please do

Soc Would you like me to answer you after the manner of Gorgias, which is familiar to you

Men I should like nothing better

Soc Do not he and you and Empedocles say that there are certain effluences of existence?

Men Certainly

Soc And passages into which and through which the effluence passes?

Men Exactly

Soc And some of the effluences fit into the passages, and some of them are too small or too large?

Men True

Soc And there is such a thing as sight?

Men Yes

Soc And now as Pindar says read my meaning" —colour is an effluence of form commensurate with sight and palpable to sense

Men That Socrates, appears to me to be an admirable answer

Soc Why yes because it happens to be one which you have been in the habit of hearing and your wit will have discovered I suspect, that you may explain in the same way the nature of sound and smell and of many other similar phenomena

Men Quite true

Soc The answer Meno was in the orthodox solemn vein and therefore was more acceptable to you than the other answer about figure

Men Yes

Soc And yet O son of Alexidemus I cannot help thinking that the other was the better and I am sure that you would be of the same opinion if you would only stay and be initiated, and were not compelled, as you said yesterday to go away before the mysteries

Men But I will stay Socrates if you will give me many such answers [77]

Soc Well then for my own sake as well as for yours I will do my very best but I am afraid that I shall not be able to give you very many as good and now in your turn you are to fulfil your promise and tell me what virtue is in the universal and do not make a singular into a plural as the facetious say of those who break a thing but deliver virtue to me whole and sound and not broken into a number of pieces I have given you the pattern

Men Well then Socrates virtue as I take it, is when he who desires the honourable, is able to provide it for himself so the poet says, and I say too—

[illegible]

Soc And does he who desires the honourable also desire the good?

Men Certainly

Soc Then are there some who desire the evil and others who desire the good? Do not all men my dear sir desire good?

Men I think not

Soc There are some who desire evil?

Men Yes

Men What do you mean?

Soc I mean as I might say about anything that a round for example is a figure and not simply figure, and I should adopt this mode of speaking because there are other figures

Men Quite right and that is just what I am saying about virtue—that there are other virtues as well as justice

(Soc Granted)

Men But if a person were to say that he does not know what colour is any more than what figure is—what sort of answer would you have given him?

Soc I should have told him the truth And if power of attaining good justly or with justice and justice you acknowledge to be a part of virtue.

Men Yes.

Soc Then it follows from your own admissions, that virtue is doing what you do with a part of virtue for justice and the like are said by you to be parts of virtue.

Men What of that?

Soc What of that! Why did not I ask you to tell me the nature of virtue as a whole? And you are very far from telling me this but declare every action to be virtue which is done with a part of virtue as though you had told me and I must already know the whole of virtue and this too when frittered away into little pieces. And, therefore, my dear Meno I fear that I must begin again and repeat the same question What is virtue? for otherwise, I can only say that every action done with a part of virtue is virtue what else is the meaning of saying that every action done with justice is virtue? Ought I not to ask the question over again for can any one who does not know virtue know a part of virtue?

Men No I do not say that he can

Soc Do you remember how in the example of figure, we rejected any answer given in terms which were as yet unexplained or unadmitted

Men Yes, Socrates and we were quite right in doing so

Soc But then, my friend, do not suppose that we can explain to any one the nature of virtue as a whole through some unexplained portion of virtue, or anything at all in that fashion we should only have to ask over again the old question What is virtue? Am I not right?

Men I believe that you are.

Soc Then begin again, and answer me, What, according to you and your friend Gorgias, is the definition of virtue?

Men O Socrates, I used to be told, before I knew you, that you were always doubting yourself and making others doubt [80] and now you are casting your spells over me, and I am simply getting bewitched and enchanted, and am at my wits end. And if I may venture to make a jest upon you, you seem to me both in your appearance and in your power over others to be very like the flat torpedo fish who torpifies those who come near him and touch him, as you have now torpified me, I think. For my soul and my tongue are really torpid, and I do not know how to answer you and though I have been delivered of an infinite variety of speeches about virtue before now and to many persons—and very good ones they were as I thought—at this moment I cannot even say what virtue is. And I think that you are very wise in not voyaging and going away from home, for if you did in other places as you do in Athens, you would be cast into prison as a magician

Soc You are a rogue, Meno and had all but caught me.

Men What do you mean Socrates?

Soc I can tell why you made a simile about me.

Men Why?

Soc In order that I might make another simile about you. For I know that all pretty young gentlemen like to have pretty similes made about them—as well they may—but I shall not return the compliment. As to my being a torpedo if the torpedo is torpid as well as the cause of torpidity in others, then indeed I am a torpedo, but not otherwise for I perplex others, not because I am clear but because I am utterly perplexed myself And now I know not what virtue is, and you seem to be in the same case, although you did once perhaps know before you touched me. However I have no objection to join with you in the enquiry

Men And how will you enquire, Socrates, into that which you do not know? What will you put forth as the subject of enquiry? And if you find what you want, how will you ever know that this is the thing which you did not know?

Soc I know Meno what you mean but just see what a tiresome dispute you are introducing You argue that a man cannot enquire either about that which he knows, or about that which he does not know for if he knows, he has no need to enquire and if not, he cannot for he does not know the very subject about which he is to enquire.

[81] Men Well Socrates, and is not the argument sound?

Soc I think not.

Men Why not?

Soc I will tell you why I have heard from certain wise men and women who spoke of things divine that—

Men What did they say?

Soc They spoke of a glorious truth, as I conceive.

Men What was it? and who were they?

Soc Some of them were priests and priestesses, who had studied how they might be able to

Cf. Aristotle, Posterior Analytics I.1.71 a6-31

Soc Do you mean that they think the evils which they desire, to be good or do they know that they are evil and yet desire them?

Men Both I think

Soc And do you really imagine Meno that a man knows evils to be evils and desires them notwithstanding?

Men Certainly I do

Soc And desire is of possession?

Men Yes of possession

Soc And does he think that the evils will do good to him who possesses them or does he know that they will do him harm?

Men There are some who think that the evils will do them good and others who know that they will do them harm

Soc And in your opinion do those who think that they will do them good know that they are evils?

Men Certainly not

Soc Is it not obvious that those who are ignorant of their nature do not desire them but they desire what they suppose to be goods although they are really evils and if they are mistaken and suppose the evils to be good they really desire goods?

Men Yes in that case

Soc Well and do those who as you say desire evils and think that evils are hurtful to the possessor of them know that they will be hurt by them?

Men They must know it

[78] Soc And must they not suppose that those who are hurt are miserable in proportion to the hurt which is inflicted upon them?

Men How can it be otherwise?

Soc But are not the miserable ill fated?

Men Yes indeed

Soc And does any one desire to be miserable and ill fated?

Men I should say not Socrates

Soc But if there is no one who desires to be miserable there is no one Meno who desires evil for what is misery but the desire and possession of evil?

Men That appears to be the truth Socrates and I admit that nobody desires evil

Soc And yet, were you not saying just now that virtue is the desire and power of attaining good?

Men Yes I did say so

Soc But if this be affirmed then the desire of good is common to all and one man is no better than another in that respect?

Men True

Soc And if one man is not better than another in desiring good he must be better in the power of attaining it?

Men Exactly

Soc Then according to your definition, virtue would appear to be the power of attaining good?

Men I entirely approve Socrates of the manner in which you now view this matter

Soc Then let us see whether what you say is true from another point of view for very likely you may be right —You affirm virtue to be the power of attaining goods?

Men Yes

Soc And the goods which you mean are such as health and wealth and the possession of gold and silver and having office and honour in the state—those are what you would call goods?

Men Yes I should include all those

Soc Then according to Meno who is the hereditary friend of the great king virtue is the power of getting silver and gold and would you add that they must be gained piously justly or do you deem this to be of no consequence? And is any mode of acquisition even if unjust and dishonest equally to be deemed virtue?

Men Not virtue Socrates but vice.

Soc Then justice or temperance or holiness, or some other part of virtue as would appear must accompany the acquisition and without them the mere acquisition of good will not be virtue

Men Why how can there be virtue without these?

Soc And the non acquisition of gold and silver in a dishonest manner for oneself or another or in other words the want of them may be equally virtue?

Men True

Soc Then the acquisition of such goods is no more virtue than the non acquisition and want of them but whatever is accompanied by justice or honesty is virtue [79] and whatever is devoid of justice is vice

Men It cannot be otherwise in my judgment.

Soc And were we not saying just now that justice temperance and the like, were each of them a part of virtue?

Men Yes

Soc And so Meno this is the way in which you mock me

Men Why do you say that Socrates?

Soc Why because I asked you to deliver virtue into my hands whole and unbroken and I gave you a pattern according to which you were to frame your answer and you have forgotten already and tell me that virtue is the rom a double line? Remember that I am not speaking of an oblong but of a figure equal every way and twice the size of this—that is to say of eight feet and I want to kno v whether you still say that a double square comes from a double line?

Boy Yes.

Soc But does not this line become doubled if we add another such line here?

Boy Certainly

Soc And four such lines will make a space containing eight feet?

Boy Yes.

Soc Let us describe such a figure Would you not say that this is the figure of eight feet?

Boy Yes.

Soc And are there not these four divisions in the figure, each of which is equal to the figure of four feet?

Boy True.

Soc And is not that four times four?

Boy Certainly

Soc And four times is not double?

Boy No indeed

Soc But how much?

Boy Four times as much

Soc Therefore the double line, boy has gi en a space not twice, but four times as much

Boy True.

Soc Four times four are sixteen—are they not

Boy Yes.

Soc What line would give you a space of eight feet, as this gi es one of sixteen feet —do y u see

Boy Yes

Soc And the space of four feet is made from this half lin ?

B y Yes

Soc Good and is not a space of eight feet tv ice the size of this, and half the size of the other?

B y Certainly

Soc Su h a space, then, will be made out of a line greater than this one, and less than that on

Boy Yes I think so

Soc Very good I l ke to hear y u say what you think And now tell me is not this a line of two feet and that of four?

Boy Yes.

Soc Then the line which forms the s de of eight feet ought to be more than this line of two feet and less than the other of four feet?

Boy It ought

Soc Try and see if you can tell me how much it will be.

Boy Three feet.

Soc Then if we add a half to this line of two that will be the line of three Here are two and there is one and on the other side, here are two also and there is one and that makes the figure of which you speak?

Boy Yes.

Soc But if there are three feet this way and three feet that way the whole space will be three times three feet?

Boy That is evident.

Soc And how much are three times three feet?

Boy Nine

Soc And how much is the double of four?

Boy Eight.

Soc Then the figure of eight is not made out of a line of three?

Boy No

[84] Soc But from what line?—tell me exactly and if you would rather not reckon, try and show me the line

Boy Indeed Socrates, I do not know

Soc Do you see Meno what adv nces he has made in h s power of recollection? He did not kno at first, and he does not know no what is the side of a figure of eight feet but then he thought that he knew and answered conf dent ly as if he knew and had no difficulty now he has a d fficulty and neither knows nor fancies that he knows

Men True.

Soc Is he not better off in knowing his ignorance?

Men I think that h is

Soc If we have made him doubt and given him the torpedo s shock, have we done him any harm?

Men I think not.

Soc We have certainly as would seem assisted h m in some degree to the disco ery of the truth and now he will wish to remedy his ignorance, but then he would have been ready to tell all the world ag in and again that the double space should have a double side

Men True

Soc But do you suppose that he would ever have enquired into or lea ned what he fanc ed that he kne though he vas really ignorant of it, until he had fallen into perplexity under the idea that he d d not know and had desired to know?

give a reason of their profession there have been poets also who spoke of these things by inspiration like Pindar and many others who were inspired And they say—mark now and see whether their words are true—they say that the soul of man is immortal and at one time has an end which is termed dying and at an other time is born again but is never destroyed And the moral is that a man ought to live always in perfect holiness For in the ninth year Persephone sends the souls of those from whom she has received the penalty of ancient crime back again from beneath into the light of the sun above and these are they who become noble kings and mighty men and great in wisdom and are called saintly heroes in after ages The soul then as being immortal and having been born again many times and having seen all things that exist whether in this world or in the world below has knowledge of them all and it is no wonder that she should be able to call to remembrance all that she ever knew about virtue and about everything for as all nature is akin and the soul has learned all things there is no difficulty in her eliciting or as men say learning out of a single recollection all the rest if a man is strenuous and does not faint for all enquiry and all learning is but recollection And therefore we ought not to listen to this sophistical argument about the impossibility of enquiry for it will make us idle and is sweet only to the sluggard but the other saying will make us active and inquisitive In that confiding I will gladly enquire with you into the nature of virtue

Men Yes Socrates but what do you mean by saying that we do not learn and that what we call learning is only a process of recollection? Can you teach me how this is?

Soc I told you Meno just now that you were a rogue and now you ask whether I can teach you when I am saying that there is no teaching [82] but only recollection and thus you imagine that you will involve me in a contradiction

Men Indeed Socrates I protest that I had no such intention I only asked the question from habit but if you can prove to me that what you say is true I wish that you would

Soc It will be no easy matter but I will try to please you to the utmost of my power Suppose that you call one of your numerous attendants that I may demonstrate on him

Men Certainly Come hither boy

Soc He is Greek and speaks Greek does he not?

Men Yes indeed he was born in the house

Soc Attend now to the questions which I ask him and observe whether he learns of me or only remembers

Men I will

Soc Tell me boy do you know that a figure like this is a square?

Boy I do

Soc And you know that a square figure has these four lines equal?

Boy Certainly

Soc And these lines which I have drawn through the middle of the square are also equal?

Boy Yes

Soc A square may be of any size?

Boy Certainly

Soc And if one side of the figure be of two feet and the other side be of two feet how much will the whole be? Let me explain if in one direction the space was of two feet and in the other direction of one foot the whole would be of two feet taken once?

Boy Yes

Soc But since this side is also of two feet, there are twice two feet?

Boy There are

Soc Then the square is of twice two feet?

Boy Yes

Soc And how many are twice two feet? count and tell me

Boy Four Socrates

Soc And might there not be another square twice as large as this and having like this the lines equal?

Boy Yes

Soc And of how many feet will that be?

Boy Of eight feet

Soc And now try and tell me the length of the line which forms the side of that double square this is two feet—what will that be?

Boy Clearly Socrates it will be double

Soc Do you observe Meno that I am not teaching the boy anything but only asking him questions and now he fancies that he knows how long a line is necessary in order to produce a figure of eight square feet does he not?

Men Yes

Soc And does he really know?

Men Certainly not

Soc He only guesses that because the square is double the line is double

Men True

Soc Observe him while he recalls the steps in regular order (To the Boy) [83] Tell me, boy do you assert that a double space comes

Soc Which must have been the time when he was not a man?

Men Yes

Soc And if there have been always true thoughts in him both at the time when he was and was not a man which only need to be awakened into knowledge by putting questions to him, his soul must have always possessed this knowledge for he always either was or was not a man?

Men Obviously

Soc And if the truth of all things always existed in the soul then the soul is immortal Wherefore be of good cheer and try to recollect what you do not know or rather what you do not remember

Men I feel, somehow that I like what you are saying

Soc And I Meno like what I am saying Some things I have said of which I am not altogether confident. But that we shall be better and braver and less helpless if we think that we ought to enquire, than we should have been if we indulged in the idle fancy that there was no knowing and no use in seeking to know what we do not know —that is a theme upon which I am ready to fight, in word and deed, to the utmost of my power

Men There again, Socrates, your words seem to me excellent

Soc Then as we are agreed that a man should enquire about that which he does not know shall you and I make an effort to enquire together into the nature of virtue?

Men By all means Socrates And yet I would much rather return to my original question, Whether in seeking to acquire virtue we should regard it as a thing to be taught, or as a gift of nature or as coming to men in some other way?

Soc Had I the command of you as well as of myself Meno I would not have enquired whether virtue is given by instruction or not, until we had first ascertained what it is But as you think only of controlling me who am your slave, and never of controlling yourself — such being your notion of freedom, I must yield to you for you are irresistible. And therefore I have now to enquire into the qualities of a thing of which I do not as yet know the nature. At any rate, will you condescend a little, and allow the question Whether virtue is given by instruction or in any other way" to be argued upon hypothesis? [87] As the geometrician when he is asked whether a certain triangle is capable of being inscribed in a certain circle, will reply I cannot tell you as yet but I will offer a hypothesis which may assist us in forming a conclusion If the figure be such that when you have produced a given side of it, the given area of the triangle falls short by an area corresponding to the part produced then one consequence follows, and if this is impossible then some other and therefore I wish to assume a hypothesis before I tell you whether this triangle is capable of being inscribed in the circle —that is a geometrical hypothesis. And we too as we know not the nature and qualities of virtue must ask, whether virtue is or is not taught under a hypothesis as thus, if virtue is of such a class of mental goods will it be taught or not? Let the first hypothesis be that virtue is or is not knowledge,—in that case will it be taught or not? or as we were just now saying remembered ? For there is no use in disputing about the name. But is virtue taught or not? or rather does not everyone see that knowledge alone is taught?

Men I agree

Soc Then if virtue is knowledge, virtue will be taught?

Men Certainly

Soc Then now we have made a quick end of this question if virtue is of such a nature it will be taught and if not not?

Men Certainly

Soc The next question is, whether virtue is knowledge or of another species?

Men Yes that appears to be the question which comes next in order

Soc Do we not say that virtue is a good?— This is a hypothesis which is not set aside

Men Certainly

Soc Now if there be any sort of good which is distinct from knowledge virtue may be that good but if knowledge embraces all good then we shall be right in thinking that virtue is knowledge?

Men True.

Soc And virtue makes us good?

Men Yes

Soc And if we are good, then we are profitable for all good things are profitable?

Men Yes

Soc Then virtue is profitable?

Men That is the only inference.

Soc Then now let us see what are the things which severally profit us Health and strength and beauty and wealth—these and the like of these we call profitable?

Men True

[88] Soc And yet these things may also

Men I think not Socrates

Soc Then he was the better for the torpedo s touch?

Men I think so

Soc Mark now the farther development I shall only ask him and not teach him and he shall share the enquiry with me and do you watch and see if you find me telling or explaining anything to him instead of eliciting his opinion Tell me boy is not this a square of four feet which I have drawn?

Boy Yes

Soc And now I add another square equal to the former one?

Boy Yes

Soc And a third which is equal to either of them?

Boy Yes

Soc Suppose that we fill up the vacant corner?

Boy Very good

Soc Here then there are four equal spaces?

Boy Yes

Soc And how many times larger is this space than this other?

Boy Four times

Soc But it ought to have been twice only as you will remember

Boy True

Soc And does not this line reaching from corner to corner bisect each of these spaces? [85]

Boy Yes

Soc And are there not here four equal lines which contain this space?

Boy There are

Soc Look and see how much this space is

Boy I do not understand

Soc Has not each interior line cut off half of the four spaces?

Boy Yes

Soc And how many spaces are there in this section?

Boy Four

Soc And how many in this?

Boy Two

Soc And four is how many times two?

Boy Twice

Soc And this space is of how many feet?

Boy Of eight feet

Soc And from what line do you get this figure?

Boy From this

Soc That is from the line which extends from corner to corner of the figure of four feet?

Boy Yes

Soc And that is the line which the learned call the diagonal And if this is the proper name, then you Meno s slave are prepared to affirm that the double space is the square of the diagonal?

Boy Certainly Socrates

Soc What do you say of him Meno? Were not all these answers given out of his own head?

Men Yes they were all his own

Soc And yet as we were just now saying he did not know?

Men True

Soc But still he had in him those notions of his—had he not?

Men Yes

Soc Then he who does not know may still have true notions of that which he does not know?

Men He has

Soc And at present these notions have just been stirred up in him as in a dream but if he were frequently asked the same questions, in different forms he would know as well as any one at last?

Men I dare say

Soc Without any one teaching him he will recover his knowledge for himself if he is only asked questions?

Men Yes

Soc And this spontaneous recovery of knowledge in him is recollection?

Men True

Soc And this knowledge which he now has must he not either have acquired or always possessed?

Men Yes

Soc But if he always possessed this knowledge he would always have known or if he has acquired the knowledge he could not have acquired it in this life unless he has been taught geometry for he may be made to do the same with all geometry and every other branch of knowledge Now has any one ever taught him all this? You must know about him if as you say he was born and bred in your house

Men And I am certain that no one ever did teach him

Soc And yet he has the knowledge?

Men The fact Socrates is undeniable

Soc But if he did not acquire the knowledge in this life then he must have had and learned it at some other time? [86]

Men Clearly he must we fortunately have sitting by us Anytus [90] the very person of whom we should make enquiry to him then let us repair In the first place, he is the son of a wealthy and wise father Anthemion who acquired his wealth not by accident or gift, like Ismenias the Theban (who has recently made himself as rich as Polycrates) but by his own skill and industry and who is a well-conditioned modest man not insolent or overbearing or annoying moreover this son of his has received a good education as the Athenian people certainly appear to think, for they choose him to fill the highest offices And these are the sort of men from whom you are likely to learn whether there are any teachers of virtue and who they are Please Anytus to help me and your friend Meno in answering our question Who are the teachers? Consider the matter thus If we wanted Meno to be a good physician to whom should we send him? Should we not send him to the physicians?

Any Certainly

Soc Or if we wanted him to be a good cobbler should we not send him to the cobblers?

Any Yes

Soc And so forth?

Any Yes

Soc Let me trouble you with one more question When we say that we should be right in sending him to the physicians if we wanted him to be a physician do we mean that we should be right in sending him to those who profess the art, rather than to those who do not, and to those who demand payment for teaching the art and profess to teach it to any one who will come and learn? And if these were our reasons should we not be right in sending him?

Any Yes

Soc And might not the same be said of flute playing and of the other arts? Would a man who wanted to make another a flute player refuse to send him to those who profess to teach the art for money and be plaguing other persons to give him instruction who are not professed teachers and who never had a single disciple in that branch of knowledge which he wishes him to acquire—would not such conduct be the height of folly?

Any Yes by Zeus and of ignorance too

[91] Soc Very good And now you are in a position to advise with me about my friend Meno He has been telling me Anytus that he desires to attain that kind of wisdom and virtue by which men order the state or the house, and honour their parents and know when to receive and when to send away citizens and strangers, as a good man should Now to whom should he go in order that he may learn this virtue? Does not the previous argument imply clearly that we should send him to those who profess and avouch that they are the common teachers of all Hellas, and are ready to impart instruction to any one who likes at a fixed price?

Any Whom do you mean Socrates?

Soc You surely know do you not Anytus that these are the people whom mankind call Sophists?

Any By Heracles, Socrates forbear! I only hope that no friend or kinsman or acquaintance of mine, whether citizen or stranger will ever be so mad as to allow himself to be corrupted by them for they are a manifest pest and corrupting influences to those who have to do with them

Soc What, Anytus? Of all the people who profess that they know how to do men good do you mean to say that these are the only ones who not only do them no good but positively corrupt those who are entrusted to them and in return for this disservice have the face to demand money? Indeed I cannot believe you for I know of a single man Protagoras, who made more out of his craft than the illustrious Pheidias who created such noble works, or any ten other statuaries How could that be? A mender of old shoes, or patcher up of clothes who made the shoes or clothes worse than he received them, could not have remained thirty days undetected and would very soon have starved whereas during more than forty years Protagoras was corrupting all Hellas and sending his disciples from him worse than he received them and he was never found out For if I am not mistaken he was about seventy years old at his death forty of which were spent in the practice of his profession and during all that time he had a good reputation which to this day he retains and not only Protagoras but many others are well spoken of some who lived before him and others who are still living [92] Now when you say that they deceived and corrupted the youth are they to be supposed to have corrupted them consciously or unconsciously? Can those who were deemed by many to be the wisest men of Hellas have been out of their minds?

Any Out of their minds! No Socrates the young men who gave their money to them were out of their minds and their relations and sometimes do us harm would you not think so?

Men Yes

Soc And what is the guiding principle which makes them profitable or the reverse? Are they not profitable when they are rightly used and hurtful when they are not rightly used?

Men Certainly

Soc Next let us consider the goods of the soul they are temperance justice courage quickness of apprehension memory magnanimity and the like?

Men Surely

Soc And such of these as are not knowledge but of another sort are sometimes profitable and sometimes hurtful as for example courage wanting prudence which is only a sort of confidence? When a man has no sense he is harmed by courage, but when he has sense he is profited?

Men True

Soc And the same may be said of temperance and quickness of apprehension whatever things are learned or done with sense are profitable but when done without sense they are hurtful?

Men Very true

Soc And in general all that the soul attempts or endures when under the guidance of wisdom ends in happiness but when she is under the guidance of folly in the opposite?

Men That appears to be true

Soc If then virtue is a quality of the soul and is admitted to be profitable it must be wisdom or prudence since none of the things of the soul are either profitable or hurtful in themselves but they are all made profitable or hurtful by the addition of wisdom or of folly and therefore if virtue is profitable virtue must be a sort of wisdom or prudence?

Men I quite agree

Soc And the other goods such as wealth and the like of which we were just now saying that they are sometimes good and sometimes evil do not they also become profitable or hurtful accordingly as the soul guides and uses them rightly or wrongly just as the things of the soul herself are benefited when under the guidance of wisdom and harmed by folly?

Men True

Soc And the wise soul guides them rightly and the foolish soul wrongly

Men Yes

Soc And is not this universally true of human nature? All other things hang upon the soul and the things of the soul herself hang upon wisdom, [89] if they are to be good and so wisdom is inferred to be that which profits —and virtue as we say is profitable?

Men Certainly

Soc And thus we arrive at the conclusion that virtue is either wholly or partly wisdom?

Men I think that what you are saying Socrates is very true

Soc But if this is true then the good are not by nature good?

Men I think not

Soc If they had been there would assuredly have been discerners of characters among us who would have known our future great men and on their showing we should have adopted them and when we had got them we should have kept them in the citadel out of the way of harm and set a stamp upon them far rather than upon a piece of gold in order that no one might tamper with them and when they grew up they would have been useful to the state?

Men Yes Socrates that would have been the right way

Soc But if the good are not by nature good, are they made good by instruction?

Men There appears to be no other alternative Socrates On the supposition that virtue is knowledge there can be no doubt that virtue is taught

Soc Yes indeed but what if the supposition is erroneous?

Men I certainly thought just now that we were right

Soc Yes Meno but a principle which has any soundness should stand firm not only just now but always

Men Well and why are you so slow of heart to believe that knowledge is virtue?

Soc I will try and tell you why Meno I do not retract the assertion that if virtue is knowledge it may be taught but I fear that I have some reason in doubting whether virtue is knowledge for consider now and say whether virtue and not only virtue but anything that is taught must not have teachers and disciples?

Men Surely

Soc And conversely may not the art of which neither teachers nor disciples exist be assumed to be incapable of being taught?

Men True but do you think that there are no teachers of virtue?

Soc I have certainly often enquired whether there were any and taken great pains to find them and have never succeeded and many have assisted me in the search and they were the persons whom I thought the most likely to know Here at the moment when he is wanted an illustration of the nature of true opinions: while they abide with us they are beautiful and fruitful, but they run away out of the human soul, and do not remain long, and therefore they are not of much value until they are fastened by the tie of the cause; and this fastening of them, friend Meno, is recollection, as you and I have agreed to call it. But when they are bound, in the first place, they have the nature of knowledge; and, in the second place, they are abiding. And this is why knowledge is more honourable and excellent than true opinion, because fastened by a chain.

Men. What you are saying, Socrates, seems to be very like the truth.

Soc. I too speak rather in ignorance; I only conjecture. And yet that knowledge differs from true opinion is no matter of conjecture with me. There are not many things which I profess to know, but this is most certainly one of them.

Men. Yes, Socrates; and you are quite right in saying so.

Soc. And am I not also right in saying that true opinion leading the way perfects action quite as well as knowledge?

Men. There again, Socrates, I think you are right.

Soc. Then right opinion is not a whit inferior to knowledge, or less useful in action; nor is the man who has right opinion inferior to him who has knowledge?

Men. True.

Soc. And surely the good man has been acknowledged by us to be useful?

Men. Yes.

Soc. Seeing then that men become good and useful to states, not only because they have knowledge, but because they have right opinion, and that neither knowledge nor right opinion is given to man by nature or acquired by him—(do you imagine either of them to be given by nature?

Men. Not I.)

Soc. Then if they are not given by nature, neither are the good by nature good?

Men. Certainly not.

Soc. And nature being excluded, then came the question whether virtue is acquired by teaching?

Men. Yes.

Soc. If virtue was wisdom [or knowledge], then, as we thought, it was taught?

Men. Yes.

Soc. And if it was taught it was wisdom?

Men. Certainly.

Soc. And if there were teachers, it might be taught; and if there were no teachers, not?

Men. True.

Soc. But surely we acknowledged that there were no teachers of virtue?

Men. Yes.

Soc. Then we acknowledged that it was not taught, and was not wisdom?

Men. Certainly.

Soc. And yet we admitted that it was a good?

Men. Yes.

[99] Soc. And the right guide is useful and good?

Men. Certainly.

Soc. And the only right guides are knowledge and true opinion—these are the guides of man; for things which happen by chance are not under the guidance of man: but the guides of man are true opinion and knowledge.

Men. I think so too.

Soc. But if virtue is not taught, neither is virtue knowledge.

Men. Clearly not.

Soc. Then of two good and useful things, one, which is knowledge, has been set aside, and cannot be supposed to be our guide in political life.

Men. I think not.

Soc. And therefore not by any wisdom, and not because they were wise, did Themistocles and those others of whom Anytus spoke govern states. This was the reason why they were unable to make others like themselves—because their virtue was not grounded on knowledge.

Men. That is probably true, Socrates.

Soc. But if not by knowledge, the only other alternative which remains is that statesmen must have guided states by right opinion, which is in politics what divination is in religion; for diviners and also prophets say many things truly, but they know not what they say.

Men. So I believe.

Soc. And may we not, Meno, truly call those men "divine" who, having no understanding, yet succeed in many a grand deed and word?

Men. Certainly.

Soc. Then we shall also be right in calling divine those whom we were just now speaking of as diviners and prophets, including the whole tribe of poets. Yes, and statesmen above all may be said to be divine and illumined, being inspired and possessed of God, in which condition they say many grand things, not knowing what they say.

Men. Yes.

Soc. And the women too, Meno, call good

Soc And is there anything else of which the professors are affirmed not only not to be teachers of others but to be ignorant themselves and bad at the knowledge of that which they are professing to teach? or is there anything about which even the acknowledged gentlemen are sometimes saying that this thing can be taught and sometimes the opposite? Can you say that they are teachers in any true sense whose ideas are in such confusion?

Men I should say certainly not

Soc But if neither the Sophists nor the gentlemen are teachers clearly there can be no other teachers?

Men No

Soc And if there are no teachers neither are there disciples?

Men Agreed

Soc And we have admitted that a thing cannot be taught of which there are neither teachers nor disciples?

Men We have

Soc And there are no teachers of virtue to be found anywhere?

Men There are not

Soc And if there are no teachers neither are there scholars?

Men That I think is true

Soc Then virtue cannot be taught?

Men Not if we are right in our view But I cannot believe Socrates that there are no good men And if there are how did they come into existence?

Soc I am afraid Meno that you and I are not good for much and that Gorgias has been as poor an educator of you as Prodicus has been of me Certainly we shall have to look to ourselves and try to find some one who will help in some way or other to improve us This I say because I observe that in the previous discussion none of us remarked that right and good action is possible to man under other guidance than that of knowledge (ἐπιστήμη) —and indeed if this be denied there is no seeing how there can be any good men at all Men How do you mean Socrates?

Soc I mean that good men are necessarily useful or profitable [97] Were we not right in admitting this? It must be so

Men Yes

Soc And in supposing that they will be useful only if they are true guides to us of action —there we were also right?

Men Yes

Soc But when we said that a man cannot be a good guide unless he have knowledge (φρόνησις) in this we were wrong

Men What do you mean by the word right ?

Soc I will explain If a man knew the way to Larisa or anywhere else and went to the place and led others thither would he not be a right and good guide?

Men Certainly

Soc And a person who had a right opinion about the way but had never been and did not know, might be a good guide also might he not?

Men Certainly

Soc And while he has true opinion about that which the other knows he will be just as good a guide if he thinks the truth as he who knows the truth?

Men Exactly

Soc Then true opinion is as good a guide to correct action as knowledge and that was the point which we omitted in our speculation about the nature of virtue when we said that knowledge only is the guide of right action whereas there is also right opinion

Men True

Soc Then right opinion is not less useful than knowledge?

Men The difference Socrates is only that he who has knowledge will always be right but he who has right opinion will sometimes be right and sometimes not

Soc What do you mean? Can he be wrong who has right opinion so long as he has right opinion?

Men I admit the cogency of your argument and therefore Socrates I wonder that knowledge should be preferred to right opinion—or why they should ever differ

Soc And shall I explain this wonder to you?

Men Do tell me

Soc You would not wonder if you had ever observed the images of Daedalus but perhaps you have not got them in your country?

Men What have they to do with the question?

Soc Because they require to be fastened in order to keep them and if they are not fastened they will play truant and run away

Men Well what of that?

Soc I mean to say that they are not very valuable possessions if they are at liberty for they will walk off like runaway slaves but when fastened they are of great value for they are really beautiful works of art [98] Now this is even this Meletus but his sharp eyes have found me out at once, and he has indicted me for impiety And therefore, I adjure you to tell me the nature of piety and impiety which you said that you knew so well, and of murder and of other offences against the gods. What are they? Is not piety in every action always the same? and impiety again—is it not always the opposite of piety and also the same with itself, having, as impiety one notion which includes whatever is impious?

Cf Euthyphro 11

Euth To be sure, Socrates

Soc And what is piety and what is impiety?

Euth Piety is doing as I am doing that is to say prosecuting any one who is guilty of murder sacrilege, or of any similar crime—whether he be your father or mother or whoever he may be—that makes no difference and not to prosecute them is impiety And please to consider Socrates, what a notable proof I will give you of the truth of my words, a proof which I have already given to others —of the principle, I mean, that the impious, whoever he may be, ought not to go unpunished. For do not men regard Zeus as the best and most righteous of the gods? [6]—and yet they admit that he bound his father (Cronos) because he wickedly devoured his sons, and that he too had punished his own father (Uranus) for a similar reason, in a nameless manner And yet when I proceed against my father they are angry with me So inconsistent are they in their way of talking when the gods are concerned, and when I am concerned.

Soc May not this be the reason, Euthyphro, why I am charged with impiety—that I cannot away with these stories about the gods? and therefore I suppose that people think me wrong But, as you who are well informed about them approve of them, I cannot do better than assent to your superior wisdom What else can I say confessing as I do, that I know nothing about them Tell me, for the love of Zeus, whether you really believe that they are true.

Euth Yes, Socrates and things more wonderful still, of which the world is in ignorance.

Soc And do you really believe that the gods fought with one another and had dire quarrels, battles, and the like, as the poets say and as you may see represented in the works of great artists? The temples are full of them and notably the robe of Athene which is carried up to the Acropolis at the great Panathenaea, is embroidered with them Are all these tales of the gods true, Euthyphro?

Euth Yes, Socrates and, as I was saying, I can tell you, if you would like to hear them, many other things about the gods which would quite amaze you.

Soc I dare say and you shall tell me them at some other time when I have leisure. But just at present I would rather hear from you a more precise answer which you have not as yet given, my friend, to the question, What is "piety"? When asked, you only replied, Doing as you do, charging your father with murder

Euth And what I said was true, Socrates

Soc No doubt, Euthyphro but you would admit that there are many other pious acts?

Euth There are.

Soc Remember that I did not ask you to give me two or three examples of piety but to explain the general idea which makes all pious things to be pious. Do you not recollect that there was one idea which made the impious impious, and the pious pious?

Euth I remember

Soc Tell me what is the nature of this idea, and then I shall have a standard to which I may look, and by which I may measure actions, whether yours or those of any one else and then I shall be able to say that such and such an action is pious, such another impious.

Euth I will tell you, if you like.

Soc I should very much like.

Euth Piety then, is that which is dear to the gods, and impiety is that which is not dear to them.

[7] Soc Very good Euthyphro you have now given me the sort of answer which I wanted. But whether what you say is true or not I cannot as yet tell although I make no doubt that you will prove the truth of your words.

Euth Of course.

Soc Come, then, and let us examine what we are saying That thing or person which is dear to the gods is pious, and that thing or person which is hateful to the gods is impious, these two being the extreme opposites of one another Was not that said?

Euth It was.

Soc And well said?

Euth Yes, Socrates, I thought so it was certainly said

Soc And further Euthyphro the gods were admitted to have enmities and hatreds and differences?

Euth Yes, that was also said.

Soc And what sort of difference creates enmity and anger? Suppose for example that you and I my good friend differ about a number do differences of this sort make us enemies

Soc I dare say not for you are reserved in your behaviour and seldom impart your wisdom But I have a benevolent habit of pouring out myself to everybody and would even pay for a listener and I am afraid that the Athenians may think me too talkative Now if as I was saying they would only laugh at me as you say that they laugh at you the time might pass gaily enough in the court but perhaps they may be in earnest and then what the end will be you soothsayers only can predict

Euth I dare say that the affair will end in nothing Socrates and that you will win your cause and I think that I shall win my own

Soc And what is your suit Euthyphro? are you the pursuer or the defendant?

Euth I am the pursuer

Soc Of whom?

[4] Euth You will think me mad when I tell you

Soc Why has the fugitive wings?

Euth Nay he is not very volatile at his time of life

Soc Who is he?

Euth My father

Soc Your father! my good man?

Euth Yes

Soc And of what is he accused?

Euth Of murder Socrates

Soc By the powers Euthyphro! how little does the common herd know of the nature of right and truth A man must be an extraordinary man and have made great strides in wisdom before he could have seen his way to bring such an action

Euth Indeed Socrates he must

Soc I suppose that the man whom your father murdered was one of your relatives—clearly he was for if he had been a stranger you would never have thought of prosecuting him

Euth I am amused Socrates at your making a distinction between one who is a relation and one who is not a relation for surely the pollution is the same in either case if you knowingly associate with the murderer when you ought to clear yourself and him by proceeding against him The real question is whether the murdered man has been justly slain If justly then your duty is to let the matter alone but if unjustly then even if the murderer lives under the same roof with you and eats at the same table proceed against him Now the man who is dead was a poor dependant of mine who worked for us as a field labourer on our farm in Naxos and one day in a fit of drunken passion he got into a quarrel with one of our domestic servants and slew him My father bound him hand and foot and threw him into a ditch, and then sent to Athens to ask of a diviner what he should do with him Meanwhile he never attended to him and took no care about him for he regarded him as a murderer and thought that no great harm would be done even if he did die Now this was just what happened For such was the effect of cold and hunger and chains upon him that before the messenger returned from the diviner he was dead And my father and family are angry with me for taking the part of the murderer and prosecuting my father They say that he did not kill him, and that if he did the dead man was but a murderer, and I ought not to take any notice for that a son is impious who prosecutes a father Which shows Socrates how little they know what the gods think about piety and impiety

Soc Good heavens Euthyphro! and is your knowledge of religion and of things pious and impious so very exact that supposing the circumstances to be as you state them you are not afraid lest you too may be doing an impious thing in bringing an action against your father?

Euth The best of Euthyphro and that which distinguishes him Socrates [5] from other men is his exact knowledge of all such matters. What should I be good for without it?

Soc Rare friend! I think that I cannot do better than be your disciple Then before the trial with Meletus comes on I shall challenge him and say that I have always had a great interest in religious questions and now as he charges me with rash imaginations and innovations in religion I have become your disciple You Meletus as I shall say to him acknowledge Euthyphro to be a great theologian and sound in his opinions and if you approve of him you ought to approve of me and not have me into court but if you disapprove you should begin by indicting him who is my teacher and who will be the ruin not of the young but of the old that is to say of myself whom he instructs and of his old father whom he admonishes and chastises And if Meletus refuses to listen to me, but will go on and will not shift the indictment from me to you I cannot do better than repeat this challenge in the court

Euth Yes indeed Socrates and if he attempts to indict me I am mistaken if I do not find a flaw in him the court shall have a great deal more to say to him than to me

Soc And I my dear friend knowing this, am desirous of becoming your disciple For I observe that no one appears to notice you—not even this Meletus but his sharp eyes have found me out at once, and he has ind cted me for impiety And therefore, I adjure you to tell me the nature of piety and impiety which you said that you knew so well and of murder and of other offences against the gods What are they? Euth It was

Soc And well said?

Euth Yes, Socrates, I thought so it was certainly said

Soc And further Euthyphro the gods were admitted to have enmities and hatreds and differences?

E th Yes, that as also said

Soc And what sort of difference creates enm ty and anger? Suppose for example that you and I my good fr end differ about a number do differences of this sort make us enemies and set us at variance with one another? Do we not go at once to arithmetic and put an end to them by a sum?

Euth True

Soc Or suppose that we differ about magnitudes do we not quickly end the differences by measuring?

Euth Very true

Soc And we end a controversy about heavy and light by resorting to a weighing machine?

Euth To be sure

Soc But what differences are there which cannot be thus decided and which therefore make us angry and set us at enmity with one another? I dare say the answer does not occur to you at the moment, and therefore I will suggest that these enmities arise when the matters of difference are the just and unjust good and evil honourable and dishonourable Are not these the points about which men differ and about which when we are unable satisfactorily to decide our differences you and I and all of us quarrel when we do quarrel?

Euth Yes Socrates the nature of the differences about which we quarrel is such as you describe

Soc And the quarrels of the gods noble Euthyphro when they occur are of a like nature?

Euth Certainly they are

Soc They have differences of opinion as you say, about good and evil just and unjust honourable and dishonourable there would have been no quarrels among them if there had been no such differences—would there now?

Euth You are quite right

Soc Does not every man love that which he deems noble and just and good and hate the opposite of them?

Euth Very true

Soc But as you say people regard the same things some as just and others as unjust—about these they dispute and so there arise wars and fightings among them [8]

Euth Very true

Soc Then the same things are hated by the gods and loved by the gods and are both hateful and dear to them?

Euth True

Soc And upon this view the same things Euthyphro, will be pious and also impious?

Euth So I should suppose

Soc Then, my friend I remark with surprise that you have not answered the question which I asked For I certainly did not ask you to tell me what action is both pious and impious but now it would seem that what is loved by the gods is also hated by them And therefore, Euthyphro in thus chastising your father you may very likely be doing what is agreeable to Zeus but disagreeable to Cronos or Uranus, and what is acceptable to Hephaestus but unacceptable to Here, and there may be other gods who have similar differences of opinion

Euth But I believe Socrates that all the gods would be agreed as to the propriety of punishing a murderer there would be no difference of opinion about that

Soc Well but speaking of men Euthyphro, did you ever hear any one arguing that a murderer or any sort of evil doer ought to be let off?

Euth I should rather say that these are the questions which they are always arguing especially in courts of law they commit all sorts of crimes and there is nothing which they will not do or say in their own defence

Soc But do they admit their guilt, Euthyphro and yet say that they ought not to be punished?

Euth No they do not

Soc Then there are some things which they do not venture to say and do for they do not venture to argue that the guilty are to be unpunished but they deny their guilt do they not?

Euth Yes

Soc Then they do not argue that the evil doer should not be punished but they argue about the fact of who the evil-doer is and what he did and when?

Euth True

Soc And the gods are in the same case if as you assert they quarrel about just and unjust, and some of them say while others deny that injustice is done among them For surely neither God nor man will ever venture to say that the doer of injustice is not to be punished?

Euth That is true Socrates in the main

Soc But they join issue about the particulars —gods and men alike and if they dispute at all they dispute about some act which is called in question and which by some is affirmed to be just, by others to be unjust Is not that true?

Euth Quite true

[9] Soc Well then my dear friend Euthyphro do tell me for my better instruction and information what proof have you that in the opinion of all the gods a servant who is guilty of murder and is put in chains by the master of the dead man and dies because he is put in chains before he who bound him can learn from the interpreters of the gods what he ought to do with him, dies unjustly and that on behalf of such an one a son ought to proceed against his father and accuse him of murder How would you show that all the gods absolutely agree in approving of his act? Prove to me that they do, and I will applaud your wisdom as long as I live

Euth It will be a difficult task but I could make the matter very clear indeed to you

Soc I understand you mean to say that I am not so quick of apprehension as the judges for to them you will be sure to prove that the act is unjust, and hateful to the gods.

Euth Yes indeed, Socrates at least if they will listen to me.

Soc But they will be sure to listen if they find that you are a good speaker There was a notion that came into my mind while you were speaking I said to myself Well and what if Euthyphro does prove to me that all the gods regarded the death of the serf as unjust, how do I know anything more of the nature of piety and impiety for granting that this action may be hateful to the gods, still piety and impiety are not adequately defined by these distinctions, for that which is hateful to the gods has been shown to be also pleasing and dear to them. And therefore, Euthyphro I do not ask you to prove this I will suppose, if you like, that all the gods condemn and abominate such an action. But I will amend the definition so far as to say that what all the gods hate is impious, and what they love pious or holy and what some of them love and others hate is both or neither Shall this be our definition of piety and impiety

Euth Why not, Socrates?

Soc Why not certainly as far as I am concerned, Euthyphro, there is no reason why not. But whether this admission will greatly assist you in the task of instructing me as you promised, is a matter for you to consider Euth Yes, I should say that what all the gods love is pious and holy and the opposite which they all hate, impious.

Soc Ought we to enquire into the truth of this, Euthyphro, or simply to accept the mere statement on our own authority and that of others? What do you say?

Euth We should enquire and I believe that the statement will stand the test of enquiry

Soc We shall know better my good friend, in a little while The point which I should first wish to understand is whether the pious or holy is beloved by the gods because it is holy [10] or holy because it is beloved of the gods.

Euth I do not understand your meaning Socrates

Soc I will endeavour to explain we speak of carrying and we speak of being carried, of leading and being led, seeing and being seen. You know that in all such cases there is a difference, and you know also in what the difference lies?

Euth I think that I understand

Soc And is not that which is beloved distinct from that which loves?

Euth Certainly

Soc Well and now tell me, is that which is carried in this state of carrying because it is carried, or for some other reason?

Euth No that is the reason.

Soc And the same is true of what is led and of what is seen?

Euth True.

Soc And a thing is not seen because it is visible but conversely visible because it is seen nor is a thing led because it is in the state of being led, or carried because it is in the state of being carried, but the converse of this And now I think, Euthyphro, that my meaning will be intelligible and my meaning is, that any state of action or passion implies previous action or passion. It does not become because it is becoming, but it is in a state of becoming because it becomes neither does it suffer because it is in a state of suffering, but it is in a state of suffering because it suffers. Do you not agree?

Euth Yes.

Soc Is not that which is loved in some state either of becoming or suffering?

Euth Yes

Soc And the same holds as in the previous instances the state of being loved follows the act of being loved, and not the act the state

Euth Certainly

Soc And what do you say of piety Euthyphro is not piety according to your definition, loved by all the gods?

Euth Yes

Soc Because it is pious or holy or for some other reason?

Euth No, that is the reason

Soc It is loved because it is holy not holy because it is loved?

Euth Yes

Soc And that which is dear to the gods is loved by them and is in a state to be loved of them because it is loved of them?

Euth Certainly

Soc Then that which is dear to the gods,

Euthyphro is not holy nor is that which is holy loved of God as you affirm but they are two different things

Euth How do you mean Socrates?

Soc I mean to say that the holy has been acknowledged by us to be loved of God because it is holy not to be holy because it is loved

Euth Yes

Soc But that which is dear to the gods is dear to them because it is loved by them not loved by them because it is dear to them

Futh True

Soc But friend Euthyphro if that which is holy is the same with that which is dear to God and is loved because it is holy then that which is dear to God would have been loved as being [11] dear to God but if that which is dear to God is dear to him because loved by him then that which is holy would have been holy because loved by him But now you see that the reverse is the case and that they are quite different from one another For one (θεοφιλες) is of a kind to be loved because it is loved and the other (σιοι) is loved because it is of a kind to be loved Thus you appear to me Euthyphro when I asl you what is the essence of holiness to offer an attribute only and not the essence—the attribute of being loved by all the gods But you still refuse to explain to me the nature of holiness And therefore if you please I will ask you not to hide your treasure but to tell me once more what holiness or piety really is whether dear to the gods or not (for that is a matter about which we will not quarrel) and what is impiety?

Euth I really do not know Socrates how to express what I mean For somehow or other our arguments on whatever ground we rest them seem to turn round and walk away from us

Soc Your words Euthyphro are like the handiwork of my ancestor Daedalus and if I were the sayer or propounder of them you might say that my arguments walk away and will not remain fixed where they are placed because I am a descendant of his But now since these notions are your own you must find some other gibe for they certainly as you yourself allow, show an inclination to be on the move

Euth Nay Socrates I shall still say that you are the Daedalus who sets arguments in motion not I certainly but you make them move or go round for they would never have stirred as far as I am concerned

Soc Then I must be a greater than Daedalus for whereas he only made his own inventions to move I move those of other people as well And the beauty of it is that I would rather not. For I would give the wisdom of Daedalus, and the wealth of Tantalus to be able to detain them and keep them fixed But enough of this. As I perceive that you are lazy I will myself endeavor to show you how you might instruct me in the nature of piety and I hope that you will not grudge your labour Tell me then,—Is not that which is pious necessarily just?

Euth Yes

Soc And is then all which is just pious? or is that which is pious all just [12] but that which is just only in part and not all pious?

Euth I do not understand you Socrates

Soc And yet I know that you are as much wiser than I am as you are younger But as I was saying revered friend the abundance of your wisdom makes you lazy Please to exert yourself for there is no real difficulty in understanding me What I mean I may explain by an illustration of what I do not mean The poet (Stasinus) sings—

Of Zeus the author and creator of all these things
You will not tell for where there is fear there is also reverence

Now I disagree with this poet Shall I tell you in what respect?

Euth By all means

Soc I should not say that where there is fear there is also reverence for I am sure that many persons fear poverty and disease and the like evils but I do not perceive that they reverence the objects of their fear

Euth Very true

Soc But where reverence is there is fear for he who has a feeling of reverence and shame about the commission of any action fears and is afraid of an ill reputation

Euth No doubt

Soc Then we are wrong in saying that where there is fear there is also reverence and we should say where there is reverence there is also fear But there is not always reverence where there is fear for fear is a more extended notion and reverence is a part of fear just as the odd is a part of number and number is a more extended notion than the odd I suppose that you follow me now?

Euth Quite well

Soc That was the sort of question which I meant to raise when I asked whether the just is always the pious or the pious always the just and whether there may not be justice where there is not piety for justice is the more extended notion of which piety is only a part Do you dissent?

Euth No I think that you are quite right

Soc Then if piety is a part of justice I suppose that we should enquire what part? If you had pursued the enquiry in the previous cases for instance if you had asked me what is an even number and what part of number the even is, I should have had no difficulty in replying a number which represents a figure having two equal sides Do you not agree?

Euth Yes, I quite agree

Soc In like manner I want you to tell me what part of justice is piety or holiness that I may be able to tell Meletus *not to do me in*justice or indict me for impiety as I am now adequately instructed by you in the nature of piety or holiness and their opposites

Euth Piety or holiness Socrates, appears to me to be that part of justice which attends to the gods as there is the other part of justice which attends to men

[13] Soc That is good Euthyphro yet still there is a little point about which I should like to have further information, What is the meaning of attention? For attention can hardly be used in the same sense when applied to the gods as when applied to other things For instance horses are said to require attention and not every person is able to attend to them, but only a person skilled in horsemanship Is it not so?

Euth Certainly

Soc I should suppose that the art of horsemanship is the art of attending to horses?

Euth Yes

Soc Nor is every one qualified to attend to dogs but only the huntsman?

Euth True

Soc And I should also conceive that the art of the huntsman is the art of attending to dogs?

Euth Yes

Soc As the art of the oxherd is the art of attending to oxen?

Euth Very true

Soc In like manner holiness or piety is the art of attending to the gods?—that would be your meaning Euthyphro?

Euth Yes.

Soc And is not attention always designed for the good or benefit of that to which the attention is given? As in the case of horses you may observe that when attended to by the horseman's art they are benefited and improved are they not?

Euth True.

Soc As the dogs are benefited by the huntsman's art and the oxen by the art of the oxherd, and all other things are tended or attended for their good and not for their hurt?

Euth Certainly not for their hurt

Soc But for their good?

Euth Of course

Soc And does piety or holiness which has been defined to be the art of attending to the gods, benefit or improve them? Would you say that when you do a holy act you make any of the gods better?

Euth No no that was certainly not what I meant

Soc And I Euthyphro never supposed that you did I asked you the question about the nature of the attention because I thought that you did not,

Euth You do me justice Socrates that is not the sort of attention which I mean

Soc Good but I must still ask what is this attention to the gods which is called piety?

Euth It is such Socrates, as servants show to their masters

Soc I understand—a sort of ministration to the gods

Euth Exactly

Soc Medicine is also a sort of ministration or service having in view the attainment of some object—would you not say of health?

Euth I should

Soc Again there is an art which ministers to the ship-builder with a view to the attainment of some result?

Euth Yes Socrates with a view to the building of a ship

Soc As there is an art which ministers to the housebuilder with a view to the building of a house?

Euth Yes

Soc And now tell me my good friend about the art which ministers to the gods what work does that help to accomplish? For you must surely know if as you say you are of all men living the one who is best instructed in religion

Euth And I speak the truth Socrates

Soc Tell me then oh tell me—what is that fair work which the gods do by the help of our ministrations?

Euth Many and fair Socrates are the works which they do

[14] Soc Why my friend, and so are those of a general But the chief of them is easily told Would you not say that victory in war is the chief of them?

Euth Certainly

Soc Many and fair too, are the works of the husbandman if I am not mistaken but his chief work is the production of food from the earth?

Euth Exactly

Soc And of the many and fair things done by the gods which is the chief or principal one?

Euth I have told you already Socrates that to learn all these things accurately will be very tiresome Let me simply say that piety or holiness is learning how to please the gods in word and deed by prayers and sacrifices Such piety is the salvation of families and states just as the impious, which is unpleasing to the gods is their ruin and destruction

Soc I think that you could have answered in much fewer words the chief question which I asked Euthyphro if you had chosen But I see plainly that you are not disposed to instruct me—clearly not else why when we reached the point did you turn aside? Had you only answered me I should have truly learned of you by this time the nature of piety Now as the asker of a question is necessarily dependent on the answerer whither he leads I must follow and can only ask again what is the pious and what is piety? Do you mean that they are a sort of science of praying and sacrificing?

Euth Yes I do

Soc And sacrificing is giving to the gods and prayer is asking of the gods?

Euth Yes Socrates

Soc Upon this view then piety is a science of asking and giving?

Euth You understand me capitally Socrates

Soc Yes my friend the reason is that I am a votary of your science and give my mind to it and therefore nothing which you say will be thrown away upon me Please then to tell me what is the nature of this service to the gods? Do you mean that we prefer requests and give gifts to them?

Euth Yes, I do

Soc Is not the right way of asking to ask of them what we want?

Euth Certainly

Soc And the right way of giving is to give to them in return what they want of us There would be no meaning in an art which gives to any one that which he does not want

Euth Very true Socrates

Soc Then piety Euthyphro is an art which gods and men have of doing business with one another?

Euth That is an expression which you may use if you like

Soc But I have no particular liking for anything but the truth I wish however that you would tell me what benefit accrues to the gods from our gifts There is no doubt about what they give to us [15] for there is no good thing which they do not give but how we can give any good thing to them in return is far from being equally clear If they give everything and we give nothing, that must be an affair of business in which we have very greatly the advantage of them

Euth And do you imagine Socrates that any benefit accrues to the gods from our gifts?

Soc But if not Euthyphro what is the meaning of gifts which are conferred by us upon the gods?

Euth What else but tributes of honour and, as I was just now saying what pleases them?

Soc Piety then is pleasing to the gods, but not beneficial or dear to them?

Euth I should say that nothing could be dearer

Soc Then once more the assertion is repeated that piety is dear to the gods?

Euth Certainly

Soc And when you say this can you wonder at your words not standing firm but walking away? Will you accuse me of being the Daedalus who makes them walk away not perceiving that there is another and far greater artist than Daedalus who makes them go round in a circle and he is yourself for the argument, as you will perceive comes round to the same point Were we not saying that the holy or pious was not the same with that which is loved of the gods? Have you forgotten?

Euth I quite remember

Soc And are you not saying that what is loved of the gods is holy and is not this the same as what is dear to them—do you see?

Euth True

Soc Then either we were wrong in our former assertion or if we were right then we are wrong now

Euth One of the two must be true.

Soc Then we must begin again and ask, What is piety? That is an enquiry which I shall never be weary of pursuing as far as in me lies and I entreat you not to scorn me but to apply your mind to the utmost, and tell me the truth For if any man knows you are he and therefore I must detain you, like Proteus, until you tell If you had not certainly known the nature of piety and impiety I am confident that you would never on behalf of a serf have charged your aged father with murder. You would not have run such a risk of doing wrong in the sight of the gods, and you would have had too much respect for the opinions of men. I am sure, therefore, that you know the nature of piety and impiety. Speak out then, my dear Euthyphro, and do not hide your knowledge.

Euth. Another time, Socrates; for I am in a hurry, and must go now.

Soc. Alas! my companion, and will you leave me in despair? I was hoping that you would instruct me in the nature of piety and impiety; and then I might have cleared myself of Meletus and his indictment. [16] I would have told him that I had been enlightened by Euthyphro, and had given up rash innovations and speculations, in which I indulged only through ignorance, and that now I am about to lead a better life.

APOLOGY

[17] How you O Athenians have been affected by my accusers I cannot tell but I know that they almost made me forget who I was—so persuasively did they speak and yet they have hardly uttered a word of truth But of the many falsehoods told by them there was one which quite amazed me —I mean when they said that you should be upon your guard and not allow yourselves to be deceived by the force of my eloquence To say this when they were certain to be detected as soon as I opened my lips and proved myself to be anything but a great speaker did indeed appear to me most shameless—unless by the force of eloquence they mean the force of truth for if such is their meaning I admit that I am eloquent But in how different a way from theirs! Well as I was saying they have scarcely spoken the truth at all but from me you shall hear the whole truth not however delivered after their manner in a set oration duly ornamented with words and phrases No by heaven! but I shall use the words and arguments which occur to me at the moment for I am confident in the justice of my cause at my time of life I ought not to be appearing before you O men of Athens in the character of a juvenile orator—let no one expect it of me And I must beg of you to grant me a favour —If I defend myself in my accustomed manner and you hear me using the words which I have been in the habit of using in the agora at the tables of the money-changers or anywhere else I would ask you not to be surprised and not to interrupt me on this account For I am more than seventy years of age and appearing now for the first time in a court of law I am quite a stranger to the language of the place and therefore I would have you regard me as if I were really a stranger [18] whom you would excuse if he spoke in his native tongue and after the fashion of his country —Am I making an unfair request of you? Never mind the manner which may or may not be good but think only of the truth of my words and give heed to that let the speaker speak truly and the judge decide justly

And first I have to reply to the older charges and to my first accusers and then I will go on to the later ones For of old I have had many accusers who have accused me falsely to you during many years and I am more afraid of them than of Anytus and his associates, who are dangerous too in their own way But far more dangerous are the others who be an when you were children and took possession of your minds with their falsehoods tellin of one Socrates a wise man who speculated about the heaven above and searched into the earth beneath and made the worse appear the better cause The disseminators of this tale are the accusers whom I dread for their hearers are apt to fancy that such enquirers do not believe in the existence of the gods And they are many and their charges against me are of ancient date, and they were made by them in the days when you were more impressible than you are now—in childhood or it may have been in youth—and the cause when heard went by default for there was none to answer And hardest of all I do not know and cannot tell the names of my accusers unless in the chance case of a Comic poet All who from envy and malice have persuaded you—some of them having first convinced themselves—all this class of men are most difficult to deal with for I cannot have them up here and cross-examine them and therefore I must simply fight with shadows in my own defence and argue when there is no one who answers I will ask you then to assume with me as I was saying that my opponents are of two kinds one recent, the other ancient and I hope that you will see the propriety of my answering the latter first for these accusations you heard long before the others and much oftener

[19] Well th n, I must make my defence and endeavor to clear a vay in a short time a slander which has lasted a long time. May I succ ed if to succeed be for my good and yours or l kely to avail me in my cause! The task is not an easy one I quite understand the nature of it. And so leaving the event with God in obedience to the law I will now make my de fence

I vill begin at the beginning and ask what is the accusation which has given rise to the slander of me and in fact has encouraged Me letus to prefer this charge against me Well what do the slanderers say? They shall be my prosecutors and I will sum up their words in an affidavit Socrates is an evil-doer and a c rious person who searches into things under the earth and in heaven and he makes the worse appear the better cause and he teaches the aforesaid doctrines to others Such is the nature of the accusation it is j st what you have yourselves seen in the comedy of Aristophanes, who has introduced a man v hom he calls Socrates, going about and saying that he walks in a r and talking a deal of nonsense concern ng matters of v hich I do not pretend to kno v either much or little—not that I mean to speak disparagingly of any one who s a student of natural ph losophy I should be very sorry if Meletus could bring so grave a charge against me But the simple truth is, O Athenians, that I have nothing to do with physical speculations Very many of those here present are witne ses to the truth of this and to them I appeal Speak then you who have heard me, and tell your neighbours whether any of you ha e eve known me hold forth in few words or in many upon such matters You hear the r answer And from what they say of this part of the charge you will be able to judge of the truth of the rest.

As little foundation is there for the report that I am a tea her and take money this c cusation has no more truth in it than the other Altho gh if a man we e really able to instruct mankind, to recei e money for giving instruc tion would, in my opin on be an honour to him There is Gorg as of Leontium, and Prodi cus of Ceos and H pp as of Eli who go the round of the cit es, and are able to persuade the yo ng men to lea e their ov n c tizens by whom they m gl t be taught for nothing [20] and come to them whom they not only pay but are thankful if they may be allowed to pay them. There is at this time a Parian philosopher re iding in Ath ns of whom I have heard and I came to hear of him in this way —I came across a man vho has pent a world of money on the Sophists, Callias the son of Hipponicus, and knowing that he had sons I asked him Cal lias" I said if your two sons were foals or calves there would be no difficulty in finding some one to put over them we should hire a trainer of horses, or a farmer probably who would improve and perfect them in their own proper virtue and excellence but as they are human beings vhom are you thinking of plac ing over them? Is there any one who under stands human and pol tical virtue? You must have thought about the matter for you have sons is there any one? There is he said Who is he? said I and of what country? and what does he charge? Evenus the Pari an he replied he is the man and his charge is five minae Happy is Evenus I said to my self if he really has this wisdom and teaches at such a moderate charge. Had I the same, I should have been ery proud and conceited but the truth is that I have no knowledge of the kind

I dare say Athenians that some one among you will reply Yes Socrates but what is the origin of these accusations which are brought against you there must have been someth ng strange which you have been doing? All these rumours and this talk about you would never have arisen if you had been like other men tell us then what is the cause of them for ve should be sorry to judge hastily of you Now I regard this as a fair challenge and I will en deavour to explain to you the reason why I m called wise and have such an evil fame. Please to attend then And although some of you may think that I am joking I declare that I will tell you the ent re truth Men of Athens this repu tation of mine has come of a certain sort of wisdom vhich I possess If you ask me what kind of w sdom I reply visdom such as may perhaps be atta ned by man, for to that exte t I am in lined to believe that I am ise whereas the persons of whom I was speaking have a superhuman wisdom which I may fail to de scribe, because I ha e t not myself and he vho says that I have, speaks falsely and is taking away my character And here, O men of Athens I m st beg you not to interrupt me even if I seem to say someth ng extravagant For the o d which I w ll speak is not mine I will re fer you to a witness who is worthy of credit that witness shall be the God of Delphi—he will tell you about my wisdom if I have any and of what sort it is You must have known Chaerephon he was early a friend of mine and also a friend of yours [21] for he shared in the recent exile of the people and returned with you Well Chaerephon as you know was very impetuous in all his doings and he went to Delphi and boldly asked the oracle to tell him whether—as I was saying I must beg you not to interrupt—he asked the oracle to tell him whether any one was wiser than I was and the Pythian prophetess answered that there was no man wiser Chaerephon is dead himself but his brother, who is in court, will confirm the truth of what I am saying

Why do I mention this? Because I am going to explain to you why I have such an evil name When I heard the answer I said to myself What can the god mean? and what is the interpretation of his riddle? for I know that I have no wisdom small or great What then can he mean when he says that I am the wisest of men? And yet he is a god and cannot lie that would be against his nature After long consideration I thought of a method of trying the question I reflected that if I could only find a man wiser than myself then I might go to the god with a refutation in my hand I should say to him Here is a man who is wiser than I am but you said that I was the wisest Accordingly I went to one who had the reputation of wisdom and observed him—his name I need not mention he was a politician whom I selected for examination—and the result was as follows When I began to talk with him I could not help thinking that he was not really wise although he was thought wise by many and still wiser by himself and thereupon I tried to explain to him that he thought himself wise but was not really wise and the consequence was that he hated me and his enmity was shared by several who were present and heard me So I left him saying to myself as I went away Well although I do not suppose that either of us knows anything really beautiful and good I am better off than he is —for he knows nothing and thinks that he knows I neither know nor think that I know In this latter particular then I seem to have slightly the advantage of him Then I went to another who had still higher pretensions to wisdom and my conclusion was exactly the same Whereupon I made another enemy of him and of many others besides him

Then I went to one man after another being not unconscious of the enmity which I provoked and I lamented and feared this But necessity was laid upon me —the word of God I thought, ought to be considered first And I said to myself Go I must to all who appear to know [22] and find out the meaning of the oracle And I swear to you Athenians by the dog I swear[1]—for I must tell you the truth—the result of my mission was just this I found that the men most in repute were all but the most foolish and that others less esteemed were really wiser and better I will tell you the tale of my wanderings and of the Herculean labours, as I may call them which I endured only to find at last the oracle irrefutable After the politicians, I went to the poets tragic dithyrambic and all sorts And there I said to myself you will be instantly detected now you will find out that you are more ignorant than they are Accordingly I took them some of the most elaborate passages in their own writings and asked what was the meaning of them—thinking that they would teach me something Will you believe me? I am almost ashamed to confess the truth, but I must say that there is hardly a person present who would not have talked better about their poetry than they did themselves Then I knew that not by wisdom do poets write poetry but by a sort of genius and inspiration they are like diviners or soothsayers who also say many fine things but do not understand the meaning of them The poets appeared to me to be much in the same case and I further observed that upon the strength of their poetry they believed themselves to be the wisest of men in other things in which they were not wise So I departed conceiving myself to be superior to them for the same reason that I was superior to the politicians

At last I went to the artisans for I was conscious that I knew nothing at all as I may say and I was sure that they knew many fine things and here I was not mistaken for they did know many things of which I was ignorant and in this they certainly were wiser than I was But I observed that even the good artisans fell into the same error as the poets —because they were good workmen they thought that they also knew all sorts of high matters and this defect in them overshadowed their wisdom and therefore I asked myself on behalf of the oracle, whether I would like to be as I was, neither having their knowledge nor their ignorance or like them in both and I made answer to myself and to the oracle that I was better off as I was

This inquisition has led to my having many enemies of the worst and most dangerous kind [23] and has given occasion also to many calumnies And I am called wise, for my hearers always imagine that I myself possess the wisdom which I find wanting in others but the truth is, O men of Athens, that God only is wise and by his answer he intends to show that the wisdom of men is worth little or nothing he is not speaking of Socrates he is only using my name by way of illustration as if he said, He, O men is the wisest, who like Socrates, knows that his wisdom is in truth worth nothing And so I go about the world obedient to the god and search and make enquiry into the wisdom of any one whether citizen or stranger who appears to be wise and if he is not wise then in vindication of the oracle I show him that he is not wise and my occupation quite absorbs me and I have no time to give either to any public matter of interest or to any concern of my own but I am in utter poverty by reason of my devotion to the god

There is another thing —young men of the richer classes, who have not much to do come about me of their own accord they like to hear the pretenders examined and they often imitate me, and proceed to examine others there are plenty of persons as they quickly discover who think that they know something but really know little or nothing and then those who are examined by them instead of being angry with themselves are angry with me This confounded Socrates, they say this villainous misleader of youth!—and then if somebody asks them, Why what evil does he practise or teach? they do not know and cannot tell but in order that they may not appear to be at a loss, they repeat the ready made charges which are used against all philosophers about teaching things up in the clouds and under the earth and having no gods and making the worse appear the better cause for they do not like to confess that their pretence of knowledge has been detected —which is the truth and as they are numerous and ambitious and energetic and are drawn up in battle array and have persuasive tongues, they have filled your ears with their loud and inveterate calumnies And this is the reason why my three accusers Meletus and Anytus and Lycon have set upon me Meletus, who has a quarrel with me on behalf of the poets Anytus, on behalf of the craftsmen and politicians [24] Lycon on behalf of the rhetoricians and as I said at the beginning, I cannot expect to get rid of such a mass of calumny all in a moment. And thus O men of Athens is the truth and the whole truth I have concealed nothing I have dissembled nothing And yet, I know that my plainness of speech makes them hate me and what is their hatred but a proof that I am speaking the truth?—Hence has arisen the prejudice against me and this is the reason of it, as you will find out either in this or in any future enquiry

I have said enough in my defence against the first class of my accusers I turn to the second class They are headed by Meletus, that good man and true lover of his country as he calls himself Against these, too I must try to make a defence —Let their affidavit be read it contains something of this kind It says that Socrates is a doer of evil who corrupts the youth and who does not believe in the gods of the state, but has other new divinities of his own Such is the charge and now let us examine the particular counts He says that I am a doer of evil and corrupt the youth but I say O men of Athens that Meletus is a doer of evil in that he pretends to be in earnest when he is only in jest, and is so eager to bring men to trial from a pretended zeal and interest about matters in which he really never had the smallest interest And the truth of this I will endeavour to prove to you

Come hither Meletus and let me ask a question of you You think a great deal about the improvement of youth?

Yes, I do

Tell the judges, then who is their improver for you must know as you have taken the pains to discover their corrupter and are citing and accusing me before them Speak then and tell the judges who their improver is —Observe, Meletus, that you are silent, and have nothing to say But is not this rather disgraceful and a very considerable proof of what I was saying that you have no interest in the matter? Speak up friend and tell us who their improver is

The laws

But that, my good sir is not my meaning I want to know who the person is, who in the first place, knows the laws

The judges, Socrates who are present in court.

What, do you mean to say Meletus, that they are able to instruct and improve youth?

Certainly they are

What, all of them or some only and not others?

All of them

By the goddess Here that is good news! There are plenty of improvers, [25] then And what do you say of the audience—do they improve them?

Yes they do

And the senators?

Yes the senators improve them

But perhaps the members of the assembly corrupt them?—or do they too improve them?

They improve them

Then every Athenian improves and elevates them all with the exception of myself and I alone am their corrupter? Is that what you affirm?

That is what I stoutly affirm

I am very unfortunate if you are right But suppose I ask you a question How about horses? Does one man do them harm and all the world good? Is not the exact opposite the truth? One man is able to do them good or at least not many—the trainer of horses that is to say does them good and others who have to do with them rather injure them? Is not that true Meletus of horses or of any other animals? Most assuredly it is whether you and Anytus say yes or no Happy indeed would be the condition of youth if they had one corrupter only and all the rest of the world were their improvers But you Meletus have sufficiently shown that you never had a thought about the young your carelessness is seen in your not caring about the very things which you bring against me

And now Meletus I will ask you another question—by Zeus I will Which is better to live among bad citizens or among good ones? Answer friend I say the question is one which may be easily answered Do not the good do their neighbours good and the bad do them evil?

Certainly

And is there any one who would rather be injured than benefited by those who live with him? Answer my good friend the law requires you to answer—does any one like to be injured?

Certainly not

And when you accuse me of corrupting and deteriorating the youth do you allege that I corrupt them intentionally or unintentionally?

Intentionally I say

But you have just admitted that the good do their neighbours good and evil do them evil Now is that a truth which your superior wisdom has recognized thus early in life and am I at my age in such darkness and ignorance as not to know that if a man with whom I have to live is corrupted by me I am very likely to be harmed by him and yet I corrupt him and intentionally too—so you say although neither I nor any other human being is ever likely to be convinced by you [26] But either I do not corrupt them or I corrupt them unintentionally and on either view of the case you lie If my offense is unintentional the law has no cognizance of unintentional offences you ought to have taken me privately and warned and admonished me for if I had been better advised I should have left off doing what I only did unintentionally—no doubt I should but you would have nothing to say to me and refused to teach me And now you bring me up in this court which is a place not of instruction but of punishment

It will be very clear to you Athenians, as I was saying that Meletus has no care at all, great or small about the matter But still I should like to know Meletus in what I am affirmed to corrupt the young I suppose you mean as I infer from your indictment that I teach them not to acknowledge the gods which the state acknowledges but some other new divinities or spiritual agencies in their stead These are the lessons by which I corrupt the youth as you say

Yes that I say emphatically

Then by the gods Meletus of whom we are speaking tell me and the court in somewhat plainer terms what you mean! for I do not as yet understand whether you affirm that I teach other men to acknowledge some gods, and therefore that I do believe in gods and am not an entire atheist—this you do not lay to my charge—but only you say that they are not the same gods which the city recognizes—the charge is that they are different gods Or do you mean that I am an atheist simply and a teacher of atheism?

I mean the latter—that you are a complete atheist

What an extraordinary statement! Why do you think so Meletus? Do you mean that I do not believe in the godhead of the sun or moon, like other men?

I assure you judges that he does not for he says that the sun is stone and the moon earth

Friend Meletus you think that you are accusing Anaxagoras and you have but a bad opinion of the judges if you fancy them illiterate to such a degree as not to know that these doctrines are found in the books of Anaxagoras the Clazomenian which are full of them And so forsooth the youth are said to be taught them by Socrates when there are not unfre quently exhibitions of them at the theatre (price of admission one drachma at the most) and they might pay their money and laugh at Socrates if he pretends to father these extraordinary views And so Meletus, you really think that I do not believe in any god?

I swear by Zeus that you believe absolutely in none at all

Nobody will believe you Meletus and I am pretty sure that you do not believe yourself I cannot help thinking men of Athens, that Meletus is reckless and impudent and that he has written this indictment in a spirit of mere wanton ss and youthful bravado [27] Has he not compounded a riddle th nking to try me? He said to h mself —I shall see whether the wise Socr tes ill d scover my facetious contrad c tion or whether I shall be able to deceive him and the rest of them For he certainly doe appear to me to contradict h mself in the ind ct ment as much as if he said that Socrates is guilty of not bel eving in the gods, and yet of bel ev ng in them—but this is not like a person who is in earnest.

I should l ke you O men of Athens to join me in examining what I concei e to be his in cons stency and do you Meletus, answer And I must remind the audience of my request that they ould not make a distu bance if I speak in my accustomed mann r

Did e er man Meletus believe in the exist ence of human things and not of human be ings? I w sh men of Athens that he vould ns er and not be always try ng to get up an interruption D d ever any man believe n ho semansh p and not in h rses? or in flute playin ar d not in flut players? No my f iend I will answer to you and to the court, as you refuse to answer for yourself There s no man who e er did But now please to ans ver the ext qu sti n Can a man bel eve n sp ritual and d ne agencies and not in pirits or demi gods?

He cann t

H l ky I am to h ve extracted that an swe by the as istan e of the court! But then you sw in the indictment that I teach and bel e in di ne o sp r tual a encies (new or ld no m tter for that) at any rate I bel eve in sp r tual agenci s—so you say and s ve r n the affid v t and yet f I bel e e in di ine be ings how can I help belie ing n sp r ts or dem g ds —must I n t? To be su e I must and the ef re I may assume that your silence gi es c sent Now what are spirits or demigods? ar th y not the gods or the sons of gods?

Certa nly they are

But this is what I call the facetious riddle in vented by you the demigods or spirits are gods and you say first that I do not believe in gods, and then again that I do believe in gods that is if I believe in demigods For if the demi gods are the illeg timate sons of gods, whether by the nymphs or by any other mothers, of whom they are said to be the sons—what hu man being will ever believe that there are no gods if they are the sons of gods? You might as well affirm the existence of mules and deny that of horses and asses Such nonsense Mele tus could only have been intended by you to make trial of me You have put this into the indictment because you had nothing real of which to accuse me But no one who has a par ticle of understanding will ever be convinc d by you that the same men can believe in divine and superhuman things and yet not believe that there are gods and demigods and heroes [28]

I ha e s id enough in answer to the charge of Meletus any elaborate defence is unneces sary but I kno v only too well how many are the enm ties which I have incurred and this is what will be my destruction if I am destroyed —not Meletus nor yet Anytus but the envy and detraction of the world which has been the death of many good men and will proba bly be the death of many more there is no danger of my being the last of them

Some one will say And are you not ashamed Socrates, of a course of life which is lik ely to bring you to an untimely end? To him I may fairly answ er There you are mistaken a man who is good for anything ought not to calcu late the chance of liv ng or dying he ought on ly to con der whether n doing anything he is do ng right or wrong—acting the part of a good man or of a bad Whereas upon your iew the heroes who fell at Troy ere not good for much an l the son of Thetis above all who altogether despised danger in comparison with d grace and when he vas so eager to slay Hector his goddess mother said to him that if he avenged his companion Patroclus and le Hector he would die h mself— Fate," he said in the e or the like words, waits for you n xt after Hector he recei ing this warn ng utter ly despised danger and death and instead of fearing them feared rather to live in di hon our and not to avenge his friend Let m d e forth ith he replies and be avenged of my enemy rather than ab le here by the beaked ships a laughing stock and a burden of the earth Had Achilles any thought of death and danger? For wherever a man s place is whether the place which he has chosen or that in which he has been placed by a commander, there he ought to remain in the hour of danger he should not think of death or of any thing but of disgrace And this, O men of Athens is a true saying

Strange indeed would be my conduct O men of Athens if I who when I was ordered by the generals whom you chose to command me at Potidaea and Amphipolis and Delium remained where they placed me like any other man facing death—if now when as I conceive and imagine God orders me to fulfil the philosopher s mission of searching into myself and other men I were to desert my post through fear of death, [29] or any other fear that would indeed be strange and I might justly be arraigned in court for denying the existence of the gods if I disobeyed the oracle because I was afraid of death fancying that I was wise when I was not wise For the fear of death is indeed the pretence of wisdom and not real wisdom being a pretence of knowing the unknown and no one knows whether death which men in their fear apprehend to be the greatest evil, may not be the greatest good Is not this ignorance of a disgraceful sort the ignorance which is the conceit that man knows what he does not know? And in this respect only I believe myself to differ from men in general and may perhaps claim to be wiser than they are —that whereas I know but little of the world below I do not suppose that I know but I do know that injustice and disobedience to a better whether God or man is evil and dishonourable and I will never fear or avoid a possible good rather than a certain evil And therefore if you let me go now and are not convinced by Anytus who said that since I had been prosecuted I must be put to death (or if not that I ought never to have been prosecuted at all) and that if I escape now your sons will all be utterly ruined by listening to my words—if you say to me Socrates this time we will not mind Anytus, and you shall be let off but upon one condition that you are not to enquire and speculate in this way any more, and that if you are caught doing so again you shall die —if this was the condition on which you let me go I should reply Men of Athens I honour and love you but I shall obey God rather than you and while I have life and strength I shall never cease from the practice and teaching of philosophy exhorting any one whom I meet and saying to him after my manner You my friend, —a citizen of the great and mighty and wise city of Athens —are you not ashamed of heaping up the greatest amount of money and honour and reputation and caring so little about wisdom and truth and the greatest improvement of the soul which you never regard or heed at all? And if the person with whom I am arguing says Yes but I do care then I do not leave him or let him go at once but I proceed to interrogate and examine and cross-examine him and if I think that he has no virtue in him but only says that he has I reproach him with undervaluing the greater, and overvaluing the less [30] And I shall repeat the same words to every one whom I meet young and old citizen and alien but especially to the citizens inasmuch as they are my brethren. For know that this is the command of God and I believe that no greater good has ever happened in the state than my service to the God For I do nothing but go about persuading you all old and young alike not to take thought for your persons or your properties but first and chiefly to care about the greatest improvement of the soul I tell you that virtue is not given by money but that from virtue comes money and every other good of man public as well as private This is my teaching and if this is the doctrine which corrupts the youth I am a mischievous person But if any one says that this is not my teaching he is speaking an untruth Wherefore O men of Athens I say to you do as Anytus bids or not as Anytus bids, and either acquit me or not but whichever you do understand that I shall never alter my ways, not even if I have to die many times

Men of Athens do not interrupt but hear me there was an understanding between us that you should hear me to the end I have something more to say at which you may be inclined to cry out but I believe that to hear me will be good for you and therefore I beg that you will not cry out I would have you know that if you kill such an one as I am you will injure yourselves more than you will injure me Nothing will injure me not Meletus nor yet Anytus—they cannot for a bad man is not permitted to injure a better than himself I do not deny that Anytus may perhaps kill him, or drive him into exile or deprive him of civil rights and he may imagine and others may imagine that he is inflicting a great injury upon him but there I do not agree For the evil of doing as he is doing—the evil of unjustly taking away the life of another—is greater far

And now Athenians, I am not going to argue for my own sake, as you may think, but for yours that you may not sin against the God by condemning me, who am his gift to you For if you kill me you will not easily find a successor to me who if I may use such a ludicrous figure of speech am a sort of gadfly given to the state by God and the state is a great and noble steed who is tardy in his motions owing to his very size, and requires to be stirred into life [31] I am that gadfly which God has attached to the state, and all day long and in all places am always fastening upon you arousing and persuading and reproaching you You will not easily find another like me, and therefore I would advise you to spare me I dare say that you may feel out of temper (like a person who is suddenly awakened from sleep) and you think that you might easily strike me dead as Anytus advises and then you would sleep on for the remainder of your lives unless God in his care of you sent you another gadfly When I say that I am given to you by God the proof of my mission is this —if I had been like other men, I should not have neglected all my own concerns or patiently seen the neglect of them during all these years and have been doing yours coming to you individually like a father or elder brother exhorting you to regard virtue such conduct, I say would be unlike human nature If I had gained anything, or if my exhortations had been paid there would have been some sense in my doing so but now as you will perceive not even the impudence of my accusers dares to say that I have ever exacted or sought pay of any one of that they have no witness And I have a sufficient witness to the truth of what I say—my poverty

Some one may wonder why I go about in private giving advice and busying myself with the concerns of others, but do not venture to come forward in public and advise the state I will tell you why You have heard me speak at sundry times and in divers places of an oracle or sign which comes to me, and is the divinity which Meletus ridicules in the indictment This sign which is a kind of voice first began to come to me when I was a child it always forbids but never commands me to do anything which I am going to do This is what deters me from being a politician And rightly as I think For I am certain, O men of Athens that if I had engaged in politics, I should have perished long ago, and done no good either to you or to myself And do not be offended at my telling you the truth for the truth is, that no man who goes to war with you or any other multitude, honestly striving against the many lawless and unrighteous deeds which are done in a state, [32] will save his life he who will fight for the right if he would live even for a brief space, must have a private station and not a public one

I can give you convincing evidence of what I say not words only but what you value far more—actions Let me relate to you a passage of my own life which will prove to you that I should never have yielded to injustice from any fear of death and that as I should have refused to yield I must have died at once. I will tell you a tale of the courts not very interesting perhaps, but nevertheless true. The only office of state which I ever held O men of Athens, was that of senator the tribe Antiochis, which is my tribe had the presidency at the trial of the generals who had not taken up the bodies of the slain after the battle of Arginusae and you proposed to try them in a body contrary to law as you all thought afterwards but at the time I was the only one of the Prytanes who was opposed to the illegality and I gave my vote against you and when the orators threatened to impeach and arrest me, and you called and shouted I made up my mind that I would run the risk having law and justice with me, rather than take part in your injustice because I feared imprisonment and death This happened in the days of the democracy But when the oligarchy of the Thirty was in power they sent for me and four others into the rotunda and bade us bring Leon the Salaminian from Salamis, as they wanted to put him to death This was a specimen of the sort of commands which they were always giving with the view of implicating as many as possible in their crimes and then I showed not in word only but in deed that, if I may be allowed to use such an expression I cared not a straw for death, and that my great and only care was lest I should do an unrighteous or unholy thing For the strong arm of that oppressive power did not frighten me into doing wrong and when we came out of the rotunda the other four went to Salamis and fetched Leon, but I went quietly home For which I might have lost my life, had not the power of the Thirty shortly afterwards come to an end And many will witness to my words

Now do you really imagine that I could have survived all these years, if I had led a public life, supposing that like a good man I had always maintained the right and had made justice, as I ought the first thing? No indeed men of Athens neither I nor any other man [33] But I have been always the same in all my actions, public as well as private and never have I yielded any base compliance to those who are slanderously termed my disciples or to any other Not that I have any regular disciples But if any one likes to come and hear me while I am pursuing my mission whether he be young or old he is not excluded Nor do I converse only with those who pay but any one whether he be rich or poor may ask and answer me and listen to my words and whether he turns out to be a bad man or a good one neither result can be justly imputed to me for I never taught or professed to teach him anything And if any one says that he has ever learned or heard anything from me in private which all the world has not heard let me tell you that he is lying

But I shall be asked Why do people delight in continually conversing with you? I have told you already, Athenians the whole truth about this matter they like to hear the cross examination of the pretenders to wisdom there is amusement in it Now this duty of cross examining other men has been imposed upon me by God and has been signified to me by oracles visions and in every way in which the will of divine power was ever intimated to any one This is true O Athenians or if not true would be soon refuted If I am or have been corrupting the youth those of them who are now grown up and become sensible that I gave them bad advice in the days of their youth should come forward as accusers and take their revenge or if they do not like to come themselves some of their relatives fathers brothers or other kinsmen should say what evil their families have suffered at my hands Now is their time Many of them I see in the court There is Crito who is of the same age and of the same deme with myself and there is Critobulus his son whom I also see Then again there is Lysanias of Sphettus who is the father of Aeschines—he is present and also there is Antiphon of Cephisus who is the father of Epigenes and there are the brothers of several who have associated with me There is Nicostratus the son of Theosdotides and the brother of Theodotus (now Theodotus himself is dead and therefore he at any rate will not seek to stop him) and there is Paralus the son of Demodocus who had a brother Theages and Adeimantus the son of Ariston [34] whose brother Plato is present and Aeantodorus who is the brother of Apollodorus whom I also see I might mention a great many others some of whom Meletus should have produced as witnesses in the course of his speech and let him still produce them if he has forgotten—I will make way for him And let him say if he has any testimony of the sort which he can produce Nay Athenians the very opposite is the truth For all these are ready to witness on behalf of the corrupter of the injurer of their kindred as Meletus and Anytus call me not the corrupted youth only—there might have been a motive for that—but their uncorrupted elder relatives Why should they too support me with their testimony? Why indeed except for the sake of truth and justice and because they know that I am speaking the truth and that Meletus is a liar

Well Athenians this and the like of this is all the defence which I have to offer Yet a word more Perhaps there may be some one who is offended at me when he calls to mind how he himself on a similar or even a less serious occasion prayed and entreated the judges with many tears and how he produced his children in court which was a moving spectacle, together with a host of relations and friends whereas I who am probably in danger of my life, will do none of these things The contrast may occur to his mind and he may be set against me and vote in anger because he is displeased at me on this account Now if there be such a person among you—mind I do not say that there is—to him I may fairly reply My friend, I am a man and like other men a creature of flesh and blood and not of wood or stone as Homer says and I have a family yes, and sons, O Athenians three in number one almost a man and two others who are still young and yet I will not bring any of them hither in order to petition you for an acquittal And why not? Not from any self assertion or want of respect for you Whether I am or am not afraid of death is another question of which I will not now speak But having regard to public opinion I feel that such conduct would be discreditable to myself and to you and to the whole state One who has reached my years and who has a name for wisdom ought not to demean himself Whether this opinion of me be deserved or not, at any rate the world has decided that Socrates is in some way superior to other men [35] And if those among you who are said to be superior in wisdom and courage and any other virtue demean themselves in this way how shameful is their conduct! I have seen men of reputation when they have been condemned behaving in the strangest manner they seemed to fancy that they were going to suffer something dreadful if they died and that they could be immortal if you only allowed them to live and I think that such are a dishonour to the state, and that any stranger coming in would have said of them that the most eminent men of Athens, to whom the Athenians themselves give honour and command are no better than women And I say that these things ought not to be done by those of us who have a reputation and if they are done, you ought not to permit them you ought rather to show that you are far more disposed to condemn the man who gets up a doleful scene and makes the city ridiculous, than him who holds his peace.

But, setting aside the question of public opinion, there seems to be something wrong in asking a favour of a judge, and thus procuring an acquittal instead of informing and convincing him For his duty is, not to make a present of justice, but to give judgment and he has sworn that he will judge according to the laws, and not according to his own good pleasure and we ought not to encourage you, nor should you allow yourself to be encouraged, in this habit of perjury—there can be no piety in that. Do not then require me to do what I consider dishonourable and impious and wrong especially now when I am being tried for impiety on the indictment of Meletus. For if, O men of Athens, by force of persuasion and entreaty I could overpower your oaths, then I should be teaching you to believe that there are no gods, and in defending should simply convict myself of the charge of not believing in them But that is not so—far otherwise. For I do believe that there are gods and in a sense higher than that in which any of my accusers believe in them And to you and to God I commit my cause, to be determined by you as is best for you and me.

There are many reasons why I am not grieved O men of Athens, at the vote of condemnation [36] I expected it, and am only surprised that the votes are so nearly equal for I had thought that the majority against me would have been far larger but now had thirty votes gone over to the other side, I should have been acquitted. And I may say I think, that I have escaped Meletus. I may say more for without the assistance of Anytus and Lycon, any one may see that he would not have had a fifth part of the votes, as the law requires, in which case he would have incurred a fine of a thousand drachmae

And so he proposes death as the penalty And what shall I propose on my part, O men of Athens? Clearly that which is my due. And what is my due? What return shall be made to the man who has never had the wit to be idle during his whole life but has been careless of what the many care for—wealth and family interests and military offices, and speaking in the assembly and magistracies and plots, and parties Reflecting that I was really too honest a man to be a politician and live, I did not go where I could do no good to you or to myself but where I could do the greatest good privately to every one of you, thither I went, and sought to persuade every man among you that he must look to himself and seek virtue and wisdom before he looks to his private interests, and look to the state before he looks to the interests of the state and that this should be the order which he observes in all his actions What shall be done to such an one? Doubtless some good thing O men of Athens, if he has his reward and the good should be of a kind suitable to him What would be a reward suitable to a poor man who is your benefactor and who desires leisure that he may instruct you There can be no reward so fitting as maintenance in the Prytaneum, O men of Athens a reward which he deserves far more than the citizen who has won the prize at Olympia in the horse or chariot race, whether the chariots were drawn by two horses or by many For I am in want, and he has enough and he only gives you the appearance of happiness and I give you the reality And if I am to estimate the penalty fairly I should say that maintenance in the Prytaneum is the just return [37]

Perhaps you think that I am braving you in what I am saying now as in what I said before about the tears and prayers But this is not so I speak rather because I am convinced that I never intentionally wronged any one, although I cannot convince you—the time has been too short if there were a law at Athens, as there is in other cities, that a capital cause should not be decided in one day then I believe that I should have convinced you But I cannot in a moment refute great slanders and as I am convinced that I never wronged another I will assuredly not wrong myself I will not say of myself that I deserve any evil, or propose any penalty Why should I? Because I am afraid of the penalty of death which Meletus proposes? When I do not know whether death is a good or an evil why should I propose a penalty which would certainly be an evil? Shall I say imprisonment? And why should I live in prison, and of Athens neither I nor any other man [33] But I have been always the same in all my actions public as well as private and never have I yielded any base compliance to those who are slanderously termed my disciples or to any other Not that I have any regular disciples But if any one likes to come and hear me while I am pursuing my mission whether he be young or old he is not excluded Nor do I converse only with those who pay but any one whether he be rich or poor may ask and answer me and listen to my words and whether he turns out to be a bad man or a good one neither result can be justly imputed to me for I never taught or professed to teach him anything And if any one says that he has ever learned or heard anything from me in private which all the world has not heard let me tell you that he is lying

cusers of you than there are now; accusers whom hitherto I have restrained: and as they are younger they will be more inconsiderate with you, and you will be more offended at them. If you think that by killing men you can prevent some one from censuring your evil lives, you are mistaken; that is not a way of escape which is either possible or honourable; the easiest and the noblest way is not to be disabling others, but to be improving yourselves. This is the prophecy which I utter before my departure to the judges who have condemned me.

Friends, who would have acquitted me, I would like also to talk with you about the thing which has come to pass, while the magistrates are busy, and before I go to the place at which I must die. Stay then a little, for we may as well talk with one another while there is time. [40] You are my friends, and I should like to show you the meaning of this event which has happened to me. O my judges—for you I may truly call judges—I should like to tell you of a wonderful circumstance. Hitherto the divine faculty of which the internal oracle is the source has constantly been in the habit of opposing me even about trifles, if I was going to make a slip or error in any matter; and now as you see there has come upon me that which may be thought, and is generally believed to be, the last and worst evil. But the oracle made no sign of opposition, either when I was leaving my house in the morning, or when I was on my way to the court, or while I was speaking at anything which I was going to say; and yet I have often been stopped in the middle of a speech, but now in nothing I either said or did touching the matter in hand has the oracle opposed me. What do I take to be the explanation of this silence? I will tell you. It is an intimation that what has happened to me is a good, and that those of us who think that death is an evil are in error. For the customary sign would surely have opposed me had I been going to evil and not to good.

Let us reflect in another way, and we shall see that there is great reason to hope that death is a good; for one of two things—either death is a state of nothingness and utter unconsciousness, or, as men say, there is a change and migration of the soul from this world to another. Now if you suppose that there is no consciousness, but a sleep like the sleep of him who is undisturbed even by dreams, death will be an unspeakable gain. For if a person were to select the night in which his sleep was undisturbed even by dreams, and were to compare with this the other days and nights of his life, and then were to tell us how many days and nights he had passed in the course of his life better and more pleasantly than this one, I think that any man, I will not say a private man, but even the great king will not find many such days or nights, when compared with the others. Now if death be of such a nature, I say that to die is gain; for eternity is then only a single night. But if death is the journey to another place, and there, as men say, all the dead abide, what good, O my friends and judges, can be greater than this? If indeed when the pilgrim arrives in the world below, [41] he is delivered from the professors of justice in this world, and finds the true judges who are said to give judgment there, Minos and Rhadamanthus and Aeacus and Triptolemus, and other sons of God who were righteous in their own life, that pilgrimage will be worth making. What would not a man give if he might converse with Orpheus and Musaeus and Hesiod and Homer? Nay, if this be true, let me die again and again. I myself, too, shall have a wonderful interest in there meeting and conversing with Palamedes, and Ajax the son of Telamon, and any other ancient hero who has suffered death through an unjust judgment; and there will be no small pleasure, as I think, in comparing my own sufferings with theirs. Above all, I shall then be able to continue my search into true and false knowledge; as in this world, so also in the next; and I shall find out who is wise, and who pretends to be wise, and is not. What would not a man give, O judges, to be able to examine the leader of the great Trojan expedition; or Odysseus or Sisyphus, or numberless others, men and women too! What infinite delight would there be in conversing with them and asking them questions! In another world they do not put a man to death for asking questions: assuredly not. For besides being happier than we are, they will be immortal, if what is said is true.

Wherefore, O judges, be of good cheer about death, and know of a certainty, that no evil can happen to a good man, either in life or after death. He and his are not neglected by the gods; nor has my own approaching end happened by mere chance. But I see clearly that the time had arrived when it was better for me to die and be released from trouble; wherefore the oracle gave no sign. For which reason, also, I am not angry with my condemners, or with my accusers; they have done me no harm, although be the slave of the magistrates of the year—of the Eleven? Or shall the penalty be a fine and imprisonment until the fine is paid? There is the same objection I should have to lie in pris on for money I have none and cannot pay And if I say exile (and this may possibly be the pen alty which you will affix) I must indeed be blinded by the love of life if I am so irrational as to expect that when you who are my own citizens cannot endure my discourses and words and have found them so grievous and odious that you will have no more of them oth ers are likely to endure me No indeed men of Athens that is not very likely And what a life should I lead, at my age wandering from city to city ever changing my place of exile and al ways being driven out! For I am quite sure that wherever I go there as here the young men will flock to me and if I drive them away their elders will drive me out at their request and if I let them come their fathers and friends will drive me out for their sakes

Some one will say Yes Socrates, but cannot you hold your tongue and then you may go into a foreign city and no one will interfere with you? Now I have great difficulty in mak ing you understand my answer to this For if I tell you that to do as you say would be a dis-obedience to the God and therefore that I can not hold my tongue [38] you will not believe that I am serious and if I say again that daily to discourse about virtue and of those other things about which you hear me examining myself and others is the greatest good of man and that the unexamined life is not worth liv ing you are still less likely to believe me Yet I say what is true although a thing of which it is hard for me to persuade you Also I have never been accustomed to think that I deserve to suffer any harm Had I money I might have estimated the offence at what I was able to pay and not have been much the worse But I have none and therefore I must ask you to propor tion the fine to my means Well perhaps I could afford a mina and therefore I propose that penalty Plato Crito Critobulus and Apol lodorus my friends here bid me say thirty mi nae and they will be the sureties Let thirty mi nae be the penalty for which sum they will be ample security to you

Not much time will be gained O Athenians in return for the evil name which you will get from the detractors of the city who will say that you killed Socrates a wise man for they will call me wise even although I am not wise, when they want to reproach you If you had waited a little while your desire would have been ful-filled in the course of nature For I am far ad-vanced in years as you may perceive and not far from death I am speaking now not to all of you but only to those who have condemned me to death And I have another thing to say to them You think that I was convicted because I had no words of the sort which would have procured my acquittal—I mean if I had thought fit to leave nothing undone or unsaid Not so the deficiency which led to my conviction was not of words—certainly not But I had not the boldness or impudence or inclination to address you as you would have liked me to do weeping and wailing and lamenting and saying and doing many things which you have been ac customed to hear from others, and which as I maintain are unworthy of me I thought at the time that I ought not to do anything common or mean when in danger nor do I now repent of the style of my defence I would rather die having spoken after my manner than speak in your manner and live For neither in war nor yet at law ought I or any man to use every way of escaping death [39] Often in battle there can be no doubt that if a man will throw away his arms and fall on his knees before his pur suers he may escape death and in other dan gers there are other ways of escaping death if a man is willing to say and do anything The difficulty my friends is not to avoid death but to avoid unrighteousness for that runs faster than death I am old and move slowly and the slower runner has overtaken me and my ac cusers are keen and quick and the faster run-ner who is unrighteousness has overtaken them And now I depart hence condemned by you to suffer the penalty of death,—they too go their ways condemned by the truth to suffer the penalty of villainy and wrong and I must abide by my award—let them abide by theirs. I suppose that these things may be regarded as fated —and I think that they are well

And now O men who have condemned me, I would fain prophesy to you for I am about to die and in the hour of death men are gifted with prophetic power And I prophesy to you who are my murderers that immediately after my departure punishment far heavier than you have inflicted on me will surely await you Me you have killed because you wanted to escape the accuser and not to give an account of your lives But that will not be as you suppose far otherwise For I say that there will be more ac

CRITO

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES, CRITO. Scene: The Prison of Socrates

[43] Socrates. WHY have you come at this hour, Crito? it must be quite early?

Crito. Yes, certainly.

Soc. What is the exact time?

Cr. The dawn is breaking.

Soc. I wonder that the keeper of the prison would let you in.

Cr. He knows me, because I often come, Socrates; moreover I have done him a kindness.

Soc. And are you only just arrived?

Cr. No, I came some time ago.

Soc. Then why did you sit and say nothing, instead of at once awakening me?

Cr. I should not have liked myself, Socrates, to be in such great trouble and unrest as you are—indeed I should not: I have been watching with amazement your peaceful slumbers; and for that reason I did not awake you, because I wished to minimize the pain. I have always thought you to be of a happy disposition; but never did I see anything like the easy, tranquil manner in which you bear this calamity.

Soc. Why, Crito, when a man has reached my age he ought not to be repining at the approach of death.

Cr. And yet other old men find themselves in similar misfortunes, and age does not prevent them from repining.

Soc. That is true. But you have not told me why you come at this early hour.

Cr. I come to bring you a message which is sad and painful; not, as I believe, to yourself, but to all of us who are your friends, and saddest of all to me.

Soc. What? Has the ship come from Delos, on the arrival of which I am to die?

Cr. No, the ship has not actually arrived, but she will probably be here to-day, as persons who have come from Sunium tell me that they left her there; and therefore to-morrow, Socrates, will be the last day of your life.

Soc. Very well, Crito; if such is the will of God, I am willing; but my belief is that there will be a delay of a day.

[44] Cr. Why do you think so?

Soc. I will tell you. I am to die on the day after the arrival of the ship.

Cr. Yes; that is what the authorities say.

Soc. But I do not think that the ship will be here until to-morrow; this I infer from a vision which I had last night, or rather only just now, when you fortunately allowed me to sleep.

Cr. And what was the nature of the vision?

Soc. There appeared to me the likeness of a woman, fair and comely, clothed in bright raiment, who called to me and said: O Socrates,

The third day hence to fertile Phthia shalt thou go.

Cr. What a singular dream, Socrates!

Soc. There can be no doubt about the meaning, Crito, I think.

Cr. Yes; the meaning is only too clear. But, oh! my beloved Socrates, let me entreat you once more to take my advice and escape. For if you die I shall not only lose a friend who can never be replaced, but there is another evil: people who do not know you and me will believe that I might have saved you if I had been willing to give money, but that I did not care. Now, can there be a worse disgrace than this—that I should be thought to value money more than the life of a friend? For the many will not be persuaded that I wanted you to escape, and that you refused.

they did not mean to do me any good and for this I may gently blame them

Still I have a favour to ask of them When my sons are grown up I would ask you O my friends to punish them and I would have you trouble them as I have troubled you if they seem to care about riches or anything more than about virtue or if they pretend to be something when they are really nothing —then reprove them as I have reproved you, for not caring about that for which they ought to care, and thinking that they are something when they are really nothing [42] And if you do this, both I and my sons will have received justice at your hands

The hour of departure has arrived and we go our ways—I to die and you to live. Which is better God only knows condemned? And has the argument which was once good now proved to be talk for the sake of talking—mere childish nonsense? That is what I want to consider with your help, Crito:—whether, under my present circumstances, the argument appears to be in any way different or not; and is to be allowed by me or disallowed. That argument, which, as I believe, is maintained by many persons of authority, was to the effect, as I was saying, that the opinions of some men are to be regarded, and of other men not to be regarded. Now you, Crito, are not going to die to-morrow—at least, [47] there is no human probability of this—and therefore you are disinterested and not liable to be deceived by the circumstances in which you are placed. Tell me then, whether I am right in saying that some opinions, and the opinions of some men only, are to be valued, and that other opinions, and the opinions of other men, are not to be valued. I ask you whether I was right in maintaining this?

Cr. Certainly.

Soc. The good are to be regarded, and not the bad?

Cr. Yes.

Soc. And the opinions of the wise are good, and the opinions of the unwise are evil?

Cr. Certainly.

Soc. And what was said about another matter? Is the pupil who devotes himself to the practice of gymnastics supposed to attend to the praise and blame and opinion of every man, or of one man only—his physician or trainer, whoever he may be?

Cr. Of one man only.

Soc. And he ought to fear the censure and welcome the praise of that one only, and not of the many?

Cr. Clearly so.

Soc. And he ought to act and train, and eat and drink in the way which seems good to his single master who has understanding, rather than according to the opinion of all other men put together?

Cr. True.

Soc. And if he disobeys and disregards the opinion and approval of the one, and regards the opinion of the many who have no understanding, will he not suffer evil?

Cr. Certainly he will.

Soc. And what will the evil be, whither tending and what affecting, in the disobedient person?

Cr. Clearly, affecting the body; that is what is destroyed by the evil.

Soc. Very good; and is not this true, Crito, of other things which we need not separately enumerate? In questions of just and unjust, fair and foul, good and evil, which are the subjects of our present consultation, ought we to follow the opinion of the many and to fear them; or the opinion of the one man who has understanding? ought we not to fear and reverence him more than all the rest of the world: and if we desert him shall we not destroy and injure that principle in us which may be assumed to be improved by justice and deteriorated by injustice;—there is such a principle?

Cr. Certainly there is, Socrates.

Soc. Take a parallel instance:—if, acting under the advice of those who have no understanding, we destroy that which is improved by health and is deteriorated by disease, would life be worth having? And that which has been destroyed is—the body?

Cr. Yes.

Soc. Could we live, having an evil and corrupted body?

Cr. Certainly not.

Soc. And will life be worth having, if that higher part of man be destroyed, which is improved by justice and depraved by injustice? Do we suppose that principle, [48] whatever it may be in man, which has to do with justice and injustice, to be inferior to the body?

Cr. Certainly not.

Soc. More honourable than the body?

Cr. Far more.

Soc. Then, my friend, we must not regard what the many say of us: but what he, the one man who has understanding of just and unjust, will say, and what the truth will say. And therefore you begin in error when you advise that we should regard the opinion of the many about just and unjust, good and evil, honourable and dishonourable.—"Well," some one will say, "but the many can kill us."

Cr. Yes, Socrates; that will clearly be the answer.

Soc. And it is true: but still I find with surprise that the old argument is unshaken as ever. And I should like to know whether I may say the same of another proposition—that not life, but a good life, is to be chiefly valued?

Cr. Yes, that also remains unshaken.

Soc. And a good life is equivalent to a just and honourable one—that holds also?

Cr. Yes, it does.

Soc. From these premisses I proceed to argue the question whether I ought or ought not to try and escape without the consent of the

Soc But why my dear Crito should we care about the opinion of the many? Good men and they are the only persons who are worth considering will think of these things truly as they occurred

Cr But you see Socrates that the opinion of the many must be regarded for what is now happening shows that they can do the greatest evil to any one who has lost their good opinion

Soc I only wish it were so Crito and that the many could do the greatest evil for then they would also be able to do the greatest good —and what a fine thing this would be! But in reality they can do neither for they cannot make a man either wise or foolish and whatever they do is the result of chance

Cr Well I will not dispute with you but please to tell me Socrates whether you are not acting out of regard to me and your other friends are you not afraid that if you escape from prison we may get into trouble with the informers for having stolen you away and lose either the whole or a great part of our property or that even a worse evil may happen to us? [45] Now if you fear on our account be at ease for in order to save you we ought surely to run this or even a greater risk be persuaded then and do as I say

Soc Yes Crito that is one fear which you mention but by no means the only one

Cr Fear not—there are persons who are willing to get you out of prison at no great cost and as for the informers they are far from being exorbitant in their demands—a little money will satisfy them My means which are certainly ample are at your service and if you have a scruple about spending all mine here are strangers who will give you the use of theirs and one of them Simmias the Theban has brought a large sum of money for this very purpose and Cebes and many others are prepared to spend their money in helping you to escape I say therefore do not hesitate on our account and do not say as you did in the court that you will have a difficulty in knowing what to do with yourself anywhere else For men will love you in other places to which you may go and not in Athens only there are friends of mine in Thessaly if you like to go to them who will value and protect you and no Thessalian will give you any trouble Nor can I think that you are at all justified Socrates in betraying your own life when you might be saved in acting thus you are playing into the hands of your enemies who are hurrying on your destruction And further I should say that you are deserting your own children for you might bring them up and educate them instead of which you go away and leave them, and they will have to take their chance and if they do not meet with the usual fate of orphans there will be small thanks to you No man should bring children into the world who is unwilling to persevere to the end in their nurture and education But you appear to be choosing the easier part not the better and manlier which would have been more becoming in one who professes to care for virtue in all his actions like yourself And indeed I am ashamed not only of you but of us who are your friends when I reflect that the whole business will be attributed entirely to our want of courage The trial need never have come on, or might have been managed differently and this last act or crowning folly will seem to have occurred through our negligence and cowardice who might have saved you [46] if we had been good for anything and you might have saved yourself for there was no difficulty at all See now Socrates how sad and discreditable are the consequences both to us and you. Make up your mind then or rather have your mind already made up for the time of deliberation is over and there is only one thing to be done which must be done this very night, and if we delay at all will be no longer practicable or possible I beseech you therefore Socrates, be persuaded by me and do as I say

Soc Dear Crito your zeal is invaluable if a right one but if wrong the greater the zeal the greater the danger and therefore we ought to consider whether I shall or shall not do as you say For I am and always have been one of those natures who must be guided by reason, whatever the reason may be which upon reflection appears to me to be the best and now that this chance has befallen me I cannot repudiate my own words the principles which I have hitherto honoured and revered I still honour and unless we can at once find other and better principles I am certain not to agree with you no not even if the power of the multitude could inflict many more imprisonments, confiscations deaths frightening us like children with hobgoblin terrors What will be the fairest way of considering the question? Shall I return to your old argument about the opinions of men?—we were saying that some of them are to be regarded and others not Now were we right in maintaining this before I was one, and especially a rhetorician will have a good deal to say on behalf of the law which requires a sentence to be carried out. He will argue that this law should not be set aside and shall we reply Yes but the state has injured us and given an unjust sentence. Suppose I say that?

Cr Very good Socrates

Soc And was that our agreement with you? the law would answer or were you to abide by the sentence of the state? And if I were to express my astonishment at their words, the law would probably add "Answer Socrates, instead of opening your eyes—you are in the habit of asking and answering questions Tell us—What complaint have you to make against us which justifies you in attempting to destroy us and the state? In the first place did we not bring you into existence? Your father married your mother by our aid and begat you Say whether you have any objection to urge against those of us who regulate marriage? None I should reply Or against those of us who after birth regulate the nurture and education of children in which you also were trained? Were not the laws, which have the charge of education, right in commanding your father to train you in music and gymnastic? Right, I should reply Well then since you were brought into the world and nurtured and educated by us, can you deny in the first place that you are our child and slave as your fathers were before you? And if this is true you are not on equal terms with us nor can you think that you have a right to do to us what we are doing to you Would you have any right to strike or revile or do any other evil to your father or your master if you had one because you have been struck or reviled by him, or received some other evil at his hands?—you would not say this? [51] And because we think right to destroy you do you think that you have any right to destroy us in return, and your country as far as in you lies? Will you, O professor of true virtue, pretend that you are justified in this? Has a philosopher like you failed to discover that our country is more to be valued and higher and holier far than mother or father or any ancestor and more to be regarded in the eyes of the gods and of men of understanding? also to be soothed and gently and reverently entreated when angry even more than a father and either to be persuaded or if not persuaded to be obeyed? And when we are punished by her whether with imprisonment or stripes, the punishment is to be endured in silence and if she leads us to wounds or death in battle, thither we follow as is right neither may any one yield or retreat or leave his rank but whether in battle or in a court of law or in any other place he must do what his city and his country order him or he must change their view of what is just and if he may do no violence to his father or mother much less may he do violence to his country What answer shall we make to this Crito? Do the laws speak truly or do they not?

Cr I think that they do

Soc Then the laws will say "Consider Socrates, if we are speaking truly that in your present attempt you are going to do us an injury For having brought you into the world and nurtured and educated you, and given you and every other citizen a share in every good which we had to give we further proclaim to any Athenian by the liberty which we allow him that if he does not like us when he has become of age and has seen the ways of the city and made our acquaintance he may go where he pleases and take his goods with him None of us laws will forbid him or interfere with him Any one who does not like us and the city and who wants to emigrate to a colony or to any other city may go where he likes retaining his property But he who has experience of the manner in which we order justice and administer the state and still remains has entered into an implied contract that he will do as we command him. And he who disobeys us is, as we maintain, thrice wrong first, because in disobeying us he is disobeying his parents secondly because we are the authors of his education thirdly because he has made an agreement with us that he will duly obey our commands [52] and he neither obeys them nor convinces us that our commands are unjust and we do not rudely impose them but give him the alternative of obeying or convincing us—that is what we offer and he does neither

"These are the sort of accusations to which as we were saying you, Socrates, will be exposed if you accomplish your intentions you above all other Athenians Suppose now I ask, why I rather than anybody else? they will justly retort upon me that I above all other men have acknowledged the agreement. There is clear proof" they will say Socrates that we and the city were not displeasing to you Of all Athenians you have been the most constant resident in the city which as you never leave you may be supposed to love[1] For you never

[1] Cf. Phaedrus 230.

Athenians and if I am clearly right in escaping then I will make the attempt but if not I will abstain The other considerations which you mention of money and loss of character and the duty of educating one s children are I fear only the doctrines of the multitude who would be as ready to restore people to life if they were able as they are to put them to death—and with as little reason But now since the argument has thus far prevailed the only question which remains to be considered is whether we shall do rightly either in escaping or in suffering others to aid in our escape and paying them in money and thanks or whether in reality we shall not do rightly and if the latter then death or any other calamity which may ensue on my remaining here must not be allowed to enter into the calculation

Cr I think that you are right Socrates how then shall we proceed?

Soc Let us consider the matter together and do you either refute me if you can and I will be convinced or else cease my dear friend from repeating to me that I ought to escape against the wishes of the Athenians for I highly value your attempts to persuade me to do so but I may not be persuaded against my own better judgment [49] And now please to consider my first position and try how you can best answer me

Cr I will

Soc Are we to say that we are never intentionally to do wrong or that in one way we ought and in another we ought not to do wrong or is doing wrong always evil and dishonourable as I was just now saying and as has been already acknowledged by us? Are all our former admissions which were made within a few days to be thrown away? And have we at our age been earnestly discoursing with one another all our life long only to discover that we are no better than children? Or in spite of the opinion of the many and in spite of consequences whether better or worse shall we insist on the truth of what was then said that injustice is always an evil and dishonour to him who acts unjustly? Shall we say so or not?

Cr Yes

Soc Then we must do no wrong?

Cr Certainly not

Soc Nor when injured injure in return as the many imagine for we must injure no one at all?

Cr Clearly not

Soc Again Crito may we do evil?

Cr Surely not Socrates

Soc And what of doing evil in return for evil which is the morality of the many—is that just or not?

Cr Not just

Soc For doing evil to another is the same as injuring him?

Cr Very true

Soc Then we ought not to retaliate or render evil for evil to any one whatever evil we may have suffered from him But I would have you consider Crito whether you really mean what you are saying For this opinion has never been held and never will be held by any considerable number of persons and those who are agreed and those who are not agreed upon this point have no common ground and can only despise one another when they see how widely they differ Tell me then whether you agree with and assent to my first principle that neither injury nor retaliation nor warding off evil by evil is ever right And shall that be the premiss of our argument? Or do you decline and dissent from this? For so I have ever thought and continue to think but if you are of another opinion let me hear what you have to say If however you remain of the same mind as formerly I will proceed to the next step

Cr You may proceed for I have not changed my mind

Soc Then I will go on to the next point, which may be put in the form of a question — Ought a man to do what he admits to be right, or ought he to betray the right?

Cr He ought to do what he thinks right

Soc But if this is true what is the application? In leaving the prison against the will of the Athenians [50] do I wrong any? or rather do I not wrong those whom I ought least to wrong? Do I not desert the principles which were acknowledged by us to be just—what do you say?

Cr I cannot tell Socrates for I do not know

Soc Then consider the matter in this way — Imagine that I am about to play truant (you may call the proceeding by any name which you like) and the laws and the government come and interrogate me Tell us Socrates, they say what are you about? are you not going by an act of yours to overturn us—the laws and the whole state as far as in you lies? Do you imagine that a state can subsist and not be overthrown in which the decisions of law have no power but are set aside and trampled upon by individuals? What will be our answer Crito to these and the like words? Any one, and especially a rhetorician, will have a good deal to say on behalf of the law which requires a sentence to be carried out. He will argue that this law should not be set aside; and shall we reply, 'Yes; but the state has injured us and given an unjust sentence.' Suppose I say that?

Cr. Very good, Socrates.

Soc. 'And was that our agreement with you?' the law would answer; 'or were you to abide by the sentence of the state?' And if I were to express my astonishment at their words, the law would probably add: 'Answer, Socrates, instead of opening your eyes—you are in the habit of asking and answering questions. Tell us,—What complaint have you to make against us which justifies you in attempting to destroy us and the state? In the first place did we not bring you into existence? What answer shall we make to this, Crito? Do the laws speak truly, or do they not?

Cr. I think that they do.

Soc. Then the laws will say: 'Consider, Socrates, if we are speaking truly that in your present attempt you are going to do us an injury. For, having brought you into the world, and nurtured and educated you, and given you and every other citizen a share in every good which we had to give, we further proclaim to any Athenian by the liberty which we allow him, that if he does not like us when he has become of age and has seen the ways of the city, and made our acquaintance, he may go where he pleases and take his goods with him. None of us laws will forbid him or interfere with him. Any one who does not like us and the city, and who wants to emigrate to a colony or to any other city, may go where he likes, retaining his property. went out of the city either to see the games except once when you went to the Isthmus, or to any other place unless when you were on military service nor did you travel as other men do Nor had you any curiosity to know other states or their laws your affections did not go beyond us and our state we were your special favourites and you acquiesced in our government of you and here in this city you begat your children which is a proof of your satisfaction Moreover you might in the course of the trial if you had liked have fixed the penalty at banishment the state which refuses to let you go now would have let you go then But you pretended that you preferred death to exile and that you were not unwilling to die And now you have forgotten these fine senti m nts and pay no respect to us the laws of whom you are the destroyer and are doing what only a miserable slave would do running away and turning your back upon the com pacts and agreements which you made as a citizen And first of all answer this very question Are we right in saying that you agreed to be governed according to us in deed and not in word only? Is that true or not? How shall we answer Crito? Must we not assent?

Cr We cannot help it Socrates

Soc Then will they not say You Socrates are breaking the covenants and agreements which you made with us at your leisure not in any haste or under any compulsion or decep tion but after you have had seventy years to think of them during which time you were at liberty to leave the city if we were not to your mind or if our covenants appeared to you to be unfair You had your choice and might have gone either to Lacedaemon or Crete both which states are often praised by you for their good government [53] or to some other Hel lenic or foreign state Whereas you above all other Athenians seemed to be so fond of the state or in other words of us her laws (and who would care about a state which has no laws?) that you never stirred out of her the halt the blind the maimed were not more sta tionary in her than you were And now you run away and forsake your agreements Not so Socrates if you will take our advice do not make yourself ridiculous by escaping out of the city

For just consider if you transgress and err in this sort of way what good will you do either to yourself or to your friends? That your friends will be driven into exile and deprived of citizenship, or will lose their property is tolerably certain and you yourself if you fly to one of the neighbouring cities as for ex ample Thebes or M gara both of which are well governed will come to them as an enemy Socrates and their government will be gainst you and all patriotic citizens will cast an evil eye upon you as a subverter of the laws and you will confirm in the minds of the judges the justice of their own condemnation of you For he who is a corrupter of the laws is more than likely to be a corrupter of the young and foolish portion of mankind Will you then flee from well-ordered cities and virtuous men? and is existence worth having on these terms? Or will you go to them without shame, and talk to them Socrates? And what will you say to them? What you say here about virtue and justice and institutions and laws being the best things among men? Would that be decent of you? Surely not But if you go away from well governed states to Crito s friends in Thessaly where there is great disorder and licence they will be charmed to hear the tale of your escape from prison set off with ludicrous particulars of the manner in which you were wrapped in a goatskin or some other disguise, and meta morphosed as the manner is of runaways but will there be no one to remind you that in your old age you were not ashamed to violate the most sacred laws from a miserable desire of a little more life? Perhaps not, if you keep them in a good temper but if they are out of temper you will hear many degrading things you will live but how?—as the flatterer of all men and the servant of all men and doing what?—eat ing and drinking in Thessaly having gone abroad in order that you may get a dinner And where will be your fine sentiments about justice and virtue? [54] Say that you wish to live for the sake of your children—you want to bring them up and educate them—will you take them into Thessaly and deprive them of Athe nian citizenship? Is this the benefit which you will confer upon them? Or are you under the impression that they will be better cared for and educated here if you are still alive al though absent from them for your friends will take care of them? Do you fancy that if you are an inhabitant of Thessaly they will take care of them and if you are an inhabitant of the other world that they will not take care of them? Nay but if they who call themselves friends are good for anything they will—to be sure they will

Listen then Socrates to us who have brought you up Think not of life and children first, and of justice afterwards, but of justice first, that you may be justified before the princes of the world below For neither will you nor any that belong to you be happier or holier or juster in this life, or happier in another if you do as Crito bids Now you depart in innocence, a sufferer and not a doer of evil a victim not of the laws but of men But if you go forth returning evil for evil and injury for injury breaking the covenants and agreements which you have made with us, and wronging those whom you ought least of all to wrong that is to say yourself, your friends your country and us, we shall be angry with you while you live, and our brethren, the laws in the world below will receive you as an enemy for they will know that you have done your best to destroy us Listen then to us and not to Crito

This dear Crito is the voice which I seem to hear murmuring in my ears like the sound of the flute in the ears of the mystic that voice, I say is humming in my ears and prevents me from hearing any other And I know that anything more which you may say will be vain Yet speak if you have anything to say

Cr I have nothing to say Socrates

Soc Leave me then Crito to fulfil the will of God and to follow whither he leads

PHAEDO

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE PHAEDO who is the narrator of the Dialogue to Echecrates of Phlius SOCRATES APOLLODORUS, SIMMIAS CEBES CRITO ATTENDANT OF THE PRISON

Scene The Prison of Socrates Place of the Narration Phlius

[57] Echecrates WERE you yourself Phaedo in the prison with Socrates on the day when he drank the poison?

Phaedo Yes Echecrates I was

Ech I should so like to hear about his death What did he say in his last hours? We were informed that he died by taking poison but no one knew anything more for no Phliasian ever goes to Athens now and it is a long time since any stranger from Athens has found his way hither so that we had no clear account

[58] Phaed Did you not hear of the proceedings at the trial?

Ech Yes some one told us about the trial and we could not understand why having been condemned he should have been put to death not at the time but long afterwards What was the reason of this?

Phaed An accident Echecrates the stern of the ship which the Athenians send to Delos happened to have been crowned on the day before he was tried

Ech What is this ship?

Phaed It is the ship in which according to Athenian tradition Theseus went to Crete when he took with him the fourteen youths and was the saviour of them and of himself And they are said to have vowed to Apollo at the time, that if they were saved they would send a yearly mission to Delos Now this custom still continues and the whole period of the voyage to and from Delos beginning when the priest of Apollo crowns the stern of the ship is a holy season during which the city is not allowed to be polluted by public executions and when the vessel is detained by contrary winds the time spent in going and returning is very considerable As I was saying the ship was crowned on the day before the trial and this was the reason why Socrates lay in prison and was not put to death until long after he was condemned

Ech What was the manner of his death Phaedo? What was said or done? And which of his friends were with him? Or did the authorities forbid them to be present—so that he had no friends near him when he died?

Phaed No there were several of them with him

Ech If you have nothing to do I wish that you would tell me what passed as exactly as you can

Phaed I have nothing at all to do and will try to gratify your wish To be reminded of Socrates is always the greatest delight to me whether I speak myself or hear another speak of him

Ech You will have listeners who are of the same mind with you and I hope that you will be as exact as you can

Phaed I had a singular feeling at being in his company For I could hardly believe that I was present at the death of a friend and therefore I did not pity him Echecrates he died so fearlessly and his words and bearing were so noble and gracious that to me he appeared blessed I thought that in going to the other world he could not be without a divine call [59] and that he would be happy if any man ever was when he arrived there and herefore I did not pity him as might have eemed natural at such an hour. But I had not he pleasure which I usually feel in philosophical discourse (for philosophy was the theme of which we spoke). I was pleased, but in the pleasure there was also a strange admixture of pain; for I reflected that he was soon to die, and this double feeling was shared by us all; we were laughing and weeping by turns, especially the excitable Apollodorus—you know the sort of man?

Ech. Yes.

Phaed. He was quite beside himself; and I and all of us were greatly moved.

Ech. Who were present?

Phaed. Of native Athenians there were, besides Apollodorus, Critobulus and his father Crito, Hermogenes, Epigenes, Aeschines, Antisthenes; likewise Ctesippus of the deme of Paeania, Menexenus, and some others; Plato, if I am not mistaken, was ill.

Ech. Were there any strangers?

Phaed. Yes, there were; Simmias the Theban, and Cebes, and Phaedondes; Euclid and Terpsion, who came from Megara.

Ech. And was Aristippus there, and Cleombrotus?

Phaed. No, they were said to be in Aegina.

Ech. Any one else?

Phaed. I think that these were nearly all.

Ech. Well, and what did you talk about?

Phaed. I will begin at the beginning, and endeavour to repeat the entire conversation. On the previous days we had been in the habit of assembling early in the morning at the court in which the trial took place, and which is not far from the prison. There we used to wait talking with one another until the opening of the doors (for they were not opened very early); then we went in and generally passed the day with Socrates. On the last morning we assembled sooner than usual, having heard on the day before when we quitted the prison in the evening that the sacred ship had come from Delos; and so we arranged to meet very early at the accustomed place. On our arrival the jailer who answered the door, instead of admitting us, came out and told us to stay until he called us. For the Eleven, he said, are now with Socrates; they are taking off his chains, and giving orders that he is to die today. He soon returned and said that we might come in. [60] On entering we found Socrates just released from chains, and Xanthippe, whom you know, sitting by him, and holding his child in her arms. When she saw us she uttered a cry and said, as women will: O Socrates, this is the last time that either you will converse with your friends, or they with you." Socrates turned to Crito and said: "Crito, let some one take her home." Some of Crito's people accordingly led her away, crying out and beating herself. And when she was gone, Socrates, sitting up on the couch, bent and rubbed his leg, saying, as he was rubbing: How singular is the thing called pleasure, and how curiously related to pain, which might be thought to be the opposite of it; for they are never present to a man at the same instant, and yet he who pursues either is generally compelled to take the other; their bodies are two, but they are joined by a single head. And I cannot help thinking that if Aesop had remembered them, he would have made a fable about God trying to reconcile their strife, and how, when he could not, he fastened their heads together; and this is the reason why when one comes the other follows: as I know by my own experience now, when after the pain in my leg which was caused by the chain pleasure appears to succeed.

Upon this Cebes said: I am glad, Socrates, that you have mentioned the name of Aesop. For it reminds me of a question which has been asked by many, and was asked of me only the day before yesterday by Evenus the poet—he will be sure to ask it again, and therefore if you would like me to have an answer ready for him, you may as well tell me what I should say to him:—he wanted to know why you, who never before wrote a line of poetry, now that you are in prison are turning Aesop's fables into verse, and also composing that hymn in honour of Apollo.

Tell him, Cebes, he replied, what is the truth—that I had no idea of rivalling him or his poems; to do so, as I knew, would be no easy task. But I wanted to see whether I could purge away a scruple which I felt about the meaning of certain dreams. In the course of my life I have often had intimations in dreams "that I should compose music." The same dream came to me sometimes in one form, and sometimes in another, but always saying the same or nearly the same words: "Cultivate and make music," said the dream. And hitherto I had imagined that this was only intended to exhort and encourage me in the study of philosophy, which has been the pursuit of my life, [61] and is the noblest and best of music. The dream was bidding me do what I was already doing, in the same way that the competitor in a race is bid-

PHAEDO

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE PHAEDO who is the narrator of the Dialogue to Echecrates of Phlius SOCRATES APOLLODORUS SIMMIAS CEBES CRITO ATTENDANT OF THE PRISON
Scene The Prison of Socrates Place of the Narration Phlius

[57] Echecrates WERE you yourself Phaedo in the prison with Socrates on the day when he drank the poison?

Phaedo Yes Echecrates I was

Ech I should so like to hear about his death What did he say in his last hours? We were informed that he died by taking poison but no one knew anything more for no Phliasian ever goes to Athens now and it is a long time since any stranger from Athens has found his way hither so that we had no clear account

[58] Phaed Did you not hear of the proceedings at the trial?

Ech Yes some one told us about the trial and we could not understand why having been condemned he should have been put to death not at the time but long afterwards What was the reason of this?

Phaed An accident Echecrates the stern of the ship which the Athenians send to Delos happened to have been crowned on the day before he was tried

Ech What is this ship?

Phaed It is the ship in which according to Athenian tradition Theseus went to Crete when he took with him the fourteen youths and was the saviour of them and of himself And they are said to have vowed to Apollo at the time that if they were saved they would send a yearly mission to Delos Now this custom still continues and the whole period of the voyage to and from Delos beginning when the priest of Apollo crowns the stern of the ship is a holy season during which the city is not allowed to be polluted by public executions and when the vessel is detained by contrary winds the time spent in going and returning is very considerable As I was saying the ship was crowned on the day before the trial and this was the reason why Socrates lay in prison and was not put to death until long after he was condemned

Ech What was the manner of his death Phaedo? What was said or done? And which of his friends were with him? Or did the authorities forbid them to be present—so that he had no friends near him when he died?

Phaed No there were several of them with him

Ech If you have nothing to do I wish that you would tell me what passed as exactly as you can

Phaed I have nothing at all to do and will try to gratify your wish To be reminded of Socrates is always the greatest delight to me, whether I speak myself or hear another speak of him

Ech You will have listeners who are of the same mind with you and I hope that you will be as exact as you can

Phaed I had a singular feeling at being in his company For I could hardly believe that I was present at the death of a friend and therefore I did not pity him Echecrates he died so fearlessly and his words and bearing were so noble and gracious that to me he appeared blessed I thought that in going to the other world he could not be without a divine call [59] and that he would be happy, if any man ever was when he arrived there and therefore I did not pity him as might have seemed natural at such an hour. But I had not the pleasure which I usually feel in philosophical discourse (for philosophy was the theme of which we spoke). I was pleased, but in the pleasure there was also a strange admixture of pain; for I reflected that he was soon to die, and this double feeling was shared by us all; we were laughing and weeping by turns, especially the excitable Apollodorus—you know the sort of man?

Ech. Yes.

Phaed. He was quite beside himself; and I and all of us were greatly moved.

Ech. Who were present?

Phaed. Of native Athenians there were, besides Apollodorus, Critobulus and his father Crito, Hermogenes, Epigenes, Aeschines, Antisthenes; likewise Ctesippus of the deme of Paeania, Menexenus, and some others; Plato, if I am not mistaken, was ill.

Ech. Were there any strangers?

Phaed. Yes, there were; Simmias the Theban, and Cebes, and Phaedondes; Euclid and Terpsion, who came from Megara.

Ech. And was Aristippus there, and Cleombrotus?

Phaed. No, they were said to be in Aegina.

Ech. Any one else?

Phaed. I think that these were nearly all.

Ech. Well, and what did you talk about?

Phaed. I will begin at the beginning, and endeavour to repeat the entire conversation. On the previous days we had been in the habit of assembling early in the morning at the court in which the trial took place, and which is not far from the prison. There we used to wait talking with one another until the opening of the doors (for they were not opened very early); then we went in and generally passed the day with Socrates. On the last morning we assembled sooner than usual, having heard on the day before when we quitted the prison in the evening that the sacred ship had come from Delos; and so we arranged to meet very early at the accustomed place. On our arrival the jailer who answered the door, instead of admitting us, came out and told us to stay until he called us. For the Eleven, he said, "are now with Socrates; they are taking off his chains, and giving orders that he is to die to-day." He soon returned and said that we might come in. [60] On entering we found Socrates just released from chains, and Xanthippe, whom you know, sitting by him, and holding his child in her arms. When she saw us she uttered a cry and said, as women will: "O Socrates, this is the last time that either you will converse with your friends, or they with you." Socrates turned to Crito and said: "Crito, let some one take her home." Some of Crito's people accordingly led her away, crying out and beating herself. And when she was gone, Socrates, sitting up on the couch, bent and rubbed his leg, saying, as he was rubbing: How singular is the thing called pleasure, and how curiously related to pain, which might be thought to be the opposite of it; for they are never present to a man at the same instant, and yet he who pursues either is generally compelled to take the other; their bodies are two, but they are joined by a single head. And I cannot help thinking that if Aesop had remembered them, he would have made a fable about God trying to reconcile their strife, and how, when he could not, he fastened their heads together; and this is the reason why when one comes the other follows: as I know by my own experience now, when after the pain in my leg which was caused by the chain, pleasure appears to succeed.

Upon this Cebes said: I am glad, Socrates, that you have mentioned the name of Aesop. For it reminds me of a question which has been asked by many, and was asked of me only the day before yesterday by Evenus the poet—he will be sure to ask it again, and therefore if you would like me to have an answer ready for him, you may as well tell me what I should say to him:—he wanted to know why you, who never before wrote a line of poetry, now that you are in prison are turning Aesop's fables into verse, and also composing that hymn in honour of Apollo.

Tell him, Cebes, he replied, what is the truth—that I had no idea of rivalling him or his poems; to do so, as I knew, would be no easy task. But I wanted to see whether I could purge away a scruple which I felt about the meaning of certain dreams. In the course of my life I have often had intimations in dreams "that I should compose music." The same dream came to me sometimes in one form, and sometimes in another, but always saying the same or nearly the same words: "Cultivate and make music," said the dream. And hitherto I had imagined that this was only intended to exhort and encourage me in the study of philosophy, which has been the pursuit of my life, [61] and is the noblest and best of music. The dream was bidding me do what I was already doing, in the same way that the competitor in a race is bid-

den by the spectators to run when he is already running But I was not certain of this for the dream might have meant music in the popular sense of the word and being under sentence of death and the festival giving me a respite I thought that it would be safer for me to atisfy the scruple and in obedience to the dream to compose a few verses before I departed And first I made a hymn in honour of the god of the testival and then considering that a poet if he is really to be a poet should not only put together words but should invent stories and that I have no invention I took some fables of Aesop which I had ready at hand and which I knew—they were the first I came upon—and turned them into verse Tell this to Evenus Cebes and bid him be of good cheer say that I would have him come after me if he be a wise man and not tarry and that to-day I am likely to be going for the Athenians say that I must

Simmias said What a message for such a man! having been a frequent companion of his I should say that as far as I know him he will never take your advice unless he is obliged

Why said Socrates —is not Evenus a philosopher?

I think that he is said Simmias

Then he or any man who has the spirit of philosophy will be willing to die but he will not take his own life for that is held to be unlawful

Here he changed his position and put his legs off the couch on to the ground and during the rest of the conversation he remained sitting

Why do you say enquired Cebes that a man ought not to take his own life but that the philosopher will be ready to follow the dying?

Socrates replied And have you Cebes and Simmias who are the disciples of Philolaus never heard him speak of this?

Yes but his language was obscure Socrates

My words, too are only an echo but there is no reason why I should not repeat what I have heard and indeed as I am going to another place it is very meet for me to be thinking and talking of the nature of the pilgrimage which I am about to make What can I do better in the interval between this and the setting of the sun?

Then tell me Socrates why is suicide held to be unlawful? as I have certainly heard Philolaus about whom you were just now asking affirm when he was staying with us at Thebes and there are others who say the same although I have never understood what was meant by any of them

[62] Do not lose heart replied Socrates and the day may come when you will understand I suppose that you wonder why when other things which are evil may be good at certain times and to certain persons, death is to be the only exception and why when a man is better dead he is not permitted to be his own benefactor but must wait for the hand of another

Very true said Cebes laughing gently and speaking in his native Boeotian

I admit the appearance of inconsistency in what I am saying but there may not be any real inconsistency after all There is a doctrine whispered in secret that man is a prisoner who has no right to open the door and run away this is a great mystery which I do not quite understand Yet I too believe that the gods are our guardians and that we men are a possession of theirs Do you not agree?

Yes I quite agree said Cebes

And if one of your own possessions an ox or an ass for example took the liberty of putting himself out of the way when you had given no intimation of your wish that he should die would you not be angry with him, and would you not punish him if you could?

Certainly replied Cebes

Then if we look at the matter thus, there may be reason in saying that a man should wait and not take his own life until God summons him as he is now summoning me

Yes Socrates said Cebes there seems to be truth in what you say And yet how can you reconcile this seemingly true belief that God is our guardian and we his possessions with the willingness to die which you were just now attributing to the philosopher? That the wisest of men should be willing to leave a service in which they are ruled by the gods who are the best of rulers is not reasonable for surely no wise man thinks that when set at liberty he can take better care of himself than the gods take of him A fool may perhaps think so—he may argue that he had better run away from his master not considering that his duty is to remain to the end and not to run away from the good and that there would be no sense in his running away The wise man will want to be ever with him who is better than himself Now this Socrates is the reverse of what was just now said for upon this view the wise man should sorrow and the fool rejoice at passing out of life is a man who is always enquiring and is not so easily convinced by the first thing whi h he hears

[63] The earnestness of Cebes seemed to please Socrates Here, said he turning to us,

And certainly a lded Simmias, the objec t on which he is now making does appear to me to have some force. For what can be the meaning of a truly wise man wanting to fly away and lightly leave a master who is better than himself? And I rather imagine that Cebes is referring to you he thinks that you are too ready to leave us, and too ready to leave the gods whom you acknowledge to be our good mas ers.

Yes, replied Socrates there is reason in what you say And so you think that I ought to answer your indictment as if I were in a court?

We should like you to do so sa d Simmias

Then I must try to make a more successful defence before you than I did before the judges For I am quite ready to admit, Simmias and Cebes that I ought to be grieved at death if I were not persuaded in the first place that I am going to other gods ho are ise and good (of which I am as certain as I can be of any such matters) and secondly (though I am not so sure of this last) to men departed better than those whom I lea e behind and therefore I do not g ie e as I might ha e done for I have good h pe that there is yet something remaining for the dead, and as has been sa d of old some far better thing for the good than for the evil

But do you mean to take a ay your thoughts w th you, Socrates? said Simmias Will you not impart them to us?—for they are a benefit in which e too are entitled to share More o er if you succeed in con incing us, that will be an answer to the charge against your elf

I will do my best, replied Socrates But you must first let me hear what Crito wants he has long been wishing to say something to me

Only this, Socrates, eplied Crito—the attendant who is to gi e y u the po on has been telling me and he wants me to tell you, that you are not to talk much talking h says, increases heat, and this is apt to interfere with th action of the poison persons who excite themselves are sometimes obl ged to take a second or e en a third dose

Then said Socrates, let him mind his business and be prepared to give the poison twice r even thr ce if necessary that s all

I kn w quite well what you would say replied Crito but I was obl ged to satisfy him.

Ne er mind him, he said

And now O my judges, I des re to pro e to you that the real phi sopher has reason to be of good cheer when he is about to die and that after death he may hope to obtain the greatest good in the [64] other world And how this may be Simmias and Cebes, I will endeavour to explain For I deem that the true votary of philosophy is likely to be misunderstood by other men they do not perceive that he is always pursuing death and dying and if this be so and he has had the desire of death all his life long why when his time comes should he repine at that which he has been always pursuing and desiring?

Simmias said laughingly Though not in a laughing humour you have made me laugh Socrates for I cannot help thinking that the many when they hear your words will say how truly you have described philosophers, and our people at home will likewise say that the life which philosophers desire is in reality death and that they have found them out to be deserving of the death which they desire

And they are right, Simmias in thinking so with the exception of the words they have found them out for they have not found out either what is the nature of that death which the true pl ilosopher deserves or ho v he deserves or desires death But enough of them — let us discuss the matter among oursel es Do we belie e that there is such a thing as death?

To be sure replied Simmias

Is it not the separation of soul and body? And to be dead is the completion of this when the soul exists in herself and is released from the body and the body is released from the soul what is this but death?

Just so he replied

There is another question which will probably throw light on our present enquiry if you and I can agree about it —Ought the philosopher to care about the pleasures—if they are to be called pleasures—of eating and drinking?

Certainly not, ans ered Simmias.

And what about the pleasures of love—sh uld he care for them?

By no means

And will he think much of the other ways of indulging the body for example the acquisition of costly raiment or sandals or other adornments of the body? Instead of caring about them, does he not rather despise anything more than nature needs? What do you say?

I should say that the true philosopher would despise them

Would you not say that he s ent rely concerned with the soul and not with the body? He would like as far as he can to get away

den by the spectators to run when he is already running But I was not certain of this for the dream might have meant music in the popular sense of the word and being under sentence of death and the festival giving me a respite I thought that it would be safer for me to satisfy the scruple and in obedience to the dream, to compose a few verses before I departed And first I made a hymn in honour of the god of the festival and then considering that a poet if he is really to be a poet should not only put together words but should invent stories and that I have no invention I took some fables of Aesop which I had ready at hand and which I knew—they were the first I came upon—and turned them into verse Tell this to Evenus Cebes and bid him be of good cheer say that I would have him come after me if he be a wise man and not tarry and that to-day I am likely to be going for the Athenians say that I must

[63] The earnestness of Cebes seemed to please Socrates Here said he turning to us, if while in company with the body the soul cannot have pure knowledge, one of two things follows—either knowledge is not to be attained at all or if at all [67] after death For then and not till then the soul will be parted from the body and exist in herself alone In this present life, I reckon that we make the nearest approach to knowledge when we have the least possible intercourse or communion with the body and are not surfeited with the bodily nature, but keep ourselves pure until the hour when God himself is pleased to release us And thus having got rid of the foolishness of the body we shall be pure and hold converse with the pure, and know of ourselves the clear light everywhere, which is no other than the light of truth. For the impure are not permitted to approach the pure These are the sort of words Simmias which the true lovers of knowledge cannot help saying to one another and thinking You would agree would you not?

Undoubtedly Socrates

But, O my friend if this be true, there is great reason to hope that, going whither I go when I have come to the end of my journey I shall attain that which has been the pursuit of my life And therefore I go on my way rejoicing and not I only but every other man who believes that his mind has been made ready and that he is in a manner purified

Certainly replied Simmias

And what is purification but the separation of the soul from the body as I was saying before the habit of the soul gathering and collecting herself into herself from all sides out of the body the dwelling in her own place alone as in another life so also in this as far as she can —the release of the soul from the chains of the body?

Very true he said

And this separation and release of the soul from the body is termed death?

To be sure he said

And the true philosophers, and they only are ever seeking to release the soul Is not the separation and release of the soul from the body their especial study?

That is true

And as I was saying at first, there would be a ridiculous contradiction in men studying to live as nearly as they can in a state of death and yet repining when it comes upon them.

Clearly

And the true philosophers, Simmias, are always occupied in the practice of dying, wherefore also to them least of all men is death terrible Look at the matter thus —if they have been in every way the enemies of the body and are wanting to be alone with the soul when this desire of theirs is granted how inconsistent would they be if they trembled and repined instead of rejoicing at their departure to that place where when they arrive, they hope to gain that which in life they desired—and this was wisdom—and at the [68] same time to be rid of the company of their enemy Many a man has been willing to go to the world below animated by the hope of seeing there an earthly love, or wife, or son and conversing with them And will he who is a true lover of wisdom and is strongly persuaded in like manner that only in the world below he can worthily enjoy her still repine at death? Will he not depart with joy? Surely he will O my friend if he be a true philosopher For he will have a firm conviction that there and there only he can find wisdom in her purity And if this be true he would be very absurd as I was saying if he were afraid of death

He would indeed replied Simmias

And when you see a man who is repining at the approach of death is not his reluctance a sufficient proof that he is not a lover of wisdom but a lover of the body and probably at the same time a lover of either money or power or both?

Quite so he replied

And is not courage Simmias a quality which is specially characteristic of the philosopher?

Certainly

There is temperance again which even by the vulgar is supposed to consist in the control and regulation of the passions and in the sense of superiority to them—is not temperance a virtue belonging to those only who despise the body and who pass their lives in philosophy?

Most assuredly

For the courage and temperance of other men if you will consider them, are really a contradiction

How so?

Well he said you are aware that death is regarded by men in general as a great evil

Very true he said

And do not courageous men face death because they are afraid of yet greater evils?

That is quite true

Then all but the philosophers are courageous only from fear and because they are afraid and yet that a man should be courageous from fear and because he is a coward is surely a strange thing from the body and to turn to the soul

Quite true

In matters of this sort philosophers above all other men may be observed in every sort of way to dissever the soul from the communion [65] of the body

Very true

Whereas Simmias the rest of the world are of opinion that to him who has no sense of pleasure and no part in bodily pleasure life is not worth having and that he who is indifferent about them is as good as dead

That is also true

What again shall we say of the actual acquirement of knowledge?—is the body if invited to share in the enquiry a hinderer or a helper? I mean to say have sight and hearing any truth in them? Are they not as the poets are always telling us inaccurate witnesses? and yet if even they are inaccurate and indistinct what is to be said of the other senses?—for you will allow that they are the best of them?

Certainly he replied

Then when does the soul attain truth?—for in attempting to consider anything in company with the body she is obviously deceived

True

Then must not true existence be revealed to her in thought if at all?

Yes

And thought is best when the mind is gathered into herself and none of these things trouble her—neither sounds nor sights nor pain nor any pleasure —when she takes leave of the body and has as little as possible to do with it when she has no bodily sense or desire but is aspiring after true being?

Certainly

And in this the philosopher dishonours the body his soul runs away from his body and desires to be alone and by herself?

That is true

Well but there is another thing Simmias Is there or is there not an absolute justice?

Assuredly there is

And an absolute beauty and absolute good?

Of course

But did you ever behold any of them with your eyes?

Certainly not

Or did you ever reach them with any other bodily sense?—and I speak not of these alone but of absolute greatness and health and strength and of the essence or true nature of everything Has the reality of them ever been perceived by you through the bodily organs? or rather is not the nearest approach to the knowledge of their several natures made by him who so orders his intellectual vision as to have the most exact conception of the essence of each thing which he considers?

Certainly

And he attains to the purest knowledge of them who goes to each with the mind alone, not introducing or intruding in the act of thought sight or any other sense together with reason, but with the very light of the mind in her own clearness searches into the very [66] truth of each he who has got rid as far as he can of eyes and ears and so to speak of the whole body these being in his opinion distracting elements which when they infect the soul hinder her from acquiring truth and knowledge—who if not he is likely to attain to the knowledge of true being?

What you say has a wonderful truth in it, Socrates replied Simmias

And when real philosophers consider all these things will they not be led to make a reflection which they will express in words something like the following? Have we not found they will say a path of thought which seems to bring us and our argument to the conclusion, that while we are in the body and while the soul is infected with the evils of the body our desire will not be satisfied? and our desire is of the truth For the body is a source of endless trouble to us by reason of the mere requirement of food and is liable also to diseases which overtake and impede us in the search after true being it fills us full of loves and lusts and fears, and fancies of all kinds and endless foolery and in fact as men say takes away from us the power of thinking at all Whence come wars, and fightings and factions? whence but from the body and the lusts of the body? Wars are occasioned by the love of money and money has to be acquired for the sake and in the service of the body and by reason of all these impediments we have no time to give to philosophy and last and worst of all even if we are at leisure and betake ourselves to some speculation the body is always breaking in upon us, causing turmoil and confusion in our enquiries, and so amazing us that we are prevented from seeing the truth It has been proved to us by experience that if we would have pure knowledge of anything we must be quit of the body—the soul in herself must behold things in themselves and then we shall attain the wisdom which we desire and of which we say that we are lovers not while we live but after death for posites which are generated out of opposites And I want to show that in all opposites there is of necessity a similar alternation I mean to say for example, that anything which becomes greater must become greater after being less.

True.

And that which becomes less must have been once greater and then have become less. [71]

Yes.

And the weaker is generated from the stronger and the swifter from the slower

Very true.

And the worse is from the better and the more just is from the more unjust.

Of course

And is this true of all opposites? and are we convinced that all of them are generated out of opposites?

Yes.

And in this universal opposition of all things, are there not also two intermediate processes which are ever going on, from one to the other opposite, and back again where there is a greater and a less there is also an intermediate process of increase and diminution, and that which grows is said to wax, and that which decays to wane?

Yes, he said.

And there are many other processes, such as division and composition, cooling and heating which equally involve a passage into and out of one another And this necessarily holds of all opposites, even though not always expressed in words—they are really generated out of one another and there is a passing or process from one to the other of them?

Very true, he replied.

Well, and is there not an opposite of life, as sleep is the opposite of waking?

True he said

And what is it?

Death, he answered.

And these, if they are opposites, are generated the one from the other and have their two intermediate processes also?

Of course

Now said Socrates, I will analyze one of the two pairs of opposites which I have mentioned to you, and also its intermediate processes, and you shall analyze the other to me. One of them I term sleep, the other waking The state of sleep is opposed to the state of waking, and out of sleeping waking is generated, and out of waking, sleeping and the process of generation is in the one case falling asleep and in the other waking up. Do you agree?

I entirely agree.

Then, suppose that you analyze life and death to me in the same manner Is not death opposed to life?

Yes.

And they are generated one from the other?

Yes.

What is generated from the living?

The dead

And what from the dead?

I can only say in answer—the living

Then the living, whether things or persons Cebes, are generated from the dead?

That is clear he replied

Then the inference is that our souls exist in the world below?

That is true.

And one of the two processes or generations is visible—for surely the act of dying is visible?

Surely he said.

What then is to be the result? Shall we exclude the opposite process? and shall we suppose nature to walk on one leg only? Must we not rather assign to death some corresponding process of generation?

Certainly he replied

And what is that process?

Return to life

And return to life, if there be such a thing is the birth of the dead into the world of the living? [72]

Quite true.

Then here is a new way by which we arrive at the conclusion that the living come from the dead, just as the dead come from the living and this, if true, affords a most certain proof that the souls of the dead exist in some place out of which they come again

Yes Socrates, he said the conclusion seems to flow necessarily out of our previous admissions.

And that these admissions were not unfair Cebes, he said, may be shown I think, as follows If generation were in a straight line only and there were no compensation or circle in nature, no turn or return of elements into their opposites, then you know that all things would at last have the same form and pass into the same state, and there would be no more generation of them.

What do you mean? he said.

A simple thing enough, which I will illustrate by the case of sleep, he replied. You know that if there were no alternation of sleeping and waking the tale of the sleeping Endymion would in the end have no meaning because

Very true

And are not the temperate exactly in the same case? They are temperate because they are intemperate—which might seem to be a contradiction but is nevertheless the sort of thing which happens with this foolish temperance For there are pleasures which they are afraid of losing and in their desire to keep them they abstain from some pleasures because they are overcome by others and although to be conquered by pleasure is called by men intemperance [69] to them the conquest of pleasure consists in being conquered by pleasure And that is what I mean by saying that in a sense they are made temperate through intemperance

Such appears to be the case

Yet the exchange of one fear or pleasure or pain for another fear or pleasure or pain and of the greater for the less as if they were coins is not the exchange of virtue O my blessed Simmias is there not one true coin for which all things ought to be exchanged?—and that is wisdom and only in exchange for this and in company with this is anything truly bought or sold whether courage or temperance or justice And is not all true virtue the companion of wisdom no matter what fears or pleasures or other similar goods or evils may or may not attend her? But the virtue which is made up of these goods when they are severed from wisdom and exchanged with one another is a shadow of virtue only nor is there any freedom or health or truth in her but in the true exchange there is a purging away of all these things and temperance and justice and courage and wisdom herself are the purgation of them The founders of the mysteries would appear to have had a real meaning and were not talking nonsense when they intimated in a figure long ago that he who passes unsanctified and uninitiated into the world below will lie in a slough but that he who arrives there after initiation and purification will dwell with the gods For many as they say in the mysteries are the thyrsus bearers but few are the mystics — meaning as I interpret the words the true philosophers In the number of whom during my whole life I have been seeking according to my ability to find a place —whether I have sought in a right way or not and whether I have succeeded or not I shall truly know in a little while if God will when I myself arrive in the other world—such is my belief And therefore I maintain that I am right Simmias and Cebes in not grieving or repining at parting from you and my masters in this world for I believe that I shall equally find good masters and friends in another world But most men do not believe this saying if then I succeed in convincing you by my defence better than I did the Athenian judges, it will be well

Cebes answered I agree, Socrates in the greater part of what you say [70] But in what concerns the soul men are apt to be incredulous they fear that when she has left the body her place may be nowhere and that on the very day of death she may perish and come to an end—immediately on her release from the body issuing forth dispersed like smoke or air and in her flight vanishing away into nothingness If she could only be collected into herself after she has obtained release from the evils of which you were speaking there would be good reason to hope Socrates that what you say is true But surely it requires a great deal of argument and many proofs to show that when the man is dead his soul yet exists and has any force or intelligence

True Cebes said Socrates and shall I suggest that we converse a little of the probabilities of these things?

I am sure said Cebes that I should greatly like to know your opinion about them

I reckon said Socrates that no one who heard me now not even if he were one of my old enemies the Comic poets could accuse me of idle talking about matters in which I have no concern —If you please then we will proceed with the enquiry

Suppose we consider the question whether the souls of men after death are or are not in the world below There comes into my mind an ancient doctrine which affirms that they go from hence into the other world and returning hither are born again from the dead Now if it be true that the living come from the dead, then our souls must exist in the other world, for if not how could they have been born again? And this would be conclusive if there were any real evidence that the living are only born from the dead but if this is not so then other arguments will have to be adduced

Very true replied Cebes

Then let us consider the whole question not in relation to man only but in relation to animals generally and to plants, and to everything of which there is generation and the proof will be easier Are not all things which have opposites generated out of their opposites? I mean such things as good and evil just and unjust—and there are innumerable other op-

Say so, yes, replied Simmias, and swear to it, with all the confidence in life.

And do we know the nature of this absolute essence?

To be sure, he said.

And whence did we obtain our knowledge? Did we not see equalities of material things, such as pieces of wood and stones, and gather from them the idea of an equality which is different from them? For you will acknowledge that there is a difference. Or look at the matter in another way:—Do not the same pieces of wood or stone appear at one time equal, and at another time unequal?

That is certain.

But are real equals ever equal? or is the idea of equality the same as of inequality?

Impossible, Socrates.

Then these (so-called) equals are not the same with the idea of equality?

I should say, clearly not, Socrates.

And yet from these equals, although differing from the idea of equality, you conceived and attained that idea?

Very true, he said.

Which might be like, or might be unlike them?

Yes.

But that makes no difference: whenever from seeing one thing you conceived another, whether like or unlike, there must surely have been an act of recollection?

Very true.

But what would you say of equal portions of wood and stone, or other material equals? and what is the impression produced by them? Are they equals in the same sense in which absolute equality is equal? or do they fall short of this perfect equality in a measure?

Yes, he said, in a very great measure too.

And must we not allow, that when I or any one, looking at any object, observes that the thing which he sees aims at being some other thing, but falls short of, and cannot be, that other thing, but is inferior, he who makes this observation must have had a previous knowledge of that to which the other, although similar, was inferior?

Certainly.

And has not this been our own case in the matter of equals and of absolute equality?

Precisely.

Then we must have known equality previously to the time when we first saw the material equals, [75] and reflected that all these apparent equals strive to attain absolute equality, but fall short of it?

Very true.

And we recognize also that this absolute equality has only been known, and can only be known, through the medium of sight or touch, or of some other of the senses, which are all alike in this respect?

Yes, Socrates, as far as the argument is concerned, one of them is the same as the other.

From the senses then is derived the knowledge that all sensible things aim at an absolute equality of which they fall short?

Yes.

Then before we began to see or hear or perceive in any way, we must have had a knowledge of absolute equality, or we could not have referred to that standard the equals which are derived from the senses?—for to that they all aspire, and of that they fall short.

No other inference can be drawn from the previous statements.

And did we not see and hear and have the use of our other senses as soon as we were born?

Certainly.

Then we must have acquired the knowledge of equality at some previous time?

Yes.

That is to say, before we were born, I suppose?

True.

And if we acquired this knowledge before we were born, and were born having the use of it, then we also knew before we were born and at the instant of birth not only the equal or the greater or the less, but all other ideas; for we are not speaking only of equality, but of beauty, goodness, justice, holiness, and of all which we stamp with the name of essence in the dialectical process, both when we ask and when we answer questions. Of all this we may certainly affirm that we acquired the knowledge before birth?

We may.

But if, after having acquired, we have not forgotten what in each case we acquired, then we must always have come into life having knowledge, and shall always continue to know as long as life lasts—for knowing is the acquiring and retaining knowledge and not forgetting. Is not forgetting, Simmias, just the losing of knowledge?

Quite true, Socrates.

But if the knowledge which we acquired before birth was lost by us at birth, and if afterwards by the use of the senses we recovered what we previously knew, will not the process

all other things would be asleep too and he would not be distinguishable from the rest Or if there were composition only and no division of substances then the chaos of Anaxagoras would come again And in like manner my dear Cebes if all things which partook of life were to die and after they were dead remained in the form of death and did not come to life again all would at last die and nothing would be alive—what other result could there be? For if the living spring from any other things and they too die must not all things at last be swallowed up in death? [1]

There is no escape Socrates said Cebes and to me your argument seems to be absolutely true

Yes he said Cebes it is and must be so in my opinion and we have not been deluded in making these admissions but I am confident that there truly is such a thing as living again and that the living spring from the dead and that the souls of the dead are in existence and that the good souls have a better portion than the evil

Cebes added Your favourite doctrine Socrates that knowledge is simply recollection if true also necessarily implies a previous time in which we have learned that which we now recollect But this would be impossible unless our soul had been in some place [73] before existing in the form of man here then is another proof of the soul s immortality

But tell me Cebes said Simmias interposing what arguments are urged in favour of this doctrine of recollection I am not very sure at the moment that I remember them

One excellent proof said Cebes is afforded by questions If you put a question to a person in a right way he will give a true answer of himself but how could he do this unless there were knowledge and right reason already in him? And this is most clearly shown when he is taken to a diagram or to anything of that sort

But if said Socrates you are still incredulous Simmias I would ask you whether you may not agree with me when you look at the matter in another way —I mean if you are still incredulous as to whether knowledge is recollection?

Incredulous I am not said Simmias but I want to have this doctrine of recollection brought to my own recollection and from what Cebes has said I am beginning to recollect and be convinced but I should still like to hear what you were going to say

This is what I would say he replied —We should agree if I am not mistaken that what a man recollects he must have known at some previous time

Very true

And what is the nature of this knowledge or recollection? I mean to ask Whether a person who having seen or heard or in any way perceived anything knows not only that but has a conception of something else which is the subject, not of the same but of some oth r kind of knowledge may not be fairly said to recollect that of which he has the conception?

What do you mean?

I mean what I may illustrate by the following instance —The knowledge of a lyre is not the same as the knowledge of a man?

True

And yet what is the feeling of lovers when they recognize a lyre or a garment or anything else which the beloved has been in the habit of using? Do not they from knowin the lyre form in the mind s eye an image of the youth to whom the lyre belongs? And this is recollection In like manner any one who sees Simmias may remember Cebes and there are endless examples of the same thing

Endless indeed replied Simmias

And recollection is most commonly a process of recovering that which has been already forgotten through time and inattention

Very true he said

Well and may you not also from seeing the picture of a house or a lyre remember a man? and from the picture of Simmias you may be led to remember Cebes

True

Or you may also be led to the recollection of Simmias himself?

[74] Quite so

And in all these cases the recollection may be derived from things either like or unlike?

It may be

And when the recollection is derived from like things then another consideration is sure to arise which is—whether the likeness in any degree falls short or not of that which is recollected?

Very true he said

And shall we proceed a step further and affirm that there is such a thing as equality not of one piece of wood or stone with another but that over and above this there is absolute equality? Shall we say so?

[1] But cf Republic x 611
[2] Cf Meno 83 ff

living is born of the dead For if the soul exists before birth, and in coming to life and being born can be born only from death and dying must she not after death continue to exist, since she has to be born again?—Surely the proof which you desire has been already furnished. Still I suspect that you and Simmias would be glad to probe the argument further Like children, you are haunted with a fear that when the soul leaves the body the wind may really blow her away and scatter her especially if a man should happen to die in a great storm and not when the sky is calm

Cebes answered with a smile Then, Socrates, you must argue us out of our fears—and yet, strictly speaking, they are not our fears but there is a child within us to whom death is a sort of hobgoblin him too we must persuade not to be afraid when he is alone in the dark.

Socrates said Let the voice of the charmer be applied daily until you have charmed away the fear

[78] And where shall we find a good charmer of our fears, Socrates, when you are gone?

Hellas, he replied is a large place, Cebes, and has many good men, and there are barbarous races not a few seek for him among them all far and wide, sparing neither pains nor money for there is no better way of spending your money And you must seek among yourselves too for you will not find others better able to make the search.

The search, replied Cebes, shall certainly be made. And now if you please, let us return to the point of the argument at which we digressed

By all means, replied Socrates what else should I please?

Very good.

Must we not, said Socrates, ask ourselves what that is which, as we imagine, is liable to be scattered and about which we fear? and what again is that about which we have no fear? And then we may proceed further to enquire whether that which suffers dispersion is or is not of the nature of soul—our hopes and fears as to our own souls will turn upon the answers to these questions.

Very true, he said

Now the compound or composite may be supposed to be naturally capable, as of being compounded, so also of being dissolved but that which is uncompounded and that only must be, if anything is indissoluble.

Yes I should imagine so, said Cebes.

And the uncompounded may be assumed to be the same and unchanging whereas the compound is always changing and never the same.

I agree, he said

Then now let us return to the previous discussion Is that idea or essence which in the dialectical process we define as essence or true existence—whether essence of equality beauty or anything else—are these essences, I say liable at times to some degree of change? or are they each of them always what they are, having the same simple self-existent and unchanging forms not admitting of variation at all or in any way or at any time?

They must be always the same Socrates replied Cebes

And what would you say of the many beautiful—whether men or horses or garments or any other things which are named by the same names and may be called equal or beautiful — are they all unchanging and the same always, or quite the reverse? May they not rather be described as almost always changing and hardly ever the same either with themselves or with one another?

The latter replied Cebes they are always in a state of change.

[79] And these you can touch and see and perceive with the senses, but the unchanging things you can only perceive with the mind—they are invisible and are not seen?

That is very true, he said

Well then added Socrates, let us suppose that there are two sorts of existences—one seen, the other unseen

Let us suppose them.

The seen is the changing and the unseen is the unchanging?

That may be also supposed

And, further is not one part of us body another part soul?

To be sure

And to which class is the body more alike and akin?

Clearly to the seen—no one can doubt that.

And is the soul seen or not seen?

Not by man, Socrates.

And what we mean by seen and "not seen is that which is or is not visible to the eye of man?

Yes, to the eye of man.

And is the soul seen or not seen?

Not seen

Unseen then?

Yes.

Then the soul is more like to the unseen and the body to the seen?

which we call learning be a recovering of the knowledge which is natural to us and may not this be rightly termed recollection?

Very true

[76] So much is clear—that when we perceive something either by the help of sight or hearing or some other sense from that perception we are able to obtain a notion of some other thing like or unlike which is associated with it but has been forgotten Whence as I was saying one of two alternatives follows —either we had this knowledge at birth and continued to know through life or after birth those who are said to learn only remember and learning is simply recollection

Yes that is quite true Socrates

And which alternative Simmias do you prefer? Had we the knowledge at our birth or did we recollect the things which we knew previously to our birth?

I cannot decide at the moment

At any rate you can decide whether he who has knowledge will or will not be able to render an account of his knowledge? What do you say?

Certainly he will

But do you think that every man is able to give an account of these very matters about which we are speaking?

Would that they could Socrates but I rather fear that to morrow at this time there will no longer be any one alive who is able to give an account of them such as ought to be given

Then you are not of opinion Simmias that all men know these things?

Certainly not

They are in process of recollecting that which they learned before?

Certainly

But when did our souls acquire this knowledge?—not since we were born as men?

Certainly not

And therefore previously?

Yes

Then Simmias our souls must also have existed without bodies before they were in the form of man and must have had intelligence

Unless indeed you suppose Socrates that these notions are given us at the very moment of birth for this is the only time which remains

Yes my friend but if so when do we lose them? for they are not in us when we are born—that is admitted Do we lose them at the moment of receiving them or if not at what other time?

No Socrates I perceive that I was unconsciously talking nonsense

Then may we not say Simmias, that if, as we are always repeating there is an absolute beauty and goodness and an absolute essence of all things and if to this which is now discovered to have existed in our former state, we refer all our sensations and with this compare them finding these ideas to be pre-existent and our inborn possession—then our souls must have had a prior existence but if not there would be no force in the argument? There is the same proof that these ideas must have existed before we were born as that our souls existed before we were born and if not the ideas, then not the souls

Yes Socrates I am convinced that there is precisely the same necessity for the one as for the other and the argument retreats successfully to the position that the existence of the soul before [77] birth cannot be separated from the existence of the essence of which you speak. For there is nothing which to my mind is so patent as that beauty goodness and the other notions of which you were just now speaking, have a most real and absolute existence and I am satisfied with the proof

Well but is Cebes equally satisfied? for I must convince him too

I think said Simmias that Cebes is satisfied although he is the most incredulous of mortals, yet I believe that he is sufficiently convinced of the existence of the soul before birth But that after death the soul will continue to exist is not yet proven even to my own satisfaction I cannot get rid of the feeling of the many to which Cebes was referring—the feeling that when the man dies the soul will be dispersed, and that this may be the extinction of her For admitting that she may have been born elsewhere and framed out of other elements, and was in existence before entering the human body why after having entered in and gone out again may she not herself be destroyed and come to an end?

Very true Simmias said Cebes about half of what was required has been proven to wit, that our souls existed before we were born —that the soul will exist after death as well as before birth is the other half of which the proof is still wanting and has to be supplied when that is given the demonstration will be complete

But that proof Simmias and Cebes has been already given said Socrates if you put the two arguments together—I mean this and the former one, in which we admitted that everything companion and servant of the body always, and is in love with and fascinated by the body and by the desires and pleasures of the body, until she is led to believe that the truth only exists in a bodily form, which a man may touch and see and taste and use for the purposes of his lusts,—the soul, I mean, accustomed to hate and fear and avoid the intellectual principle, which to the bodily eye is dark and invisible, and can be attained only by philosophy;—do you suppose that such a soul will depart pure and unalloyed?

Impossible, he replied.

She is held fast by the corporeal, which the continual association and constant care of the body have wrought into her nature.

Very true.

And this corporeal element, my friend, is heavy and weighty and earthy, and is that element of sight by which a soul is depressed and dragged down again into the visible world, because she is afraid of the invisible and of the world below—prowling about tombs and sepulchres, near which, as they tell us, are seen certain ghostly apparitions of souls which have not departed pure, but are cloyed with sight and therefore visible.

That is very likely, Socrates.

Yes, that is very likely, Cebes; and these must be the souls, not of the good, but of the evil, which are compelled to wander about such places in payment of the penalty of their former evil way of life; and they continue to wander until through the craving after the corporeal which never leaves them, they are imprisoned finally in another body. And they may be supposed to find their prisons in the same natures which they have had in their former lives.

What natures do you mean, Socrates?

What I mean is that men who have followed after gluttony, and wantonness, and drunkenness, and have had no thought of avoiding them, [82] would pass into asses and animals of that sort. What do you think?

Compare Milton, Comus 463 ff:

But when lust,
By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
But most by lewd and lavish act of sin,
Lets in defilement to the inward parts,
The soul grows clotted by contagion,
Imbodies and imbrutes, till she quite lose
The divine property of her first being.
Such are those thick and gloomy shadows damp
Oft seen in charnel vaults and sepulchres,
Lingering and sitting by a new-made grave,
As loath to leave the body that it loved,
And linked itself by carnal sensualty
To a degenerate and degraded state.

I think such an opinion to be exceedingly probable.

And those who have chosen the portion of injustice, and tyranny, and violence, will pass into wolves, or into hawks and kites;—whither else can we suppose them to go?

Yes, said Cebes; with such natures, beyond question.

And there is no difficulty, he said, in assigning to all of them places answering to their several natures and propens*ities*?

There is not, he said.

Some are happier than others; and the happiest both in themselves and in the place to which they go are those who have practised the civil and social virtues which are called temperance and justice, and are acquired by habit and attention without philosophy and mind.

Why are they the happiest?

Because they may be expected to pass into some gentle and social kind which is like their own, such as bees or wasps or ants, or back again into the form of man, and just and moderate men may be supposed to spring from them.

Very likely.

No one who has not studied philosophy and who is not entirely pure at the time of his departure is allowed to enter the company of the Gods, but the lover of knowledge only. And this is the reason, Simmias and Cebes, why the true votaries of philosophy abstain from all fleshy lusts, and hold out against them and refuse to give themselves up to them,—not because they fear poverty or the ruin of their families, like the lovers of money, and the world in general; nor like the lovers of power and honour, because they dread the dishonour or disgrace of evil deeds.

No, Socrates, that would not become them, said Cebes.

No indeed, he replied; and therefore they who have any care of their own souls, and do not merely live moulding and fashioning the body, say farewell to all this; they will not walk in the ways of the blind: and when philosophy offers them purification and release from evil, they feel that they ought not to resist her influence, and whither she leads they turn and follow.

What do you mean, Socrates?

I will tell you, he said. The lovers of knowledge are conscious that the soul was simply fastened and glued to the body—until philosophy received her, she could only view real ex-

Cf. Republic x. 619.

That follows necessarily Socrates

And were we not saying long ago that the soul when using the body as an instrument of perception that is to say when using the sense of sight or hearing or some other sense (for the meaning of perceiving through the body is perceiving through the senses)—were we not saying that the soul too is then dragged by the body into the region of the changeable and wanders and is confused the world spins round her and she is like a drunkard when she touches change?

Very true

But when returning into herself she reflects then she passes into the other world the region of purity and eternity and immortality and unchangeableness which are her kindred and with them she ever lives when she is by herself and is not let or hindered then she ceases from her erring ways and being in communion with the unchanging is unchanging And this state of the soul is called wisdom?

That is well and truly said Socrates he replied

And to which class is the soul more nearly alike and akin as far as may be inferred from this argument as well as from the preceding one?

I think Socrates that in the opinion of every one who follows the argument the soul will be infinitely more like the unchangeable—even the most stupid person will not deny that

And the body is more like the changing?

Yes

Yet once more consider the matter in another light When the soul and the body are united [80] then nature orders the soul to rule and govern and the body to obey and serve Now which of these two functions is akin to the divine? and which to the mortal? Does not the divine appear to you to be that which naturally orders and rules and the mortal to be that which is subject and servant?

True

And which does the soul resemble?

The soul resembles the divine and the body the mortal—there can be no doubt of that Socrates

Then reflect Cebes of all which has been said is not this the conclusion?—that the soul is in the very likeness of the divine and immortal and intellectual and uniform and indissoluble and unchangeable and that the body is in the very likeness of the human and mortal and unintellectual and multiform and dissoluble and changeable Can this my dear Cebes be denied?

It cannot

But if it be true then is not the body liable to speedy dissolution? and is not the soul almost or altogether indissoluble?

Certainly

And do you further observe that after a man is dead the body or visible part of him which is lying in the visible world and is called a corpse and would naturally be dissolved and decomposed and dissipated is not dissolved or decomposed at once but may remain for some time nay even for a long time if the constitution be sound at the time of death and the season of the year favourable? For the body when shrunk and embalmed as the manner is in Egypt may remain almost entire through infinite ages and even in decay there are still some portions such as the bones and ligaments, which are practically indestructible —Do you agree?

Yes

And is it likely that the soul which is invisible in passing to the place of the true Hades which like her is invisible and pure and noble and on her way to the good and wise God whither if God will my soul is also soon to go —that the soul I repeat if this be her nature and origin will be blown away and destroyed immediately on quitting the body as the many say? That can never be my dear Simmias and Cebes The truth rather is that the soul which is pure at departing and draws after her no bodily taint having never voluntarily during life had connection with the body which she is ever avoiding herself gathered into herself—and making such abstraction her perpetual study— which means that she has been a true disciple of philosophy [81] and therefore has in fact been always engaged in the practice of dying? For is not philosophy the study of death?—

Certainly—

That soul I say herself invisible departs to the invisible world—to the divine and immortal and rational thither arriving she is secure of bliss and is released from the error and folly of men their fears and wild passions and all other human ills and for ever dwells as they say of the initiated in company with the gods Is not this true Cebes?

Yes said Cebes beyond a doubt

But the soul which has been polluted and is impure at the time of her departure and is the

their life long do then sing more lustily than ever rejoicing in the thought that they are about to go away to the god [85] whose ministers they are But men because they are themselves afraid of death, slanderously affirm of the swans that they sing a lament at the last, not considering that no bird sings when cold, or hungry or in pain not even the nightingale nor the swallow nor yet the hoopoe which are said indeed to tune a lay of sorrow although I do not believe this to be true of them any more than of the swans But because they are sacred to Apollo they have the gift of prophecy and anticipate the good things of another world wherefore they sing and rejoice in that day more than ever they did before And I too, believing myself to be the consecrated servant of the same God and the fellow servant of the swans and thinking that I have received from my master gifts of prophecy which are not inferior to theirs, would not go out of life less merrily than the swans Never mind then, if this be your only objection, but speak and ask anything which you like, while the eleven magistrates of Athens allow

Very good Socrates said Simmias then I will tell you my difficulty and Cebes will tell you his I feel myself (and I dare say that you have the same feeling) how hard or rather impossible is the attainment of any certainty about questions such as these in the present life. And yet I should deem him a coward who did not prove what is said about them to the uttermost, or whose heart failed him before he had examined them on every side For he should persevere until he has achieved one of two things either he should discover or be taught the truth about them or if this be impossible I would have him take the best and most irrefragable of human theories, and let this be the raft upon which he sails through life—not without risk, as I admit, if he cannot find some word of God which will more surely and safely carry him. And now as you bid me, I will venture to question you, and then I shall not have to reproach myself hereafter with not having said at the time what I think For when I consider the matter either alone or with Cebes, the argument does certainly appear to me, Socrates to be not sufficient.

Socrates answered I dare say my friend that you may be right, but I should like to know in what respect the argument is insufficient

In this respect, replied Simmias —Suppose a person to use the same argument about harmony and the lyre—might he not say that harmony is a thing invisible [86] incorporeal perfect, divine existing in the lyre which is harmonized but that the lyre and the strings are matter and material composite earthy and akin to mortality? And when some one breaks the lyre, or cuts and rends the strings then he who takes this view would argue as you do and on the same analogy that the harmony survives and has not perished—you cannot imagine, he would say that the lyre without the strings, and the broken strings themselves which are mortal remain, and yet that the harmony which is of heavenly and immortal nature and kindred, has perished—perished before the mortal The harmony must still be somewhere, and the wood and strings will decay before anything can happen to that. The thought, Socrates must have occurred to your own mind that such is our conception of the soul and that when the body is in a manner strung and held together by the elements of hot and cold wet and dry then the soul is the harmony or due proportionate admixture of them But if so whenever the strings of the body are unduly loosened or overstrained through disease or other injury then the soul though most divine, like other harmonies of music or of works of art, of course perishes at once although the material remains of the body may last for a considerable time until they are either decayed or burnt. And if any one maintains that the soul being the harmony of the elements of the body is first to perish in that which is called death, how shall we answer him?

Socrates looked fixedly at us as his manner was and said with a smile Simmias has reason on his side and why does not some one of you who is better able than myself answer him? for there is force in his attack upon me But perhaps before we answer him we had better also hear what Cebes has to say that we may gain time for reflection, and when they have both spoken we may either assent to them, if there is truth in what they say or if not, we will maintain our position Please to tell me then Cebes, he said what was the difficulty which troubled you?

Cebes said I will tell you. My feeling is that the argument is where it was, and open to the same objections which were urged before [87] for I am ready to admit that the existence of the soul before entering into the bodily form has been very ingeniously and if I may say so quite sufficiently proven but the existence of istence through the bars of a prison not in and through herself she was wallowing in the mire of every sort of ignorance and by reason of lust had become the principal accomplice in her own captivity [83] This was her original state and then as I was saying and as the lovers of knowledge are well aware philosophy seeing how terrible was her confinement of which she was to herself the cause received and gently comforted her and sought to release her pointing out that the eye and the ear and the other senses are full of deception and persuading her to retire from them and abstain from all but the necessary use of them and be gathered up and collected into herself bidding her trust in herself and her own pure appre*hension of pure existence and to mistrust what ever comes to her through other channels and* is subject to variation for such things are visible and tangible but what she sees in her own nature is intelligible and invisible And the soul of the true philosopher thinks that she ought not to resist this deliverance and therefore abstains from pleasures and desires and pains and fears as far as she is able reflecting that when a man has great joys or sorrows or fears or desires he suffers from them not mere*ly the sort of evil which might be anticipated* —as for example the loss of his health or property which he has sacrificed to his lusts—but an evil greater far which is the greatest and worst of all evils and one of which he never thinks

What is it Socrates? said Cebes

The evil is that when the feeling of pleasure or pain is most intense every soul of man imagines the objects of this intense feeling to be then plainest and truest but this is not so they are really the things of sight

Very true

And is not this the state in which the soul is most enthralled by the body?

How so?

Why because each pleasure and pain is a sort of nail which nails and rivets the soul to the body until she becomes like the body and believes that to be true which the body affirms to be true and from agreeing with the body and having the same delights she is obliged to have the same habits and haunts and is not likely ever to be pure at her departure to the world below but is always infected by the body, and so she sinks into another body and there germinates and grows and has therefore no part in the communion of the divine and pure and simple

Most true Socrates answered Cebes

And this Cebes is the reason why the true lovers of knowledge are temperate and brave and not for the reason which the world gives.

Certainly not! The soul of a philosopher will reason in quite another way she will not ask philosophy to release her in order that when released she may deliver herself up again to the thraldom of pleasures and pains doing a work only to be undone again weaving instead of unweaving her Penelope s web But she will calm passion and follow reason and dwell in the contemplation of her beholding the true and divine (which is not matter of opinion) and thence deriving nourishment Thus she seeks to live while she lives and after death she hopes to go to her own kindred and to that which is like her and to be freed from human ills Never fear Simmias and Cebes that a soul which has been thus nurtured and has had these pursuits will at her departure from the body be scattered and blown away by the winds and be nowhere and nothing

When Socrates had done speaking for a considerable time there was silence he himself appeared to be meditating as most of us were on what had been said only Cebes and Simmias spoke a few words to one another And Socrates observing them asked what they thought of the argument and whether there was anything wanting? For said he there are many points still open to suspicion and attack, if any one were disposed to sift the matter thoroughly Should you be considering some other matter I say no more but if you are still in doubt do not hesitate to say exactly what you think and let us have anything better which you can suggest and if you think that I can be of any use allow me to help you

Simmias said I must confess Socrates that doubts did arise in our minds and each of us was urging and inciting the other to put the question which we wanted to have answered but which neither of us liked to ask fearing that our importunity might be troublesome at such a time

Socrates replied with a smile O Simmias, what are you saying? I am not very likely to persuade other men that I do not regard my present situation as a misfortune if I cannot even persuade you that I am no worse off now than at any other time in my life Will you not allow that I have as much of the spirit of prophecy in me as the swans? For they when they perceive that they must die having sung all

Ech What followed?

Phaed You shall hear for I was close to him on his right hand, seated on a sort of stool and he on a couch which was a good deal higher He stroked my head and pressed the hair upon my neck—he had a way of playing with my hair and then he said To morrow Phaedo I suppose that these fair locks of yours will be severed

Yes, Socrates I suppose that they will I replied

Not so if you will take my advice

What shall I do with them? I said

To-day he replied and not to-morrow if this argument dies and we cannot bring it to life again you and I will both shave our locks and if I were you and the argument got away from me, and I could not hold my ground against Simmias and Cebes I would myself take an oath like the Argives not to wear hair any more until I had renewed the conflict and defeated them

Yes I said but Heracles himself is said not to be a match for two

Summon me then he said and I will be your Iolaus until the sun goes down

I summon you rather I rejoined not as Heracles summoning Iolaus but as Iolaus might summon Heracles

That will do as well he said But first let us take care that we avoid a danger

Of what nature? I said

Lest we become misologists he replied no worse thing can happen to a man than this For as there are misanthropists or haters of men there are also misologists or haters of ideas and both spring from the same cause which is ignorance of the world Misanthropy arises out of the too great confidence of inexperience —you trust a man and think him altogether true and sound and faithful and then in a little while he turns out to be false and knavish and then another and another and when this has happened several times to a man especially when it happens among those whom he deems to be his own most trusted and familiar friends and he has often quarrelled with them he at last hates all men and believes that no one has any good in him at all You must have observed this trait of character?

I have

And is not the feeling discreditable? Is it not obvious that such an one having to deal with other men, was clearly without any experience of human nature for experience would have taught him the true state of the case, [90] that few are the good and few the evil and that the great majority are in the interval between them

What do you mean? I said

I mean he replied as you might say of the very large and very small—that nothing is more uncommon than a very large or very small man and this applies generally to all extremes whether of great and small or swift and slow or fair and foul or black and white and whether the instances you select be men or dogs or anything else few are the extremes, but many are in the mean between them Did you never observe this?

Yes I said I have

And do you not imagine he said that if there were a competition in evil the worst would be found to be very few?

Yes that is very likely I said

Yes that is very likely he replied although in this respect arguments are unlike men—there I was led on by you to say more than I had intended but the point of comparison was that when a simple man who has no skill in dialectics believes an argument to be true which he afterwards imagines to be false whether really false or not and then another and another he has no longer any faith left and great disputers as you know come to think at last that they have grown to be the wisest of mankind for they alone perceive the utter unsoundness and instability of all arguments or indeed of all things which like the currents in the Euripus are going up and down in never-ceasing ebb and flow

That is quite true I said

Yes, Phaedo he replied and how melancholy if there be such a thing as truth or certainty or possibility of knowledge—that a man should have lighted upon some argument or other which at first seemed true and then turned out to be false and instead of blaming himself and his own want of wit because he is annoyed should at last be too glad to transfer the blame from himself to arguments in general and for ever afterwards should hate and revile them and lose truth and the knowledge of realities

Yes indeed I said that is very melancholy

Let us then in the first place he said be careful of allowing or of admitting into our souls the notion that there is no health or soundness in any arguments at all Rather say that we have not yet attained to soundness in ourselves and that we must struggle manfully and do our best to gain health of mind—you and all other men having regard to the whole

the soul after death is still in my judgment unproven Now my objection is not the same as that of Simmias for I am not disposed to deny that the soul is stronger and more lasting than the body being of opinion that in all such respects the soul very far excels the body Well then says the argument to me why do you remain unconvinced?—When you see that the weaker continues in existence after the man is dead will you not admit that the more lasting must also survive during the same period of time? Now I will ask you to consider whether the objection which like Simmias I will express in a figure is of any weight The analogy which I will adduce is that of an old weaver who dies and after his death somebody says —He is not dead he must be alive —see there is the coat which he himself wove and wore and which remains whole and undecayed And then he proceeds to ask of some one who is incredulous whether a man lasts longer or the coat which is in use and wear and when he is answered that a man lasts far longer thinks that he has thus certainly demonstrated the survival of the man who is the more lasting because the less lasting remains But that Simmias as I would beg you to remark is a mistake any one can see that he who talks thus is talking nonsense For the truth is that the weaver aforesaid having woven and worn many such coats outlived several of them and was outlived by the last but a man is not therefore proved to be slighter and weaker than a coat Now the relation of the body to the soul may be expressed in a similar figure and any one may very fairly say in like manner that the soul is lasting and the body weak and shortlived in comparison He may argue in like manner that every soul wears out many bodies especially if a man live many years While he is alive the body deliquesces and decays and the soul always weaves another garment and repairs the waste But of course whenever the soul perishes she must have on her last garment and this will survive her and then at length when the soul is dead the body will show its native weakness and quickly decompose and pass away I would therefore rather not rely on the argument from superior strength to prove the continued existence of the soul after death [88] For granting even more than you affirm to be possible and acknowledging not only that the soul existed before birth but also that the souls of some exist and will continue to exist after death and will be born and die again and that there is a natural strength in the soul which will hold out and be born many times—nevertheless we may be still inclined to think that she will weary in the labours of successive births and may at last succumb in one of her deaths and utterly perish and this death and dissolution of the body which brings destruction to the soul may be unknown to any of us for no one of us can have had any experience of it and if so then I maintain that he who is confident about death has but a foolish confidence, unless he is able to prove that the soul is altogether immortal and imperishable But if he cannot prove the soul s immortality he who is about to die will always have reason to fear that when the body is disunited the soul also may utterly perish

All of us as we afterwards remarked to one another had an unpleasant feeling at hearing what they said When we had been so firmly convinced before now to have our faith shaken seemed to introduce a confusion and uncertainty not only into the previous argument, but into any future one either we were incapable of forming a judgment or there were no grounds of belief

Ech There I feel with you—by heaven I do Phaedo and when you were speaking I was beginning to ask myself the same question What argument can I ever trust again? For what could be more convincing than the argument of Socrates which has now fallen into discredit? That the soul is a harmony is a doctrine which has always had a wonderful attraction for me and when mentioned came back to me at once as my own original conviction And now I must begin again and find another argument which will assure me that when the man is dead the soul survives Tell me, I implore you how did Socrates proceed? Did he appear to share the unpleasant feeling which you mention? or did he calmly meet the attack? And did he answer forcibly or feebly? Narrate what passed as exactly as you can

Phaed Often Echecrates I have wondered at Socrates but never more than on that occasion [89] That he should be able to answer was nothing but what astonished me was first, the gentle and pleasant and approving manner in which he received the words of the young men and then his quick sense of the wound which had been inflicted by the argument and the readiness with which he healed it He might be compared to a general rallying his defeated and broken army urging them to accompany him and return to the field of argument that a harmony or any other composition can be in a state other than that of the elements, out of which it is compounded

Certainly not.

Or do or suffer anything other than they do or suffer?

He agreed.

Then a harmony does not, properly speaking, lead the parts or elements which make up the harmony, but only follows them.

He assented.

For harmony cannot possibly have any motion, or sound, or other quality which is opposed to its parts.

That would be impossible, he replied.

And does not the nature of every harmony depend upon the manner in which the elements are harmonized?

I do not understand you, he said.

I mean to say that a harmony admits of degrees, and is more of a harmony, and more completely a harmony, when more truly and fully harmonized, to any extent which is possible; and less of a harmony, and less completely a harmony, when less truly and fully harmonized.

True.

But does the soul admit of degrees? or is one soul in the very least degree more or less, or more or less completely, a soul than another?

Not in the least.

Yet surely of two souls, one is said to have intelligence and virtue, and to be good, and the other to have folly and vice, and to be an evil soul: and this is said truly?

Yes, truly.

But what will those who maintain the soul to be a harmony say of this presence of virtue and vice in the soul?—will they say that here is another harmony, and another discord, and that the virtuous soul is harmonized, and herself being a harmony has another harmony within her, and that the vicious soul is inharmonical and has no harmony within her?

I cannot tell, replied Simmias; but I suppose that something of the sort would be asserted by those who say that the soul is a harmony.

And we have already admitted that no soul is more a soul than another; which is equivalent to admitting that harmony is not more or less harmony, or more or less completely a harmony?

Quite true.

And that which is not more or less a harmony is not more or less harmonized?

True.

And that which is not more or less harmonized cannot have more or less of harmony, but only an equal harmony?

Yes, an equal harmony.

Then one soul not being more or less absolutely a soul than another, is not more or less harmonized?

Exactly.

And therefore has neither more nor less of discord, nor yet of harmony?

She has not.

And having neither more nor less of harmony or of discord, one soul has no more vice or virtue than another, if vice be discord and virtue harmony?

Not at all more.

[94] Or speaking more correctly, Simmias, the soul, if she is a harmony, will never have any vice; because a harmony, being absolutely a harmony, has no part in the inharmonical.

No.

And therefore a soul which is absolutely a soul has no vice?

How can she have, if the previous argument holds?

Then, if all souls are equally by their nature souls, all souls of all living creatures will be equally good?

I agree with you, Socrates, he said.

And can all this be true, think you? he said; for these are the consequences which seem to follow from the assumption that the soul is a harmony?

It cannot be true.

Once more, he said, what ruler is there of the elements of human nature other than the soul, and especially the wise soul? Do you know of any?

Indeed, I do not.

And is the soul in agreement with the affections of the body? or is she at variance with them? For example, when the body is hot and thirsty, does not the soul incline us against drinking? and when the body is hungry, against eating? And this is only one instance out of ten thousand of the opposition of the soul to the things of the body.

Very true.

But we have already acknowledged that the soul, being a harmony, can never utter a note at variance with the tensions and relaxations and vibrations and other affections of the strings out of which she is composed; she can only follow, she cannot lead them?

It must be so, he replied.

And yet do we not now discover the soul

of your future life and I myself in the prospect of death [91] For at this moment I am sensible that I have not the temper of a philosopher like the vulgar I am only a partisan Now the partisan when he is engaged in a dispute cares nothing about the rights of the question but is anxious only to convince his hearers of his own assertions And the difference between him and me at the present moment is merely this—that whereas he seeks to convince his hearers that what he says is true I am rather seeking to convince myself to convince my hearers is a secondary matter with me And do but see how much I gain by the argument For if what I say is true then I do well to be persuaded of the truth but if there be nothing after death still during the short time that remains I shall not distress my friends with lamentations and my ignorance will not last but will die with me and therefore no harm will be done This is the state of mind Simmias and Cebes in which I approach the argument And I would ask you to be thinking of the truth and not of Socrates agree with me if I seem to you to be speaking the truth or if not withstand me might and main that I may not deceive you as well as myself in my enthusiasm and like the bee leave my sting in you before I die

And now let us proceed he said And first of all let me be sure that I have in my mind what you were saying Simmias if I remember rightly has fears and misgivings whether the soul although a fairer and diviner thing than the body being as she is in the form of harmony may not perish first On the other hand Cebes appeared to grant that the soul was more lasting than the body but he said that no one could know whether the soul after having worn out many bodies might not perish herself and leave her last body behind her and that this is death which is the destruction not of the body but of the soul for in the body the work of destruction is ever going on Are not these Simmias and Cebes the points which we have to consider?

They both agreed to this statement of them

He proceeded And did you deny the force of the whole preceding argument or of a part only?

Of a part only they replied

And what did you think he said of that part of the argument in which we said that knowledge was recollection and hence inferred that the soul must have previously existed somewhere else [92] before she was enclosed in the body?

Cebes said that he had been wonderfully impressed by that part of the argument and that his conviction remained absolutely unshaken Simmias agreed and added that he himself could hardly imagine the possibility of his ever thinking differently

But rejoined Socrates you will have to think differently my Theban friend if you still maintain that harmony is a compound and that the soul is a harmony which is made out of strings set in the frame of the body for you will surely never allow yourself to say that a harmony is prior to the elements which compose it

Never Socrates

But do you not see that this is what you imply when you say that the soul existed before she took the form and body of man and was made up of elements which as yet had no existence? For harmony is not like the soul as you suppose but first the lyre and the strings, and the sounds exist in a state of discord and then harmony is made last of all and perishes first. And how can such a notion of the soul as this agree with the other?

Not at all replied Simmias

And yet he said there surely ought to be harmony in a discourse of which harmony is the theme?

There ought replied Simmias

But there is no harmony he said in the two propositions that knowledge is recollection, and that the soul is a harmony Which of them will you retain?

I think he replied that I have a much stronger faith Socrates in the first of the two, which has been fully demonstrated to me than in the latter which has not been demonstrated at all but rests only on probable and plausible grounds and is therefore believed by the many I know too well that these arguments from probabilities are impostors and unless great caution is observed in the use of them they are apt to be deceptive—in geometry and in other things too But the doctrine of knowledge and recollection has been proven to me on trustworthy grounds and the proof was that the soul must have existed before she came into the body because to her belongs the essence of which the very name implies existence Havin as I am convinced rightly accepted this conclusion and on sufficient grounds I must as I suppose cease to argue or allow others to argue that the soul is a harmony

Let me put the matter Simmias he said, in another point of view [93] Do you imagine was fascinated by them to such a degree that my eyes grew blind to things which I had seemed to myself and also to others to know quite well I forgot what I had before thought self-evident truths e g such a fact as that the growth of man is the result of eating and drinking for when by the digestion of food flesh is added to flesh and bone to bone and whenever there is an aggregation of congenial elements, the lesser bulk becomes larger and the small man great Was not that a reasonable notion?

Yes, said Cebes, I think so

Well but let me tell you something more There was a time when I thought that I understood the meaning of greater and less pretty well and when I saw a great man standing by a little one, I fancied that one was taller than the other by a head or one horse would appear to be greater than another horse and still more clearly did I seem to perceive that ten is two more than eight and that two cubits are more than one because two is the double of one

And what is now your notion of such matters? said Cebes

I should be far enough from imagining he replied, that I knew the cause of any of them by heaven I should for I cannot satisfy myself that [97] when one is added to one the one to which the addition is made becomes two or that the two units added together make two by reason of the addition I cannot understand how when separated from the other each of them was one and not two and now when they are brought together the mere juxtaposition or meeting of them should be the cause of their becoming two neither can I understand how the division of one is the way to make two for then a different cause would produce the same effect—as in the former instance the addition and juxtaposition of one to one was the cause of two in this the separation and subtraction of one from the other would be the cause Nor am I any longer satisfied that I understand the reason why one or anything else is either generated or destroyed or is at all but I have in my mind some confused notion of a new method and can never admit the other

Then I heard some one reading as he said from a book of Anaxagoras, that mind was the disposer and cause of all and I was delighted with this notion which appeared quite admirable, and I said to myself If mind is the disposer mind will dispose all for the best and put each particular in the best place and I argued that if any one desired to find out the cause of the generation or destruction or existence of any thing he must find out what state of being or doing or suffering was best for that thing and therefore a man had only to consider the best for himself and others, and then he would also know the worse since the same science comprehended both And I rejoiced to think that I had found in Anaxagoras a teacher of the causes of existence such as I desired and I imagined that he would tell me first whether the earth is flat or round and whichever was true he would proceed to explain the cause and the necessity of this being so and then he would teach me the nature of the best and show that this was best and if he said that the earth was in the centre he would further explain that this position was the best and I should be satisfied with the explanation given and not want any other sort of cause [98] And I thought that I would then go on and ask him about the sun and moon and stars and that he would explain to me their comparative swiftness, and their returnings and various states, active and passive and how all of them were for the best For I could not imagine that when he spoke of mind as the disposer of them he would give any other account of their being as they are except that this was best and I thought that when he had explained to me in detail the cause of each and the cause of all he would go on to explain to me what was best for each and what was good for all These hopes I would not have sold for a large sum of money and I seized the books and read them as fast as I could in my eagerness to know the better and the worse

What expectations I had formed and how grievously was I disappointed! As I proceeded I found my philosopher altogether forsaking mind or any other principle of order but having recourse to air and ether and water and other eccentricities I might compare him to a person who began by maintaining generally that mind is the cause of the actions of Socrates but who when he endeavoured to explain the causes of my several actions in detail went on to show that I sit here because my body is made up of bones and muscles and the bones as he would say are hard and have joints which divide them and the muscles are elastic, and they cover the bones which have also a covering or environment of flesh and skin which contains them and as the bones are lifted at their joints by the contraction or relaxation of the muscles, I am able to bend my limbs, and to be doing the exact opposite—leading the elements of which she is believed to be composed almost always opposing and coercing them in all sorts of ways throughout life sometimes more violently with the pains of medicine and gymnastic then again more gently now threatening now admonishing the desires passions fears as if talking to a thing which is not herself as Homer in the Odyssey represents Odysseus doing in the words

He beat his breast and thus reproached his heart
Endure my heart far worse hast thou endured!

Do you think that Homer wrote this under the idea that the soul is a harmony capable of being led by the affections of the body and not rather of a nature which should lead and master them—herself a far diviner thing than any harmony?

Yes Socrates I quite think so

Then my friend we can never be right in saying that the soul is a harmony [95] for we should contradict the divine Homer and contradict ourselves

True he said

Thus much said Socrates of Harmonia your Theban goddess who has graciously yielded to us but what shall I say Cebes to her husband Cadmus and how shall I make peace with him?

I think that you will discover a way of propitiating him said Cebes I am sure that you have put the argument with Harmonia in a manner that I could never have expected For when Simmias was mentioning his difficulty I quite imagined that no answer could be given to him and therefore I was surprised at finding that his argument could not sustain the first onset of yours and not impossibly the other whom you call Cadmus may share a similar fate

Nay my good friend said Socrates let us not boast lest some evil eye should put to flight the word which I am about to speak That however may be left in the hands of those above while I draw near in Homeric fashion and try the mettle of your words Here lies the point —You want to have it proven to you that the soul is imperishable and immortal and the philosopher who is confident in death appears to you to have but a vain and foolish confidence if he believes that he will fare better in the world below than one who has led another sort of life unless he can prove this and you say that the demonstration of the strength and divinity of the soul and of her existence prior to our becoming men does not necessarily imply her immortality Admitting the soul to be long lived and to have known and done much in a former state still she is not on that account immortal and her entrance into the human form may be a sort of disease which is the beginning of dissolution and may at last, after the toils of life are over end in that which is called death And whether the soul enters into the body once only or many times does not, as you say make any difference in the fears of individuals For any man who is not devoid of sense must fear if he has no knowledge and can give no account of the soul s immortality This or something like this I suspect to be your notion Cebes and I designedly recur to it in order that nothing may escape us, and that you may if you wish add or subtract anything

But said Cebes as far as I see at present, I have nothing to add or subtract I mean what you say that I mean

Socrates paused awhile and seemed to be absorbed in reflection At length he said You are raising a tremendous question Cebes involving the whole nature of generation and corruption [96] about which if you like, I will give you my own experience and if anything which I say is likely to avail towards the solution of your difficulty you may make use of it

I should very much like said Cebes, to hear what you have to say

Then I will tell you said Socrates When I was young Cebes I had a prodigious desire to know that department of philosophy which is called the investigation of nature to know the causes of things and why a thing is and is created or destroyed appeared to me to be a lofty profession and I was always agitating myself with the consideration of questions such as these —Is the growth of animals the result of some decay which the hot and cold principle contracts as some have said? Is the blood the element with which we think or the air or the fire? or perhaps nothing of the kind—but the brain may be the originating power of the perceptions of hearing and sight and smell and memory and opinion may come from them, and science may be based on memory and opinion when they have attained fixity And then I went on to examine the corruption of them and then to the things of heaven and earth and at last I concluded myself to be utterly and absolutely incapable of these enquiries as I will satisfactorily prove to you For all beautiful things become beautiful. This appears to me to be the safest answer which I can give, either to myself or to another, and to this I cling, in the persuasion that this principle will never be overthrown, and that to myself or to any one who asks the question, I may safely reply That by beauty beautiful things become beautiful. Do you not agree with me?

I do.

And that by greatness only great things become great and greater greater, and by smallness the less become less?

True.

Then if a person were to remark that A is taller by a head than B [101] and B less by a head than A, you would refuse to admit his statement, and would stoutly contend that what you mean is only that the greater is greater by, and by reason of, greatness, and the less is less only by, and by reason of, smallness; and thus you would avoid the danger of saying that the greater is greater and the less less by the measure of the head, which is the same in both, and would also avoid the monstrous absurdity of supposing that the greater man is greater by reason of the head, which is small. You would be afraid to draw such an inference, would you not?

Indeed, I should, said Cebes, laughing.

In like manner you would be afraid to say that ten exceeded eight by, and by reason of, two; but would say by, and by reason of, number; or you would say that two cubits exceed one cubit not by a half, but by magnitude?—for there is the same liability to error in all these cases.

Very true, he said.

Again, would you not be cautious of affirming that the addition of one to one, or the division of one, is the cause of two? And you would loudly asseverate that you know of no way in which anything comes into existence except by participation in its own proper essence, and consequently, as far as you know, the only cause of two is the participation in duality—this is the way to make two, and the participation in one is the way to make one. You would say: I will let alone puzzles of division and addition—wiser heads than mine may answer them; inexperienced as I am, and ready to start, as the proverb says, at my own shadow, I cannot afford to give up the sure ground of a principle. And if any one assails you there, you would not mind him, or answer him until you had seen whether the consequences which follow agree with one another or not, and when you are further required to give an explanation of this principle, you would go on to assume a higher principle, and a higher, until you found a resting-place in the best of the higher; but you would not confuse the principle and the consequences in your reasoning, like the Eristics—at least if you wanted to discover real existence. Not that this confusion signifies to them, who never care or think about the matter at all, for they have the wit to be well pleased with themselves however great may be the turmoil of their ideas. [102] But you, if you are a philosopher, will certainly do as I say.

What you say is most true, said Simmias and Cebes, both speaking at once.

Ech. Yes, Phaedo; and I do not wonder at their assenting. Any one who has the least sense will acknowledge the wonderful clearness of Socrates' reasoning.

Phaed. Certainly, Echecrates; and such was the feeling of the whole company at the time.

Ech. Yes, and equally of ourselves, who were not of the company, and are now listening to your recital. But what followed?

Phaed. After all this had been admitted, and they had agreed that ideas exist, and that other things participate in them and derive their names from them, Socrates, if I remember rightly, said:—

This is your way of speaking; and yet when you say that Simmias is greater than Socrates and less than Phaedo, do you not predicate of Simmias both greatness and smallness?

Yes, I do.

But still you allow that Simmias does not really exceed Socrates, as the words may seem to imply, because he is Simmias, but by reason of the size which he has; just as Simmias does not exceed Socrates because he is Simmias, any more than because Socrates is Socrates, but because he has smallness when compared with the greatness of Simmias?

True.

And if Phaedo exceeds him in size, this is not because Phaedo is Phaedo, but because Phaedo has greatness relatively to Simmias, who is comparatively smaller?

That is true.

And therefore Simmias is said to be great, and is also said to be small, because he is in a mean between them, exceeding the smallness of the one by his greatness, and allowing the greatness of the other to exceed his smallness. He added, laughing, I am speaking like a book, but I believe that what I am saying is true.

this is why I am sitting here in a curved posture—that is what he would say and he would have a similar explanation of my talking to you, which he would attribute to sound and air, and hearing and he would assign ten thousand other causes of the same sort forgetting to mention the true cause which is that the Athenians have thought fit to condemn me and accordingly I have thought it better and more right to remain here and undergo my sentence [99] for I am inclined to think that these muscles and bones of mine would have gone off long ago to Megara or Boeotia—by the dog they would if they had been moved only by their own idea of what was best and if I had not chosen the better and nobler part, instead of playing truant and running away of enduring any punishment which the state inflicts There is surely a strange confusion of causes and conditions in all this It may be said indeed that without bones and muscles and the other parts of the body I cannot execute my purposes But to say that I do as I do because of them and that this is the way in which mind acts and not from the choice of the best is a very careless and idle mode of speaking I wonder that they cannot distinguish the cause from the condition which the many feeling about in the dark are always mistaking and misnaming And thus one man makes a vortex all round and steadies the earth by the heaven another gives the air as a support to the earth which is a sort of broad trough Any power which in arranging them as they are arranges them for the best never enters into their minds and instead of finding any superior strength in it they rather expect to discover another Atlas of the world who is stronger and more everlasting and more containing than the good—of the obligatory and containing power of the good they think nothing and yet this is the principle which I would fain learn if any one would teach me But as I have failed either to discover myself or to learn of any one else the nature of the best I will exhibit to you if you like what I have found to be the second best mode of enquiring into the cause

I should very much like to hear he replied

Socrates proceeded I thought that as I had failed in the contemplation of true existence I ought to be careful that I did not lose the eye of my soul as people may injure their bodily eye by observing and gazing on the sun during an eclipse unless they take the precaution of only looking at the image reflected in the water or in some similar medium So in my own case I was afraid that my soul might be blinded altogether if I looked at things with my eyes or tried to apprehend them by the help of the senses And I thought that I had better have recourse to the world of mind and seek there the truth of existence [100] I dare say that the simile is not perfect—for I am very far from admitting that he who contemplates existences through the medium of thought, sees them only through a glass darkly any more than he who considers them in action and operation However this was the method which I adopted I first assumed some principle which I judged to be the strongest and then I affirmed as true whatever seemed to agree with this, whether relating to the cause or to anything else and that which disagreed I regarded as untrue But I should like to explain my meaning more clearly as I do not think that you as yet understand me

No indeed replied Cebes not very well

There is nothing new, he said in what I am about to tell you but only what I have been always and everywhere repeating in the previous discussion and on other occasions I want to show you the nature of that cause which has occupied my thoughts I shall have to go back to those familiar words which are in the mouth of every one and first of all assume that there is an absolute beauty and goodness and greatness and the like grant me this and I hope to be able to show you the nature of the cause and to prove the immortality of the soul

Cebes said You may proceed at once with the proof for I grant you this

Well he said then I should like to know whether you agree with me in the next step for I cannot help thinking if there be anything beautiful other than absolute beauty should there be such that it can be beautiful only in so far as it partakes of absolute beauty—and I should say the same of everything Do you agree in this notion of the cause?

Yes he said I agree

He proceeded I know nothing and can understand nothing of any other of those wise causes which are alleged and if a person says to me that the bloom of colour or form or any such thing is a source of beauty I leave all that which is only confusing to me, and simply and singly and perhaps foolishly hold and am assured in my own mind that nothing makes a thing beautiful but the presence and participation of beauty in whatever way or manner obtained for as to the manner I am uncertain but I stoutly contend that by beauty

t all beautiful things become beautiful This appears to me to be the safest answer which I can give either to myself or to another and to this I clin in the persuas on that this princi ple will never be overthrov n and that to my self or to any one v ho asks the question I may safely reply Th t by beauty beautiful things become bea tiful Do you not agree with me?

I do

And that by greatness only great things become great and greater greater and by small ness the less become less?

True.

Then if a person were to remark that A is taller by a head than B [101] and B less by a head than A, you would refuse to admit his statement, and v ould stoutly contend that what you mean i only that the greater is great er by and by reason of greatness and the less is less only by and by reason of smallness and thus you would avo d the danger of saying that the greater is greater and the less less by the measure of the head, v hich is the same in both and would also avoid the monstrous absurdity of suppo ing that the greater man is greater by reason of the head, which is small You would be afraid to draw such an infer ence would you not?

Indeed I should said Cebes laughing

In like manner you v ould be afraid to say that ten exceeded eight by nd by reason of two but would say by nd by reason of num ber or you would say that two cubits exceed one cub t not by a half but by ma n tude?—for there is the same liability to error in all these cases

Very true he said

A ain uld you not be cautious of affirm ing that the add tion of one to one, or the di on f ne is the cause of two? A d you w uld l udly asse er te that you kno v of no way in wh h anything comes into existence ex cept by part ipation in its o n proper essence a d consequently as far as you know the only cause t two s the parti ipation in duality—th s is the way to m ake two and the participa t on in ne i the way to m ke one You would say I will let alone puzzles of division and add tion—w ser heads than mine may ans ver th m inexperienced as I am and ready to tart as the proverb says, at my own shado I cannot afford to g e up the sure ground of a principle And if any one assails you there, y u would not mind h m or answer him until you had seen v hether the consequ nces which fol w agree with one another or not, and when you are further required to give an ex planation of this principle you would go on to assume a higher principle, and a higher until you found a resting place in the best of the higher but you would not confuse the princi ple and the consequen s in your reasoning like the Eristi s—at least if you wanted to discover real ex stence Not that this confusion signifies to them who never care or think about the matter at all for they have the wit to be well pleased v ith themselves however great may be the turmoil of their ideas [102] But you if you are a philosopher will certainly do as I say

What you say is most true said Simmias and Cebes both speaking at once

Ech Yes Phaedo and I do not wonder at their assenting Any one who has the least sense will acknowledge the wonderful clear ness of Socrates reasoning

Phaed Certainly Echecrates and such was the feeling of the whole company at the time

Ech Yes and equally of ourselves who were not of the company and are now listening to your recital But v hat follo ved?

Phaed Aft r all this had been admitted and they had agreed that ideas ex st, and that other things participate in them and derive their names from them Socrates if I remember rightly said —

This is your way of speaking and yet when you say that Simmias is greater than Socrates and less than Phaedo do you not predicate of Simmias both greatness and smallness?

Yes I do

But still you allow that Simmias does not really exceed Socrates as the words may seem to imply because he is Simmias but by reason of the size which he has just as Simmias does not exceed Socrates because he is Simmias, any more than he is e Socrates is Socrates but because he has smallness when compared with the greatness of immias?

True

And if Phaedo exceeds him in size this is not because Phaedo is Phae lo but because Phaedo has greatness relatively to Simmias who is comparatively smaller?

That is true

And therefore Simmias is said to be great and is also sa d to be small because he is in a mean between them exceeding the smallness of the one by his greatness and allowing the g eatness of the other to exceed his smallr ess He added laughing I am speak ng l ke a book but I believe that what I am saying s true.

Simmias assented

I speak as I do because I want you to agree with me in thinking not only that absolute greatness will never be great and also small but that greatness in us or in the concrete will never admit the small or admit of being exceeded instead of this one of two things will happen, either the greater will fly or retire before the opposite which is the less or at the approach of the less has already ceased to exist but will not, if allowing or admitting of smallness be changed by that even as I having received and admitted smallness when compared with Simmias remain just as I was and am the same small person And as the idea of great ness cannot condescend ever to be or become small in like manner the smallness in us can not be or become great nor can any other opposite which remains the same ever be or be come its own opposite [103] but either passes away or perishes in the change

That replied Cebes is quite my notion

Hereupon one of the company though I do not exactly remember which of them said In heaven s name is not this the direct contrary of what was admitted before—that out of the greater came the less and out of the less the greater and that opposites were simply gener ated from opposites but now this principle seems to be utterly denied

Socrates inclined his head to the speaker and listened I like your courage he said in re minding us of this But you do not observe that there is a difference in the two cases For then we were speaking of opposites in the con crete and now of the essential opposite which as is affirmed neither in us nor in nature can ever be at variance with itself then my friend we were speaking of things in which opposites are inherent and which are called after them but now about the opposites which are inherent in them and which give their name to them and these essential opposites will never as we maintain admit of generation into or out of one another At the same time turning to Cebes he said Are you at all disconcerted Cebes at our friend s objection?

No I do not feel so said Cebes and yet I cannot deny that I am often disturbed by objections

Then we are agreed after all said Socrates that the opposite will never in any case be opposed to itself?

To that we are quite agreed he replied

Yet once more let me ask you to consider the question from another point of view and see whether you agree with me —There is a thing, which you term heat and another thing which you term cold?

Certainly

But are they the same as fire and snow?

Most assuredly not

Heat is a thing different from fire and cold is not the same with snow?

Yes

And yet you will surely admit that when snow as was before said is under the influence of heat they will not remain snow and heat, but at the advance of the heat the snow will either retire or perish?

Very true he replied

And the fire too at the advance of the cold will either retire or perish and when the fire is under the influence of the cold they will not remain as before fire and cold

That is true he said

And in some cases the name of the idea is not only attached to the idea in an eternal connection but anything else which not being the idea exists only in the form of the idea may also lay claim to it I will try to make this clearer by an example —The odd number is always called by the name of odd ?

Very true

But is this the only thing which is called odd? Are there not other things which have their own name [104] and yet are called odd, because although not the same as oddness they are never without oddness?—that is what I mean to ask—whether numbers such as the number three are not of the class of odd And there are many other examples would you not say for example that three may be called by its proper name and also be called odd which is not the same with three? and this may be said not only of three but also of five and of every alternate number—each of them without being oddness is odd and in the same way two and four and the other series of alternate numbers, has every number even without being even ness Do you agree?

Of course

Then now mark the point at which I am aiming —not only do essential opposites ex clude one another but also concrete things, which although not in themselves opposed, contain opposites these I say likewise reject the idea which is opposed to that which is con tained in them and when it approaches them they either perish or withdraw For example Will not the number three endure annihilation or anything sooner than be converted into an even number while remaining three?

Very true, said Cebes.

And yet, he said, the number two is certainly not opposed to the number three?

It is not.

Then not only do opposite ideas repel the advance of one another, but also there are other natures which repel the approach of opposites.

Very true, he said.

Suppose, he said, that we endeavour, if possible, to determine what these are.

By all means.

Are they not, Cebes, such as compel the things of which they have possession, not only to take their own form, but also the form of some opposite?

What do you mean?

I mean, as I was just now saying, and as I am sure that you know, that those things which are possessed by the number three must not only be three in number, but must also be odd.

Quite true.

And on this oddness, of which the number three has the impress, the opposite idea will never intrude?

No.

And this impress was given by the odd principle?

Yes.

And to the odd is opposed the even?

True.

Then the idea of the even number will never arrive at three?

No.

Then three has no part in the even?

None.

Then the triad or number three is uneven?

Very true.

To return then to my distinction of natures which are not opposed, and yet do not admit opposites—as, in the instance given, three, although not opposed to the even, does not any the more admit of the even, but always brings the opposite into play on the other side; [105] or as two does not receive the odd, or fire the cold—from these examples (and there are many more of them) perhaps you may be able to arrive at the general conclusion, that not only opposites will not receive opposites, but also that nothing which brings the opposite will admit the opposite of that which it brings in that to which it is brought. And here let me recapitulate—for there is no harm in repetition. The number five will not admit the nature of the even, any more than ten, which is the double of five, will admit the nature of the odd. The double has another opposite, and is not strictly opposed to the odd, but nevertheless rejects the odd altogether. Nor again will parts in the ratio 3:2, nor any fraction in which there is a half, nor again in which there is a third, admit the notion of the whole, although they are not opposed to the whole. You will agree?

Yes, he said, I entirely agree and go along with you in that.

And now, he said, let us begin again; and do not you answer my question in the words in which I ask it: let me have not the old safe answer of which I spoke at first, but another equally safe, of which the truth will be inferred by you from what has been just said. I mean that if any one asks you "what that is, of which the inherence makes the body hot," you will reply not heat (this is what I call the safe and stupid answer), but fire, a far superior answer, which we are now in a condition to give. Or if any one asks you "why a body is diseased," you will not say from disease, but from fever; and instead of saying that oddness is the cause of odd numbers, you will say that the monad is the cause of them: and so of things in general, as I dare say that you will understand sufficiently without my adducing any further examples.

Yes, he said, I quite understand you.

Tell me, then, what is that of which the inherence will render the body alive?

The soul, he replied.

And is this always the case?

Yes, he said, of course.

Then whatever the soul possesses, to that she comes bearing life?

Yes, certainly.

And is there any opposite to life?

There is, he said.

And what is that?

Death.

Then the soul, as has been acknowledged, will never receive the opposite of what she brings.

Impossible, replied Cebes.

And now, he said, what did we just now call that principle which repels the even?

The odd.

And that principle which repels the musical or the just?

The unmusical, he said, and the unjust.

And what do we call that principle which does not admit of death?

The immortal, he said.

And does the soul admit of death?

No

Then the soul is immortal?

Yes he said

And may we say that this has been proven?

Yes abundantly proven Socrates he replied

[106] Supposing that the odd were imperishable must not three be imperishable?

Of course

And if that which is cold were imperishable when the warm principle came attacking the snow must not the snow have retired whole and unmelted—for it could never have perished nor could it have remained and admitted the heat?

True he said

Again if the uncooling or warm principle were imperishable the fire when assailed by cold would not have perished or have been extinguished but would have gone away unaffected?

Certainly he said

And the same may be said of the immortal if the immortal is also imperishable the soul when attacked by death cannot perish for the preceding argument shows that the soul will not admit of death or ever be dead any more than three or the odd number will admit of the even or fire or the heat in the fire of the cold Yet a person may say But although the odd will not become even at the approach of the even why may not the odd perish and the even take the place of the odd? Now to him who makes this objection we cannot answer that the odd principle is imperishable for this has not been acknowledged but if this had been acknowledged there would have been no difficulty in contending that at the approach of the even the odd principle and the number three took their departure and the same argument would have held good of fire and heat and any other thing

Very true

And the same may be said of the immortal if the immortal is also imperishable then the soul will be imperishable as well as immortal but if not some other proof of her imperishableness will have to be given

No other proof is needed he said for if the immortal being eternal is liable to perish then nothing is imperishable

Yes replied Socrates and yet all men will agree that God and the essential form of life and the immortal in general will never perish

Yes all men he said—that is true and what is more gods if I am not mistaken as well as men

Seeing then that the immortal is indestructible must not the soul if she is immortal be also imperishable?

Most certainly

Then when death attacks a man the mortal portion of him may be supposed to die, but the immortal retires at the approach of death and is preserved safe and sound?

True

Then Cebes, beyond question the soul is immortal and imperishable [107] and our souls will truly exist in another world!

I am convinced Socrates said Cebes, and have nothing more to object but if my friend Simmias or any one else has any further objection to make he had better speak out, and not keep silence since I do not know to what other season he can defer the discussion, if there is anything which he wants to say or to have said

But I have nothing more to say replied Simmias nor can I see any reason for doubt after what has been said But I still feel and cannot help feeling uncertain in my own mind when I think of the greatness of the subject and the feebleness of man

Yes Simmias replied Socrates that is well said and I may add that first principles even if they appear certain should be carefully considered and when they are satisfactorily ascertained then with a sort of hesitating confidence in human reason you may I think, follow the course of the argument and if that be plain and clear there will be no need for any further enquiry

Very true

But then O my friends he said if the soul is really immortal what care should be taken of her not only in respect of the portion of time which is called life but of eternity! And the danger of neglecting her from this point of view does indeed appear to be awful If death had only been the end of all the wicked would have had a good bargain in dying for they would have been happily quit not only of their body but of their own evil together with their souls But now inasmuch as the soul is manifestly immortal there is no release or salvation from evil except the attainment of the highest virtue and wisdom For the soul when on her progress to the world below takes nothing with her but nurture and education and these are said greatly to benefit or greatly to injure the departed at the very beginning of his journey thither

For after death

No

Then the soul is immortal?

Yes he said

And may we say that this has been proven?

Yes abundantly proven Socrates, he replied

For after death as they say the genius of each individual to whom he belonged in life leads him to a certain pla e in which the dead are gathered together whence after judgment has been gi en they pass into the world below following the guide who is appointed to con duct them from this world to the other and when they have there received their due and remained their time another guide brings them back again after many revolutions of ages Now this way to the other world is not [108] as Aeschylus says in the Telephus a single and strai ht path—if that were so no guide would be needed for no one could miss it but there are many partings of the road and windings as I infer from the rites and sacrifices which are offered to the gods below in places where three ways meet on earth The wise and order ly soul follows in the straight path and is con scious of her surroundings but the soul which desires the body and which as I was relating before, has long been fluttering about the life less frame and the world of sight, is after many struggles and many sufferin s hardly and with violence carried away by her attendant genius and when she arrives at the place where the other souls are gathered if she be impure and ha e d ne impure deeds whether foul murders or other crimes which are the brothers of these and the works of brothers in crime—from that soul every one flees and turns away no one will be her companion no one her guide but alone she wanders in extremity of evil until certain times are fulfilled and when they are fulfilled, he is borne irresist bly to her own fitting hab tation as every pure and just soul which has passed through life in the company and under the guidance of the gods has also her own proper home

Now the earth has divers wonderful regions and is indeed in nature and extent very unlike the notions f geographers as I believe on the authority of one who shall be nameless

What do you mean Socrates? said Simmias I ha e myself heard many descr ptions of the earth, but I do not know and I should very much like to kno v in which of these you put faith.

And I Simmias, replied Socr tes if I had the art of Glaucus would tell y u although I know not that the art of Glaucus could prove the truth of my tale, which I myself should nev er be able to prove and even if I could I fear Simmias, that my l fe would come to an end be re the argument was completed I may de scribe to y u, ho ever the form and regions of the earth acco d ng to my conception of them

That said Simmias will be enough

Well then he said my conviction is, that the earth is a round body in the centre of the heav ens and therefore has no need of air or of any similar force to be a support [109] but is kept there and hindered from falling or inclining any way by the equability of the surrounding heaven and by her own equipoise. For that which being in equipoise is in the centre of that which is equably diffused will not in cline any way in any degree, but will always remain in the same state and not deviate And this is my first notion

Which is surely a correct one said Sim mias

Also I believe that the earth is very vast and that we who dwell in the region extending from the river Phasis to the Pillars of Heracles inhabit a small portion only about the sea like ants or frogs about a marsh and that there are other inhabitants of many other like places for everywhere on the face of the earth there are hollows of various forms and sizes into which the water and the mist and the lower air col lect But the true earth is pure and situated in the pure heaven—there are the stars also and it is the heaven which is commonly spoken of by us as the ether and of which our own earth is the sediment gathering in the hollows be neath But we who live in these hollows are deceived into the notion that we are dwelling above on the surface of the earth which is just as if a creature who was at the bottom of the sea were to fancy that he was on the surface of the water and that the sea was the heaven through which he saw the sun and the other stars he having never come to the surface by reason of his feebleness and sluggishness and having never lifted up his head and seen nor ever heard from one who had seen how much purer and fairer the world above is than his own And such is exactly our case for we are dwelling in a hollow of the earth and fancy that we are on the surface and the air we call heaven in which we imagine that the stars move But the fact is, that owing to our feeble ness and sluggishness we are prevented from reaching the surface of the air for if any man could arrive at the exterior limit or take the wings of a bird and come to the top then like a fish who puts his head out of the water and sees this world he would see a world beyond and if the nature of man could sustain the s ght he would acknowledge that this other world was the place of the true heaven and the true light and the true earth [110] For our

Then the soul is immortal?

Very true

But then O my friends he said if the soul is really immortal what care should be taken of her not only in respect of the portion of time which is called life but of eternity! And the danger of neglecting her from this point of view does indeed appear to be awful If death had only been the end of all the wicked would have had a good bargain in dying for they would have been happily quit not only of their body but of their own evil together with their souls But now inasmuch as the soul is manifestly immortal there is no release or salvation from evil except the attainment of the highest virtue and wisdom For the soul when on her progress to the world below takes nothing with her but nurture and education and these are said greatly to benefit or greatly to injure the departed at the very beginning of his journey thither

For after death as they say the genius of each individual, to whom he belonged in life, leads him to a certain place in which the dead are gathered together whence after judgment has been given they pass into the world below, following the guide, who is appointed to conduct them from this world to the other: and when they have there received their due and remained their time, another guide brings them back again after many revolutions of ages. Now this way to the other world is not, [108] as Aeschylus says in the Telephus, a single and straight path—if that were so no guide would be needed, for no one could miss it; but there are many partings of the road, and windings, as I infer from the rites and sacrifices which are offered to the gods below in places where three ways meet on earth. The wise and orderly soul follows in the straight path and is conscious of her surroundings; but the soul which desires the body, and which, as I was relating before, has long been fluttering about the lifeless frame and the world of sight, is after many struggles and many sufferings hardly and with violence carried away by her attendant genius, and when she arrives at the place where the other souls are gathered, if she be impure and have done impure deeds, whether foul murders or other crimes which are the brothers of these, and the works of brothers in crime—from that soul every one flees and turns away; no one will be her companion, no one her guide, but alone she wanders in extremity of evil until certain times are fulfilled, and when they are fulfilled, she is borne irresistibly to her own fitting habitation; as every pure and just soul which has passed through life in the company and under the guidance of the gods has also her own proper home.

Now the earth has divers wonderful regions, and is indeed in nature and extent very unlike the notions of geographers, as I believe on the authority of one who shall be nameless.

What do you mean, Socrates? said Simmias. I have myself heard many descriptions of the earth, but I do not know, and I should very much like to know, in which of these you put faith.

And I, Simmias, replied Socrates, if I had the art of Glaucus would tell you; although I know not that the art of Glaucus could prove the truth of my tale, which I myself should never be able to prove, and even if I could, I fear, Simmias, that my life would come to an end before the argument was completed. I may describe to you, however, the form and regions of the earth according to my conception of them.

That, said Simmias, will be enough.

Well then, he said, my conviction is, that the earth is a round body in the centre of the heavens, and therefore has no need of air or of any similar force to be a support, [109] but is kept there and hindered from falling or inclining any way by the equability of the surrounding heaven and by her own equipoise. For that which, being in equipoise, is in the centre of that which is equably diffused, will not incline any way in any degree, but will always remain in the same state and not deviate. And this is my first notion.

Which is surely a correct one, said Simmias.

Also I believe that the earth is very vast, and that we who dwell in the region extending from the river Phasis to the Pillars of Heracles inhabit a small portion only about the sea, like ants or frogs about a marsh, and that there are other inhabitants of many other like places; for everywhere on the face of the earth there are hollows of various forms and sizes, into which the water and the mist and the lower air collect. But the true earth is pure and situated in the pure heaven—there are the stars also; and it is the heaven which is commonly spoken of by us as the ether, and of which our own earth is the sediment gathering in the hollows beneath. But we who live in these hollows are deceived into the notion that we are dwelling above on the surface of the earth; which is just as if a creature who was at the bottom of the sea were to fancy that he was on the surface of the water, and that the sea was the heaven through which he saw the sun and the other stars, he having never come to the surface by reason of his feebleness and sluggishness, and having never lifted up his head and seen, nor ever heard from one who had seen, how much purer and fairer the world above is than his own. And such is exactly our case: for we are dwelling in a hollow of the earth, and fancy that we are on the surface; and the air we call heaven, in which we imagine that the stars move. But the fact is, that owing to our feebleness and sluggishness we are prevented from reaching the surface of the air: for if any man could arrive at the exterior limit, or take the wings of a bird and come to the top, then like a fish who puts his head out of the water and sees this world, he would see a world beyond; and, if the nature of man could sustain the sight, he would acknowledge that this other world was the place of the true heaven and the true light and the true earth. [110] For our earth and the stones and the entire region which surrounds us are spoilt and corroded as in the sea all things are corroded by the brine, neither is there any noble or perfect growth but caverns only and sand and an endless slough of mud and even the shore is not to be compared to the fairer sights of this world And still less is this our world to be compared with the other Of that upper earth which is under the heaven I can tell you a charming tale Simmias which is well worth hearing

And we Socrates replied Simmias shall be charmed to listen to you

The tale my friend he said is as follows — In the first place the earth when looked at from above is in appearance streaked like one of those balls which have leather coverings in twelve pieces and is decked with various colours of which the colours used by painters on earth are in a manner samples But there the whole earth is made up of them and they are brighter far and clearer than ours there is a purple of wonderful lustre also the radiance of gold and the white which is in the earth is whiter than any chalk or snow Of these and other colours the earth is made up and they are more in number and fairer than the eye of man has ever seen the very hollows (of which I was speaking) filled with air and water have a colour of their own and are seen like light gleaming amid the diversity of the other colours so that the whole presents a single and continuous appearance of variety in unity And in this fair region everything that grows—trees and flowers and fruits—are in a like degree fairer than any here and there are hills having stones in them in a like degree smoother and more transparent and fairer in colour than our highly valued emeralds and sardonyxes and jaspers and other gems which are but minute fragments of them for there all the stones are like our precious stones and fairer still The reason is that they are pure and not like our precious stones infected or corroded by the corrupt briny elements which coagulate among us and which breed foulness and disease both in earth and stones as well as in animals and plants They are the jewels of the upper earth which also shines with gold and silver and the like [111] and they are set in the light of day and are large and abundant and in all places making the earth a sight to gladden the beholder s eye And there are animals and men some in a middle region others dwelling about the air as we dwell about the sea others in islands which the air flows round near the continent and in a word the air is used by them as the water and the sea are by us and the ether is to them what the air is to us Moreover the temperament of their seasons is such that they have no disease and live much longer than we do and have sight and hearing and smell and all the other senses in far greater perfection in the same proportion that air is purer than water or the ether than air Also they have temples and sacred places in which the gods really dwell and they hear their voices and receive their answers and are conscious of them and hold converse with them and they see the sun moon and stars as they truly are and their other blessedness is of a piece with this

Such is the nature of the whole earth and of the things which are around the earth and there are divers regions in the hollows on the face of the globe everywhere some of them deeper and more extended than that which we inhabit others deeper but with a narrower opening than ours and some are shallower and also wider All have numerous perforations and there are passages broad and narrow in the interior of the earth connecting them with one another and there flows out of and into them as into basins a vast tide of water and huge subterranean streams of perennial rivers and springs hot and cold and a great fire and great rivers of fire and streams of liquid mud thin or thick (like the rivers of mud in Sicily and the lava streams which follow them) and the regions about which they happen to flow are filled up with them And there is a swinging or see saw in the interior of the earth which moves all this up and down and is due to the following cause —There is a chasm which is the vastest of them all and pierces right through the whole earth [112] this is that chasm which Homer describes in the words and which he in other places and many other poets have called Tartarus And the see saw is caused by the streams flowing into and out of this chasm and they each have the nature of the soil through which they flow And the reason why the streams are always flowing in and out is that the watery element has no bed or bottom but is swinging and surging up and down and the surrounding wind and air do the same they follow the water up and down, ther and thither over the earth—just as in the act of respiration the air is always in process of inhalation and exhalation—and the wind swinging with the water in and out produces fearful and irresistible blasts when the waters retire with a rush into the lower parts of the earth, as they are called they flow through the earth in those regions and fill them up like water raised by a pump and then when they leave those regions and rush back hither they again fill the hollows here and when these are filled flow through subterranean channels and find their way to their several places forming seas, and lakes and rivers and springs Thence they again enter the earth some of them making a long circuit into many lands others going to a few places and not so distant and again fall into Tartarus some at a point a good deal lower than that at which they rose and others not much lower but all in some degree lower than the point from which they came And some burst forth again on the opposite side and some on the same side and some wind round the earth with one or many folds like the coils of a serpent and descend as far as they can but always return and fall into the chasm The rivers flowing in either direction can descend only to the centre and no further for opposite to the rivers is a precipice

> Far off where is the inmost depth beneath the earth

Now these rivers are many and mighty and diverse and there are four principal ones of which the greatest and outermost is that called Oceanus which flows round the earth in a circle and in the opposite direction flows Acheron, which passes under the earth through desert places into the Acherusian lake [113] this is the lake to the shores of which the souls of the many go when they are dead and after waiting an appointed time, which is to some a longer and to some a shorter time they are sent back to be born again as animals The third river passes out between the two and near the place of outlet pours into a vast region of fire and forms a lake larger than the Mediterranean Sea boiling with water and mud and proceeding muddy and turbid and winding about the earth comes among other places, to the extremities of the Acherusian lake, but mingles not with the waters of the lake and after making many coils about the earth plunges into Tartarus at a deeper level This is that Pyriphlegethon as the stream is called which throws up jets of fire in different parts of the earth The fourth river goes out on the opposite side, and falls first of all into a wild and savage region, which is all of a dark blue colour like lapis lazuli and this is that river which is called the Stygian river and falls into and forms the Lake Styx and after falling into the lake and receiving strange powers in the waters passes under the earth winding round in the opposite direction and comes near the Acherusian lake from the opposite side to Pyriphlegethon And the water of this river too mingles with no other but flows round in a circle and falls into Tartarus over against Pyriphlegethon and the name of the river as the poets say is Cocytus

Such is the nature of the other world and when the dead arrive at the place to which the genius of each severally guides them first of all they have sentence passed upon them as they have lived well and piously or not And those who appear to have lived neither well nor ill go to the river Acheron and embarking in any vessels which they may find are carried in them to the lake and there they dwell and are purified of their evil deeds and having suffered the penalty of the wrongs which they have done to others they are absolved and receive the rewards of their good deeds each of them according to his deserts But those who appear to be incurable by reason of the greatness of their crimes—who have committed many and terrible deeds of sacrilege murders foul and violent or the like—such are hurled into Tartarus which is their suitable destiny and they never come out Those again who have committed crimes which although great are not irremediable—who in a moment of anger for example have done some violence to a father or a mother [114] and have repented for the remainder of their lives or who have taken the life of another under the like extenuating circumstances—these are plunged into Tartarus the pains of which they are compelled to undergo for a year but at the end of the year the wave casts them forth—mere homicides by way of Cocytus parricides and matricides by Pyriphlegethon—and they are borne to the Acherusian lake and there they lift up their voices and call upon the victims whom they have slain or wronged to have pity on them and to be kind to them and let them come out into the lake And if they prevail then they come forth and cease from their troubles but if not they are carried back again into Tartarus and from thence into the rivers unceasingly until they obtain mercy from those whom they have wronged for that is the sentence inflicted upon them by their judges Those too who have been pre-eminent for holiness of

Such is the nature of the other world and when the dead arrive at the place to which the genius of each severally guides them first of all they have sentence passed upon them, as they have lived well and piously or not. And those who appear to have lived neither well nor ill go to the river Acheron, and embarking in any vessels which they may find, are carried in them to the lake, and there they dwell and are purified of their evil deeds, and having suffered the penalty of the wrongs which they have done to others, they are absolved, and receive the rewards of their good deeds, each of them according to his deserts But those who appear to be incurable by reason of the greatness of their crimes—who have committed many and terrible deeds of sacrilege murders foul and violent, or the like—such are hurled into Tartarus which is their suitable destiny and they never come out Those again who have committed crimes, which although great, are not irremediable—who in a moment of anger for example, have done some violence to a father or a mother [114] and have repented for the remainder of their lives, or who have taken the life of another under the like extenuating circumstances—these are plunged into Tartarus, the pains of which they are compelled to undergo for a year but at the end of the year the wave casts them forth—mere homicides by way of Cocytus, parricides and matricides by Pyriphlegethon—and they are borne to the Acherusian lake, and there they lift up their voices and call upon the victims whom they have slain or wronged, to have pity on them, and to be kind to them, and let them come out into the lake. And if they prevail then they come forth and cease from their troubles but if not, they are carried back again into Tartarus and from thence into the rivers unceasingly until they obtain mercy from those whom they have wronged for that is the sentence inflicted upon them by their judges. Those too who have been pre-eminent for holiness of life are released from this earthly prison and go to their pure home which is above and dwell in the purer earth and of these such as have duly purified themselves with philosophy live henceforth altogether without the body in mansions fairer still which may not be described and of which the time would fail me to tell

Wherefore Simmias seeing all these things what ought not we to do that we may obtain virtue and wisdom in this life? Fair is the prize and the hope great!

A man of sense ought not to say nor will I be very confident that the description which I have given of the soul and her mansions is exactly true But I do say that inasmuch as the soul is shown to be immortal he may venture to think, not improperly or unworthily that something of the kind is true The venture is a glorious one and he ought to comfort himself with words like these which is the reason why I lengthen out the tale Wherefore I say let a man be of good cheer about his soul who having cast away the pleasures and ornaments of the body as alien to him and working harm rather than good has sought after the pleasures of knowledge and has arrayed the soul not in some foreign attire but in her own proper jewels temperance and justice and courage and nobility [115] and truth—in these adorned she is ready to go on her journey to the world below when her hour comes You Simmias and Cebes and all other men will depart at some time or other Me already as a tragic poet would say the voice of fate calls Soon I must drink the poison and I think that I had better repair to the bath first in order that the women may not have the trouble of washing my body after I am dead

When he had done speaking Crito said And have you any commands for us Socrates —anything to say about your children or any other matter in which we can serve you?

Nothing particular Crito he replied only as I have always told you take care of yourselves that is a service which you may be ever rendering to me and mine and to all of us whether you promise to do so or not But if you have no thought for yourselves and care not to walk according to the rule which I have prescribed for you not now for the first time however much you may profess or promise at the moment it will be of no avail

We will do our best said Crito And in what way shall we bury you?

In any way that you like but you must get hold of me and take care that I do not run away from you Then he turned to us, and added with a smile —I cannot make Crito believe that I am the same Socrates who have been talking and conducting the argument he fancies that I am the other Socrates whom he will soon see a dead body—and he asks How shall he bury me? And though I have spoken many words in the endeavour to show that when I have drunk the poison I shall leave you and go to the joys of the blessed —these words of mine with which I was comforting you and myself have had as I perceive no effect upon Crito And therefore I want you to be surety for me to him now as at the trial he was surety to the judges for me but let the promise be of another sort for he was surety for me to the judges that I would remain and you must be my surety to him that I shall not remain but go away and depart and then he will suffer less at my death and not be grieved when he sees my body being burned or buried I would not have him sorrow at my hard lot or say at the burial Thus we lay out Socrates or Thus we follow him to the grave or bury him, for false words are not only evil in themselves but they infect the soul with evil Be of good cheer then my dear Crito and say that you are burying my body only [116] and do with that whatever is usual and what you think best

When he had spoken these words he arose and went into a chamber to bathe Crito followed him and told us to wait So we remained behind talking and thinking of the subject of discourse and also of the greatness of our sorrow he was like a father of whom we were being bereaved and we were about to pass the rest of our lives as orphans When he had taken the bath his children were brought to him—(he had two young sons and an elder one) and the women of his family also came and he talked to them and gave them a few directions in the presence of Crito then he dismissed them and returned to us

Now the hour of sunset was near for a good deal of time had passed while he was within When he came out he sat down with us again after his bath but not much was said Soon the jailer who was the servant of the Eleven entered and stood by him saying —To you Socrates whom I know to be the noblest and gentlest and best of all who ever came to this place I will not impute the angry feelings of other men who rage and swear at me when in obedience to the authorities I bid them drink the poison—indeed, I am sure that you will not be angry with me for others, as you are aware, and not I, are to blame. And so fare you well, and try to bear lightly what must needs be—you know my errand. Then bursting into tears he turned away and went out.

Socrates looked at him and said: I return your good wishes, and will do as you bid. Then turning to us, he said, How charming the man is: since I have been in prison he has always been coming to see me, and at times he would talk to me, and was as good to me as could be, and now see how generously he sorrows on my account. We must do as he says, Crito; and therefore let the cup be brought, if the poison is prepared: if not, let the attendant prepare some.

Yet, said Crito, the sun is still upon the hill tops, and I know that many a one has taken the draught late, and after the announcement has been made to him, he has eaten and drunk, and enjoyed the society of his beloved: do not hurry—there is time enough.

Socrates said: Yes, Crito, and they of whom you speak are right in so acting, for they think that they will be gainers by the delay; but I am right in not following their example, for I do not think that I should gain anything by drinking the poison a little later; [117] I should only be ridiculous in my own eyes for sparing and saving a life which is already forfeit. Please then to do as I say, and not to refuse me.

Crito made a sign to the servant, who was standing by; and he went out, and having been absent for some time, returned with the jailer carrying the cup of poison. Socrates said: You, my good friend, who are experienced in these matters, shall give me directions how I am to proceed. The man answered: You have only to walk about until your legs are heavy, and then to lie down, and the poison will act. At the same time he handed the cup to Socrates, who in the easiest and gentlest manner, without the least fear or change of colour or feature, looking at the man with all his eyes, Echecrates, as his manner was, took the cup and said: What do you say about making a libation out of this cup to any god? May I, or not? The man answered: We only prepare, Socrates, just so much as we deem enough. I understand, he said: but I may and must ask the gods to prosper my journey from this to the other world—even so—and so be it according to my prayer. Then raising the cup to his lips, quite readily and cheerfully he drank off the poison. And hitherto most of us had been able to control our sorrow; but now when we saw him drinking, and saw too that he had finished the draught, we could no longer forbear, and in spite of myself my own tears were flowing fast; so that I covered my face and wept, not for him, but at the thought of my own calamity in having to part from such a friend. Nor was I the first; for Crito, when he found himself unable to restrain his tears, had got up, and I followed; and at that moment, Apollodorus, who had been weeping all the time, broke out in a loud and passionate cry which made cowards of us all. Socrates alone retained his calmness: What is this strange outcry? he said. I sent away the women mainly in order that they might not misbehave in this way, for I have been told that a man should die in peace. Be quiet then, and have patience. When we heard his words we were ashamed, and refrained our tears; and he walked about until, as he said, his legs began to fail, and then he lay on his back, according to the directions, and the man who gave him the poison now and then looked at his feet and legs; and after a while he pressed his foot hard, and asked him if he could feel; and he said, [118] No; and then his leg, and so upwards and upwards, and showed us that he was cold and stiff. And he felt them himself, and said: When the poison reaches the heart, that will be the end. He was beginning to grow cold about the groin, when he uncovered his face, for he had covered himself up, and said—they were his last words—he said: Crito, I owe a cock to Asclepius; will you remember to pay the debt? The debt shall be paid, said Crito; is there anything else? There was no answer to this question; but in a minute or two a movement was heard, and the attendants uncovered him; his eyes were set, and Crito closed his eyes and mouth.

Such was the end, Echecrates, of our friend; concerning whom I may truly say, that of all the men of his time whom I have known, he was the wisest and justest and best.

GORGIAS

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE CALLICLES SOCRATES CHAEREPHON GORGIAS POLUS.
Scene The house of Callicles

[447] Callicles THE wise man as the proverb says is late for a fray but not for a feast

Socrates And are we late for a feast?

Cal Yes and a delightful feast for Gorgias has just been exhibiting to us many fine things

Soc It is not my fault, Callicles our friend Chaerephon is to blame for he would keep us loitering in the Agora

Chaerephon Never mind Socrates the misfortune of which I have been the cause I will also repair for Gorgias is a friend of mine and I will make him give the exhibition again either now or if you prefer at some other time

Cal What is the matter Chaerephon—does Socrates want to hear Gorgias?

Chaer Yes that was our intention in coming

Cal Come into my house then for Gorgias is staying with me and he shall exhibit to you

Soc Very good Callicles but will he answer our questions? for I want to hear from him what is the nature of his art and what it is which he professes and teaches he may as you [Chaerephon] suggest defer the exhibition to some other time

Cal There is nothing like asking him Socrates and indeed to answer questions is a part of his exhibition for he was saying only just now that any one in my house might put any question to him and that he would answer

Soc How fortunate! will you ask him Chaerephon—?

Chaer What shall I ask him?

Soc Ask him who he is

Chaer What do you mean?

Soc I mean such a question as would elicit from him if he had been a maker of shoes the answer that he is a cobbler Do you understand?

Chaer I understand and will ask him Tell me Gorgias is our friend Callicles right in saying that you undertake to answer any questions which you are asked?

Gorgias Quite right Chaerephon I was saying as much only just now [448] and I may add that many years have elapsed since any one has asked me a new one

Chaer Then you must be very ready Gorgias

Gor Of that Chaerephon you can make trial

Polus Yes indeed and if you like, Chaerephon you may make trial of me too for I think that Gorgias who has been talking a long time is tired

Chaer And do you Polus think that you can answer better than Gorgias?

Pol What does that matter if I answer well enough for you?

Chaer Not at all —and you shall answer if you like

Pol Ask —

Chaer My question is this If Gorgias had the skill of his brother Herodicus what ought we to call him? Ought he not to have the name which is given to his brother?

Pol Certainly

Chaer Then we should be right in calling him a physician?

Pol Yes

Chaer And if he had the skill of Aristophon the son of Aglaophon or of his brother Polygnotus what ought we to call him?

Pol Clearly a painter

Chaer But now what shall we call him—

what is the art in which he is skilled?

Pol. O Chaerephon, there are many arts among mankind which are experimental, and have their origin in experience, for experience makes the days of men to proceed according to art, and inexperience according to chance, and different persons in different ways are proficient in different arts, and the best persons in the best arts. And our friend Gorgias is one of the best, and the art in which he is a proficient is the noblest.

Soc. Polus has been taught how to make a capital speech, Gorgias but he is not fulfilling the promise which he made to Chaerephon.

Gor. What do you mean, Socrates?

Soc. I mean that he has not exactly answered the question which he was asked

Gor. Then why not ask him yourself?

Soc. But I would much rather ask you, if you are disposed to answer for I see, from the few words which Polus has uttered, that he has attended more to the art which is called rhetoric than to dialectic.

Pol. What makes you say so, Socrates?

Soc. Because, Polus, when Chaerephon asked you what was the art which Gorgias knows, you praised it as if you were answering some one who found fault with it, but you never said what the art was.

Pol. Why did I not say that it was the noblest of arts?

Soc. Yes, indeed, but that was no answer to the question nobody asked what was the quality but what was the nature, of the art, and by what name we were to describe Gorgias [449] And I would still beg you briefly and clearly as you answered Chaerephon when he asked you at first, to say what this art is, and what we ought to call Gorgias Or rather Gorgias, let me turn to you, and ask the same question—what are we to call you, and what is the art which you profess?

Gor. Rhetoric, Socrates, is my art.

Soc. Then I am to call you a rhetorician?

Gor. Yes, Socrates, and a good one too if you would call me that which, in Homeric language, I boast myself to be.

Soc. I should wish to do so.

Gor. Then pray do

Soc. And are we to say that you are able to make other men rhetoricians?

Gor. Yes, that is exactly what I profess to make them, not only at Athens, but in all places.

Soc. And will you continue to ask and answer questions, Gorgias, as we are at present doing, and reserve for another occasion the longer mode of speech which Polus was attempting? Will you keep your promise, and answer shortly the questions which are asked of you?

Gor. Some answers, Socrates, are of necessity longer but I will do my best to make them as short as possible for a part of my profession is that I can be as short as any one.

Soc. That is what is wanted Gorgias exhibit the shorter method now and the longer one at some other time.

Gor. Well, I will and you will certainly say that you never heard a man use fewer words

Soc. Very good then as you profess to be a rhetorician, and a maker of rhetoricians, let me ask you, with what is rhetoric concerned I might ask with what is weaving concerned, and you would reply (would you not?) with the making of garments?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. And music is concerned with the composition of melodies?

Gor. It is.

Soc. By Here, Gorgias, I admire the surpassing brevity of your answers.

Gor. Yes, Socrates, I do think myself good at that.

Soc. I am glad to hear it answer me in like manner about rhetoric with what is rhetoric concerned

Gor. With discourse.

Soc. What sort of discourse Gorgias?—such discourse as would teach the sick under what treatment they might get well?

Gor. No

Soc. Then rhetoric does not treat of all kinds of discourse?

Gor. Certainly not.

Soc. And yet rhetoric makes men able to speak?

Gor. Yes

Soc. And to understand that about which they speak?

Gor. Of course.

Soc. But does not the art of medicine, which we were just now mentioning [450] also make men able to understand and speak about the sick?

Gor. Certainly

Soc. Then medicine also treats of discourse?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. Of discourse concerning diseases?

Gor. Just so

Soc. And does not gymnastic also treat of discourse concerning the good or evil condition of the body?

Gor Very true

Soc And the same Gorgias is true of the other arts —all of them treat of discourse concerning the subjects with which they severally have to do

Gor Clearly

Soc Then why if you call rhetoric the art which treats of discourse and all the other arts treat of discourse do you not call them arts of rhetoric?

Gor Because Socrates the knowledge of the other arts has only to do with some sort of external action as of the hand but there is no such action of the hand in rhetoric which works and takes effect only through the medium of discourse And therefore I am justified in saying that rhetoric treats of discourse

Soc I am not sure whether I entirely understand you but I dare say I shall soon know better please to answer me a question —you would allow that there are arts?

Gor Yes

Soc As to the arts generally they are for the most part concerned with doing and require little or no speaking in painting and statuary and many other arts the work may proceed in silence and of such arts I suppose you would say that they do not come within the province of rhetoric

Gor You perfectly conceive my meaning Socrates

Soc But there are other arts which work wholly through the medium of language and require either no action or very little as for example, the arts of arithmetic of calculation of geometry and of playing draughts in some of these speech is pretty nearly co-extensive with action but in most of them the verbal element is greater—they depend wholly on words for their efficacy and power and I take your meaning to be that rhetoric is an art of this latter sort?

Gor Exactly

Soc And yet I do not believe that you really mean to call any of these arts rhetoric although the precise expression which you used was that rhetoric is an art which works and takes effect only through the medium of discourse and an adversary who wished to be captious might say And so Gorgias you call arithmetic rhetoric But I do not think that you really call arithmetic rhetoric any more than geometry would be so called by you [451]

Gor You are quite right Socrates in your apprehension of my meaning

Soc Well then let me now have the rest of my answer —seeing that rhetoric is one of those arts which works mainly by the use of words, and there are other arts which also use words tell me what is that quality in words with which rhetoric is concerned —Suppose that a person asks me about some of the arts which I was mentioning just now he might say Socrates what is arithmetic? and I should reply to him as you replied to me that arithmetic is one of those arts which take effect through words And then he would proceed to ask Words about what? and I should reply Words about odd and even numbers and how many there are of each And if he asked again What is the art of calculation? I should say That also is one of the arts which is concerned wholly with words And if he further said Concerned with what? I should say like the clerks in the assembly as aforesaid of arithmetic but with a difference the difference being that the art of calculation considers not only the quantities of odd and even numbers but also their numerical relations to themselves and to one another And suppose, again I were to say that astronomy is only words—he would ask Words about what Socrates? and I should answer that astronomy tells us about the motions of the stars and sun and moon and their relative swiftness

Gor You would be quite right Socrates

Soc And now let us have from you Gorgias the truth about rhetoric which you would admit (would you not?) to be one of those arts which act always and fulfil all their ends through the medium of words?

Gor True

Soc Words which do what? I should ask To what class of things do the words which rhetoric uses relate?

Gor To the greatest Socrates and the best of human things

Soc That again Gorgias is ambiguous I am still in the dark for which are the greatest and best of human things? I dare say that you have heard men singing at feasts the old drinking song in which the singers enumerate the goods of life first health beauty next, thirdly as the writer of the song says wealth honestly obtained [452] Gor Yes I know the song but what is your drift?

Soc I mean to say that the producers of those things which the author of the song praises that is to say the physician the trainer the money maker will at once come to you and first the physician will say O Socrates

Gorgias is deceiving you, for my art is concerned with the greatest good of men and not his." And when I ask, Who are you? he will reply, "I am a physician." What do you mean? I shall say. Do you mean that your art produces the greatest good? "Certainly," he will answer, "for is not health the greatest good? What greater good can men have, Socrates?" And after him the trainer will come and say, "I too, Socrates, shall be greatly surprised if Gorgias can show more good of his art than I can show of mine." To him again I shall say, Who are you, honest friend, and what is your business? "I am a trainer," he will reply, "and my business is to make men beautiful and strong in body." When I have done with the trainer, there arrives the money-maker, and he, as I expect, will utterly despise them all. "Consider, Socrates," he will say, "whether Gorgias or any one else can produce any greater good than wealth." Well, you and I say to him, and are you a creator of wealth? "Yes," he replies. And who are you? "A money-maker." And do you consider wealth to be the greatest good of man? "Of course," will be his reply. And we shall rejoin: Yes; but our friend Gorgias contends that his art produces a greater good than yours. And then he will be sure to go on and ask, "What good? Let Gorgias answer." Now I want you, Gorgias, to imagine that this question is asked of you by them and by me: What is that which, as you say, is the greatest good of man, and of which you are the creator? Answer us.

Gor. That good, Socrates, which is truly the greatest, being that which gives to men freedom in their own persons, and to individuals the power of ruling over others in their several states.

Soc. And what would you consider this to be?

Gor. What is there greater than the word which persuades the judges in the courts, or the senators in the council, or the citizens in the assembly, or at any other political meeting?—if you have the power of uttering this word, you will have the physician your slave, and the trainer your slave, and the money-maker of whom you talk will be found to gather treasures, not for himself, but for you who are able to speak and to persuade the multitude.

Soc. Now I think, Gorgias, that you have very accurately explained what you conceive to be the art of rhetoric; and you mean to say, [453] if I am not mistaken, that rhetoric is the artificer of persuasion, having this and no other business, and that this is her crown and end. Do you know any other effect of rhetoric over and above that of producing persuasion?

Gor. No: the definition seems to me very fair, Socrates; for persuasion is the chief end of rhetoric.

Soc. Then hear me, Gorgias, for I am quite sure that if there ever was a man who entered on the discussion of a matter from a pure love of knowing the truth, I am such a one, and I should say the same of you.

Gor. What is coming, Socrates?

Soc. I will tell you: I am very well aware that I do not know what, according to you, is the exact nature, or what are the topics of that persuasion of which you speak, and which is given by rhetoric; although I have a suspicion about both the one and the other. And I am going to ask—what is this power of persuasion which is given by rhetoric, and about what? But why, if I have a suspicion, do I ask instead of telling you? Not for your sake, but in order that the argument may proceed in such a manner as is most likely to set forth the truth. And I would have you observe, that I am right in asking this further question: If I asked, "What sort of a painter is Zeuxis?" and you said, "The painter of figures," should I not be right in asking, "What kind of figures, and where do you find them?"

Gor. Certainly.

Soc. And the reason for asking this second question would be, that there are other painters besides, who paint many other figures?

Gor. True.

Soc. But if there had been no one but Zeuxis who painted them, then you would have answered very well?

Gor. Quite so.

Soc. Now I want to know about rhetoric in the same way;—is rhetoric the only art which brings persuasion, or do other arts have the same effect? I mean to say—Does he who teaches anything persuade men of that which he teaches or not?

Gor. He persuades, Socrates,—there can be no mistake about that.

Soc. Again, if we take the arts of which we were just now speaking:—do not arithmetic and the arithmeticians teach us the properties of number?

Gor. Certainly.

Soc. And therefore persuade us of them?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. Then arithmetic as well as rhetoric is an artificer of persuasion?

Gor. Clearly.

Gor Very true

Soc And the same Gorgias is true of the other arts —all of them treat of discourse concerning the subjects with which they severally have to do

Gor Clearly

Soc Then why if you call rhetoric the art which treats of discourse and all the other arts treat of discourse do you not call them arts of rhetoric?

Soc I mean to say that the producers of those things which the author of the song praises that is to say the physician the trainer the money maker will at once come to you and first the physician will say O Socrates

you, Gorgias? they will say—"about what will you teach us to ad ise the state?—about the just and unjust only or about those other things also which Socrates has just mentioned How will you answer them?

Gor I like your way of leading us on, Socrates, and I will endeavour to reveal to you the whole nature of rhetoric You must have heard, I think, that the docks and the walls of the Athenians and the plan of the harbour were devised in accordance with the counsels, partly of Themistocles, and partly of Pericles and not at the suggestion of the builders

Soc Such is the tradition, Gorgias about Themistocles and I myself heard the speech of Pericles when he advised us about the middle wall.

[456] Gor And you will observe, Socrates that when a decision has to be given in such matters the rhetoricians are the advisers they are the men who win their point.

Soc I had that in my admiring mind, Gorgias, when I asked what is the nature of rhetoric, which always appears to me when I look at the matter in this way to be a marvel of greatness.

Gor A marvel, indeed, Socrates, if you only knew how rhetoric comprehends and holds under her sway all the inferior arts. Let me offer you a striking example of this. On several occasions I have been with my brother Herodicus or some other physician to see one of his patients, who would not allow the physician to give him medicine, or apply a knife or hot iron to him and I have persuaded him to do for me what he would not do for the physician just by the use of rhetoric. And I say that if a rhetorician and a physician were to go to any city and had there to argue in the Ecclesia or any other assembly as to which of them should be elected state physician, the physician would have no chance but he who could speak would be chosen if he wished and in a contest with a man of any other profession the rhetorician more than any one would have the power of getting himself chosen for he can speak more persuasively to the multitude than any of them, and on any subject. Such is the nature and power of the art of rhetoric! And yet, Socrates, rhetoric should be used like any other competitive art, not against everybody—the rhetorician ought not to abuse his strength any more than a pugilist or pancratiast or other master of fence because he has powers which are more than a match either for friend or enemy he ought not therefore to strike, stab or slay his friends. Suppose a man to have been trained in the palestra and to be a skilful boxer—he in the fulness of his strength goes and strikes his father or mother or one of his familiars or friends but that is no reason why the trainers or fencing masters should be held in detestation or banished from the city—surely not. For they taught their art for a good purpose, to be used against enemies and evil-doers, in self defence not in aggression, and others have perverted their instructions [457] and turned to a bad use their own strength and skill But not on this account are the teachers bad, neither is the art in fault, or bad in itself; I should rather say that those who make a bad use of the art are to blame And the same argument holds good of rhetoric for the rhetorician can speak against all men and upon any subject—in short, he can persuade the multitude better than any other man of anything which he pleases, but he should not therefore seek to defraud the physician or any other artist of his reputation merely because he has the power; he ought to use rhetoric fairly as he would also use his athletic powers And if after having become a rhetorician he makes a bad use of his strength and skill his instructor surely ought not on that account to be held in detestation or banished For he was intended by his teacher to make a good use of his instructions but he abuses them. And therefore he is the person who ought to be held in detestation, banished, and put to death and not his instructor

Soc You, Gorgias, like myself, have had great experience of disputations, and you must have observed I think, that they do not always terminate in mutual edification *or in the defi*nition by either party of the subjects which they are discussing but disagreements are apt to arise—somebody says that another has not spoken truly or clearly and then they get into a passion and begin to quarrel, both parties conceiving that their opponents are arguing from personal feeling only and jealousy of themselves not from any interest in the question at issue. And sometimes they will go on abusing one another until the company at last are quite vexed at themselves for ever listening to such fellows Why do I say this? Why because I cannot help feeling that you are now saying what is not quite consistent or accordant with what you were saying at first about rhetoric. And I am afraid to point this out to you, lest you should think that I have some animosity against you, and that I speak not for the sake of discovering the truth but from jealousy of you Now if you are one of my sort, I should

Soc And if any one asks us what sort of persuasion and about what —we shall answer persuasion which teaches the quantity of odd and even [454] and we shall be able to show that all the other arts of which we were just now speaking are artificers of persuasion and of what sort and about what

Soc Then rhetoric is not the only artificer of persuasion?

Gor True

Soc Seeing then that not only rhetoric works by persuasion but that other arts do the same as in the case of the painter a question has arisen which is a very fair one Of what persuasion is rhetoric the artificer and about what?—is not that a fair way of putting the question?

Gor I think so

Soc Then if you approve the question Gorgias what is the answer?

Gor I answer Socrates that rhetoric is the art of persuasion in courts of law and other assemblies as I was just now saying and about the just and unjust

Soc And that Gorgias was what I was suspecting to be your notion yet I would not have you wonder if by and by I am found repeating a seemingly plain question for I ask not in order to confute you but as I was saying that the argument may proceed consecutively and that we may not get the habit of anticipating and suspecting the meaning of one another s words I would have you develop your own views in your own way whatever may be your hypothesis

Gor I think that you are quite right Socrates

Soc Then let me raise another question there is such a thing as having learned ?

Gor Yes

Soc And there is also having believed ?

Gor Yes

Soc And is the having learned the same as having believed and are learning and belief the same things?

Gor In my judgment Socrates they are not the same

Soc And your judgment is right as you may ascertain in this way —If a person were to say to you Is there Gorgias a false belief as well as a true? —you would reply, if I am not mistaken that there is

Gor Yes

Soc Well but is there a false knowledge as well as a true?

Gor No

Soc No indeed and this again proves that knowledge and belief differ

Gor Very true

Soc And yet those who have learned as well as those who have believed are persuaded?

Gor Just so

Soc Shall we then assume two sorts of persuasion —one which is the source of belief without knowledge as the other is of knowledge?

Gor By all means

Soc And which sort of persuasion does rhetoric create in courts of law and other assemblies about the just and unjust the sort of persuasion which gives belief without knowledge, or that which gives knowledge?

[455] Gor Clearly Socrates that which only gives belief

Soc Then rhetoric as would appear is the artificer of a persuasion which creates belief about the just and unjust, but gives no instruction about them?

Gor True

Soc And the rhetorician does not instruct the courts of law or other assemblies about things just and unjust, but he creates belief about them for no one can be supposed to instruct such a vast multitude about such high matters in a short time?

Gor Certainly not

Soc Come then and let us see what we really mean about rhetoric for I do not know what my own meaning is as yet When the assembly meets to elect a physician or a shipwright or any other craftsman will the rhetorician be taken into counsel? Surely not For at every election he ought to be chosen who is most skilled and again when walls have to be built or harbours or docks to be constructed not the rhetorician but the master workman will advise or when generals have to be chosen and an order of battle arranged or a proposition taken then the military will advise and not the rhetoricians what do you say Gorgias? Since you profess to be a rhetorician and a maker of rhetoricians I cannot do better than learn the nature of your art from you And here let me assure you that I have your interest in view as well as my own For likely enough some one or other of the young men present might desire to become your pupil and in fact I see some, and a good many too who have this wish but they would be too modest to question you And therefore when you are interrogated by me I would have you imagine that you are interrogated by them What is the use of coming to Gorgias, I wish that you would reveal to me the power of rhetoric, as you were saying that you would.

Gor. Well, Socrates, I suppose that if the pupil does chance not to know them, he will have to learn of me these things as well.

Soc. Say no more, for there you are right; and so he whom you make a rhetorician must either know the nature of the just and unjust already, or he must be taught by you.

Gor. Certainly.

Soc. Well, and is not he who has learned carpentering a carpenter?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. And he who has learned music a musician?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. And he who has learned medicine is a physician, in like manner? He who has learned anything, whatever it is that which his knowledge makes him.

Gor. Certainly.

Soc. And in the same way, he who has learned what is just is just?

Gor. To be sure.

Soc. And he who is just may be supposed to do what is just?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. And must not the just man always desire to do what is just?

Gor. That is clearly the inference.

Soc. Surely, then, the just man will never consent to do injustice?

Gor. Certainly not.

Soc. And according to the argument the rhetorician must be a just man?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. And will therefore never be willing to do injustice?

Gor. Clearly not.

Soc. But do you remember saying just now that the trainer is not to be accused or banished if the pugilist makes a wrong use of his pugilistic art; and in like manner, if the rhetorician makes a bad and unjust use of rhetoric, that is not to be laid to the charge of his teacher, who is not to be banished, but the wrong-doer himself who made a bad use of his rhetoric—he is to be banished—was not that said?

Gor. Yes, it was.

Soc. But now we are affirming that the aforesaid rhetorician will never have done injustice at all?

Gor. True.

Soc. And at the very outset, Gorgias, it was said that rhetoric treated of discourse, not [like arithmetic] about odd and even, but about just and unjust? Was not this said?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. I was thinking at the time, when I heard you saying so, that rhetoric, which is always discoursing about justice, could not possibly be an unjust thing. But when you added, shortly afterwards, that the rhetorician might make a bad use of rhetoric I noted with surprise the inconsistency into which you had fallen; [461] and I said, that if you thought, as I did, that there was a gain in being refuted, there would be an advantage in going on with the question, but if not, I would leave off. And in the course of our investigations, as you will see yourself, the rhetorician has been acknowledged to be incapable of making an unjust use of rhetoric, or of willingness to do injustice. By the dog, Gorgias, there will be a great deal of discussion, before we get at the truth of all this.

Polus. And do even you, Socrates, seriously believe what you are now saying about rhetoric? What! because Gorgias was ashamed to deny that the rhetorician knew the just and the honourable and the good, and admitted that to any one who came to him ignorant of them he could teach them, and then out of this admission there arose a contradiction—the thing which you so dearly love, and to which not he, but you, brought the argument by your captious questions—[do you seriously believe that there is any truth in all this?] For will any one ever acknowledge that he does not know, or cannot teach, the nature of justice? The truth is, that there is great want of manners in bringing the argument to such a pass.

Soc. Illustrious Polus, the reason why we provide ourselves with friends and children is, that when we get old and stumble, a younger generation may be at hand to set us on our legs again in our words and in our actions: and now, if I and Gorgias are stumbling, here are you who should raise us up; and I for my part engage to retract any error into which you may think that I have fallen—upon one condition.

Pol. What condition?

Soc. That you contract, Polus, the prolixity of speech in which you indulged at first.

Pol. What! do you mean that I may not use as many words as I please?

Soc. Only to think, my friend, that having come on a visit to Athens, which is the most free-spoken state in Hellas, you when you got there, and you alone, should be deprived of the power of speech—that would be hard indeed. But then consider my case:—shall not I be very like to cross-examine you [458] but if not I will let you alone. And what is my sort? you will ask I am one of those who are very willing to be refuted if I say anything which is not true and very willing to refute any one else who says what is not true and quite as ready to be refuted as to refute for I hold that this is the greater gain of the two just as the gain is greater of being cured of a very great evil than of curing another For I imagine that there is no evil which a man can endure so great as an erroneous opinion about the matters of which we are speaking and if you claim to be one of my sort let us have the discussion out, but if you would rather have done no matter—let us make an end of it

Gor I should say Socrates that I am quite the man whom you indicate but perhaps we ought to consider the audience, for before you came, I had already given a long exhibition and if we proceed the argument may run on to a great length And therefore I think that we should consider whether we may not be detaining some part of the company when they are wanting to do something else

Chaer You hear the audience cheering Gorgias and Socrates which shows their desire to listen to you and for myself Heaven forbid that I should have any business on hand which would take me away from a discussion so interesting and so ably maintained

Cal By the gods Chaerephon although I have been present at many discussions I doubt whether I was ever so much delighted before and therefore if you go on discoursing all day I shall be the better pleased

Soc I may truly say Callicles that I am willing if Gorgias is

Gor After all this Socrates I should be disgraced if I refused especially as I have promised to answer all comers in accordance with the wishes of the company then do you begin and ask of me any question which you like

Soc Let me tell you then Gorgias what surprises me in your words though I dare say that you may be right and I may have misunderstood your meaning You say that you can make any man who will learn of you a rhetorician?

Gor Yes

Soc Do you mean that you will teach him to gain the ears of the multitude on any subject, [459] and this not by instruction but by persuasion?

Gor Quite so

Soc You were saying in fact that the rhetorician will have greater powers of persuasion than the physician even in a matter of health?

Gor Yes with the multitude—that is

Soc You mean to say with the ignorant for with those who know he cannot be supposed to have greater powers of persuasion

Gor Very true

Soc But if he is to have more power of persuasion than the physician he will have greater power than he who knows?

Gor Certainly

Soc Although he is not a physician —is he?

Gor No

Soc And he who is not a physician must obviously be ignorant of what the physician knows

Gor Clearly

Soc Then when the rhetorician is more persuasive than the physician the ignorant is more persuasive with the ignorant than he who has knowledge?—is not that the inference?

Gor In the case supposed —Yes

Soc And the same holds of the relation of rhetoric to all the other arts the rhetorician need not know the truth about things he has only to discover some way of persuading the ignorant that he has more knowledge than those who know?

Gor Yes Socrates and is not this a great comfort?—not to have learned the other arts, but the art of rhetoric only and yet to be in no way inferior to the professors of them?

Soc Whether the rhetorician is or is not inferior on this account is a question which we will hereafter examine if the enquiry is likely to be of any service to us but I would rather begin by asking whether he is or is not as ignorant of the just and unjust base and honourable good and evil as he is of medicine and the other arts I mean to say does he really know anything of what is good and evil base or honourable just or unjust in them or has he only a way with the ignorant of persuading them that he not knowing is to be esteemed to know more about these things than some one else who knows? Or must the pupil know these things and come to you knowing them before he can acquire the art of rhetoric? If he is ignorant, you who are the teacher of rhetoric will not teach him—it is not your business but you will make him seem to the multitude to know them when he does not know them and seem to be a good man [460] when he is not. Or will you be unable to teach him rhetoric at all unless he knows the truth of these things first? What is to be said about all this? By heavens,

Gorgias, I wish that you would reveal to me the power of rhetoric, as you were saying that you would.

Gor Well, Socrates, I suppose that if the pupil does chance not to know them, he will have to learn of me these things as well.

Soc Say no more, for there you are right: and so he whom you make a rhetorician must either know the nature of the just and unjust already, or he must be taught by you.

Gor Certainly.

Soc Well, and is not he who has learned carpentering a carpenter?

Gor Yes.

Soc And he who has learned music a musician?

Gor Yes.

Soc And he who has learned medicine is a physician, in like manner? He who has learned anything, whatever is that which his knowledge makes him.

Gor Certainly.

Soc And in the same way he who has learned what is just is just?

Gor To be sure.

Soc And he who is just may be supposed to do what is just?

Gor Yes.

Soc And must not the just man always desire to do what is just.

Gor That is clearly the inference.

Soc Surely, then, the just man will never consent to do injustice.

Gor Certainly not.

Soc And according to the argument the rhetorician must be a just man?

Gor Yes.

Soc And will therefore never be willing to do injustice?

Gor Clearly not.

Soc But do you remember saying just now that the trainer is not to be accused or banished if the pugilist makes a wrong use of his pugilistic art; and in like manner, if the rhetorician makes a bad and unjust use of rhetoric, that is not to be laid to the charge of his teacher, who is not to be banished, but the wrong-doer himself who made a bad use of his rhetoric—he is to be banished—was not that said?

Gor Yes, it was.

Soc But now we are affirming that the aforesaid rhetorician will never have done injustice at all.

Gor True.

Soc And at the very outset, Gorgias, it was said that rhetoric treated of discourse, not [like arithmetic] about odd and even, but about just and unjust? Was not this said?

Gor Yes.

Soc I was thinking at the time, when I heard you saying so, that rhetoric, which is always discoursing about justice, could not possibly be an unjust thing. But when you added, shortly afterwards, that the rhetorician might make a bad use of rhetoric I noted with surprise the inconsistency into which you had fallen [461] and I said, that if you thought, as I did, that there was a gain in being refuted, there would be an advantage in going on with the question, but if not, I would leave off. And in the course of our investigations, as you will see yourself, the rhetorician has been acknowledged to be incapable of making an unjust use of rhetoric, or of willingness to do injustice. By the dog, Gorgias, there will be a great deal of discussion, before we get at the truth of all this.

Polus And do even you, Socrates, seriously believe what you are now saying about rhetoric? What! because Gorgias was ashamed to deny that the rhetorician knew the just and the honourable and the good, and admitted that to any one who came to him ignorant of them he could teach them, and then out of this admission there arose a contradiction—the thing which you so dearly love, and to which not he, but you, brought the argument by your captious questions—[do you seriously believe that there is any truth in all this?] For will any one ever acknowledge that he does not know, or cannot teach, the nature of justice? The truth is, that there is great want of manners in bringing the argument to such a pass.

Soc Illustrious Polus, the reason why we provide ourselves with friends and children is, that when we get old and stumble, a younger generation may be at hand to set us on our legs again in our words and in our actions: and now, if I and Gorgias are stumbling, here are you who should raise us up; and I for my part engage to retract any error into which you may think that I have fallen—upon one condition.

Pol. What condition?

Soc That you contract, Polus, the prolixity of speech in which you indulged at first.

Pol. What! do you mean that I may not use as many words as I please?

Soc Only to think, my friend, that having come on a visit to Athens, which is the most free-spoken state in Hellas, you when you got there, and you alone, should be deprived of the power of speech—that would be hard indeed. But then consider my case:—shall not I be very

Gor I should say Socrates that I am quite the man whom you indicate but perhaps we ought to consider the audience, for before you came I had already given a long exhibition and if we proceed the argument may run on to a great length And therefore I think that we should consider whether we may not be detaining some part of the company when they are wanting to do something else

Chaer You hear the audience cheering Gorgias and Socrates which shows their desire to listen to you and for myself Heaven forbid that I should have any business on hand which would take me away from a discussion so interesting and so ably maintained

Cal By the gods Chaerephon although I have been present at many discussions I doubt whether I was ever so much delighted before, and therefore if you go on discoursing all day I shall be the better pleased

Soc I may truly say Callicles that I am willing if Gorgias is

Gor After all this Socrates I should be disgraced if I refused especially as I have promised to answer all comers in accordance with the wishes of the company then do you begin and ask of me any question which you like

Soc Let me tell you then Gorgias what surprises me in your words though I dare say that you may be right and I may have misunderstood your meaning You say that you can make any man who will learn of you a rhetorician?

Gor Yes

Soc Do you mean that you will teach him to gain the ears of the multitude on any subject [459] and this not by instruction but by persuasion?

Gor Quite so

Soc You were saying in fact that the rhetorician will have greater powers of persuasion than the physician even in a matter of health?

Gor Yes with the multitude—that is

Soc You mean to say with the ignorant for with those who know he cannot be supposed to have greater powers of persuasion

Gor Very true

Soc But if he is to have more power of persuasion than the physician he will have greater power than he who knows?

Gor Certainly

Soc Although he is not a physician —is he?

Gor No

Soc And he who is not a physician must obviously be ignorant of what the physician knows

Gor Clearly

Soc Then when the rhetorician is more persuasive than the physician the ignorant is more persuasive with the ignorant than he who has knowledge?—is not that the inference?

Gor In the case supposed —Yes

Soc And the same holds of the relation of rhetoric to all the other arts the rhetorician need not know the truth about things he has only to discover some way of persuading the ignorant that he has more knowledge than those who know?

Gor Yes Socrates and is not this a great comfort?—not to have learned the other arts, but the art of rhetoric only and yet to be in no way inferior to the professors of them?

Soc Whether the rhetorician is or is not inferior on this account is a question which we will hereafter examine if the enquiry is likely to be of any service to us but I would rather begin by asking whether he is or is not as ignorant of the just and unjust base and honourable good and evil as he is of medicine and the other arts I mean to say does he really know anything of what is good and evil base or honourable, just or unjust in them or has he only a way with the ignorant of persuading them that he not knowing is to be esteemed to know more about these things than some one else who knows? Or must the pupil know these things and come to you knowing them before he can acquire the art of rhetoric? If he is ignorant you who are the teacher of rhetoric will not teach him—it is not your business but you will make him seem to the multitude to know them when he does not know them and seem to be a good man [460] when he is not. Or will you be unable to teach him rhetoric at all unless he knows the truth of these things first? What is to be said about all this? By heavens, colt by name and colt by nature, is apt to run away.[1]

Gor. Never mind him, but explain to me what you mean by saying that rhetoric is the counterfeit of a part of politics.

Soc. I will try, then, to explain my notion of rhetoric, and if I am mistaken [464] my friend Polus shall refute me. We may assume the existence of bodies and of souls?

Gor. Of course.

Soc. You would further admit that there is a good condition of either of them?

Gor. Yes.

Soc. Which condition may not be really good, but good only in appearance? I mean to say that there are many persons who appear to be in good health, and whom only a physician or trainer will discern at first sight not to be in good health.

Gor. True.

Soc. And this applies not only to the body, but also to the soul: in either there may be that which gives the appearance of health and not the reality?

Gor. Yes, certainly.

Soc. And now I will endeavour to explain to you more clearly what I mean: The soul and body being two, have two arts corresponding to them: there is the art of politics attending on the soul; and another art attending on the body, of which I know no single name, but which may be described as having two divisions, one of them gymnastic, and the other medicine. And in politics there is a legislative part, which answers to gymnastic, as justice does to medicine; and the two parts run into one another, justice having to do with the same subject as legislation, and medicine with the same subject as gymnastic, but with a difference. Now, seeing that there are these four arts, two attending on the body and two on the soul for their highest good; flattery knowing, or rather guessing their natures, has distributed herself into four shams or simulations of them; she puts on the likeness of some one or other of them, and pretends to be that which she simulates, and having no regard for men's highest interests, is ever making pleasure the bait of the unwary, and deceiving them into the belief that she is of the highest value to them. Cookery simulates the disguise of medicine, and pretends to know what food is the best for the body; and if the physician and the cook had to enter into a competition in which children were the judges, or men who had no more sense than children, as to which of them best understands the goodness or badness of food, the physician would be starved to death. [465] A flattery I deem this to be and of an ignoble sort, Polus, for to you I am now addressing myself, because it aims at pleasure without any thought of the best. An art I do not call it, but only an experience, because it is unable to explain or to give a reason of the nature of its own applications. And I do not call any irrational thing an art; but if you dispute my words, I am prepared to argue in defence of them.

Cookery, then, I maintain to be a flattery which takes the form of medicine; and tiring, in like manner, is a flattery which takes the form of gymnastic, and is knavish, false, ignoble, illiberal, working deceitfully by the help of lines, and colours, and enamels, and garments, and making men affect a spurious beauty to the neglect of the true beauty which is given by gymnastic.

I would rather not be tedious, and therefore I will only say, after the manner of the geometricians (for I think that by this time you will be able to follow), as tiring : gymnastic :: cookery : medicine;

or rather,

as tiring : gymnastic :: sophistry : legislation;

and

as cookery : medicine :: rhetoric : justice.

And this, I say, is the natural difference between the rhetorician and the sophist, but by reason of their near connection, they are apt to be jumbled up together; neither do they know what to make of themselves, nor do other men know what to make of them. For if the body presided over itself, and were not under the guidance of the soul, and the soul did not discern and discriminate between cookery and medicine, but the body was made the judge of them, and the rule of judgment was the bodily delight which was given by them, then the word of Anaxagoras, that word with which you, friend Polus, are so well acquainted, would prevail far and wide: "Chaos" would come again, and cookery, health, and medicine would mingle in an indiscriminate mass. And now I have told you my notion of rhetoric, which is, in relation to the soul, what cookery is to the body. I may have been inconsistent in making a long speech, when I would not allow you to discourse at length. But I think that I may be excused, because you did not understand me, and could make no use of my answer when I spoke shortly, and therefore I had to enter into hardly used if when you are making a long oration [462] and refusing to answer what you are asked, I am compelled to stay and listen to you and may not go away? I say rather if you have a real interest in the argument or to repeat my former expression have any desire to set it on its legs take back any statement which you please and in your turn ask and answer like myself and Gorgias—refute and be refuted for I suppose that you would claim to know what Gorgias knows—would you not?

Pol Yes

Soc And you like him invite any one to ask you about anything which he pleases and you will know how to answer him?

Pol To be sure

Soc And now which will you do ask or answer?

Pol I will ask and do you answer me, Socrates the same question which Gorgias as you suppose is unable to answer What is rhetoric?

Soc Do you mean what sort of an art?

Pol Yes

Soc To say the truth Polus it is not an art at all in my opinion

Pol Then what in your opinion is rhetoric?

Soc A thing which as I was lately reading in a book of yours you say that you have made an art

Pol What thing?

Soc I should say a sort of experience

Pol Does rhetoric seem to you to be an experience?

Soc That is my view but you may be of another mind

Pol An experience in what?

Soc An experience in producing a sort of delight and gratification

Pol And if able to gratify others must not rhetoric be a fine thing?

Soc What are you saying Polus? Why do you ask me whether rhetoric is a fine thing or not when I have not as yet told you what rhetoric is?

Pol Did I not hear you say that rhetoric was a sort of experience?

Soc Will you who are so desirous to gratify others afford a slight gratification to me?

Pol I will

Soc Will you ask me what sort of an art is cookery?

Pol What sort of an art is cookery?

Soc Not an art at all Polus

Pol What then?

Soc I should say an experience

Pol In what? I wish that you would explain to me

Soc An experience in producing a sort of delight and gratification Polus

Pol Then are cookery and rhetoric the same?

Soc No they are only different parts of the same profession

Pol Of what profession?

Soc I am afraid that the truth may seem discourteous and I hesitate to answer lest Gorgias should imagine that I am making fun of his own profession [463] For whether or no this is that art of rhetoric which Gorgias practises I really cannot tell —from what he was just now saying nothing appeared of what he thought of his art but the rhetoric which I mean is a part of a not very creditable whole

Gor A part of what Socrates? Say what you mean and never mind me

Soc In my opinion then Gorgias the whole of which rhetoric is a part is not an art at all but the habit of a bold and ready wit which knows how to manage mankind this habit I sum up under the word flattery and it appears to me to have many other parts one of which is cookery which may seem to be an art but as I maintain is only an experience or routine and not an art —another part is rhetoric and the art of attiring and sophistry are two others thus there are four branches and four different things answering to them And Polus may ask if he likes for he has not as yet been informed, what part of flattery is rhetoric he did not see that I had not yet answered him when he proceeded to ask a further question Whether I do not think rhetoric a fine thing? But I shall not tell him whether rhetoric is a fine thing or not until I have first answered What is rhetoric? For that would not be right Polus but I shall be happy to answer if you will ask me What part of flattery is rhetoric?

Pol I will ask and do you answer? What part of flattery is rhetoric?

Soc Will you understand my answer? Rhetoric according to my view is the ghost or counterfeit of a part of politics

Pol And noble or ignoble?

Soc Ignoble I should say if I am compelled to answer for I call what is bad ignoble — though I doubt whether you understand what I was saying before

Gor Indeed Socrates I cannot say that I understand myself

Soc I do not wonder Gorgias for I have not as yet explained myself and our friend Polus

Pol To be sure, Socrates.

Soc Wisdom and health and wealth and the like you would call goods, and their opposites evils?

Pol I should.

[468] Soc And the things which are neither good nor evil, and which partake sometimes of the nature of good and at other times of evil, or of neither, are such as sitting, walking, running, sailing, or, again, wood, stones, and the like:—these are the things which you call neither good nor evil?

Pol Exactly so.

Soc Are these indifferent things done for the sake of the good, or the good for the sake of the indifferent?

Pol Clearly, the indifferent for the sake of the good.

Soc When we walk we walk for the sake of the good, and under the idea that it is better to walk, and when we stand we stand equally for the sake of the good?

Pol Yes.

Soc And when we kill a man we kill him or exile him or despoil him of his goods, because, as we think, it will conduce to our good?

Pol Certainly.

Soc Men who do any of these things do them for the sake of the good?

Pol Yes.

Soc And did we not admit that in doing something for the sake of something else, we do not will those things which we do, but that other thing for the sake of which we do them?

Pol Most true.

Soc Then we do not will simply to kill a man or to exile him or to despoil him of his goods, but we will to do that which conduces to our good, and if the act is not conducive to our good we do not will it; for we will, as you say, that which is our good, but that which is neither good nor evil, or simply evil, we do not will. Why are you silent, Polus? Am I not right?

Pol You are right.

Soc Hence we may infer, that if any one, whether he be a tyrant or a rhetorician, kills another or exiles another or deprives him of his property, under the idea that the act is for his own interests when really not for his own interests, he may be said to do what seems best to him?

Pol Yes.

Soc But does he do what he wills if he does what is evil? Why do you not answer?

Pol Well, I suppose not.

Soc Then if great power is a good as you allow, will such a one have great power in a state?

Pol He will not.

Soc Then I was right in saying that a man may do what seems good to him in a state, and not have great power, and not do what he wills?

Pol As though you, Socrates, would not like to have the power of doing what seemed good to you in the state, rather than not; you would not be jealous when you saw any one killing or despoiling or imprisoning whom he pleased, Oh, no!

[469] Soc Justly or unjustly, do you mean?

Pol In either case is he not equally to be envied?

Soc Forbear, Polus!

Pol Why "forbear"?

Soc Because you ought not to envy wretches who are not to be envied, but only to pity them.

Pol And are those of whom I spoke wretches?

Soc Yes, certainly they are.

Pol And so you think that he who slays any one whom he pleases, and justly slays him, is pitiable and wretched?

Soc No, I do not say that of him: but neither do I think that he is to be envied.

Pol Were you not saying just now that he is wretched?

Soc Yes, my friend, if he killed another unjustly, in which case he is also to be pitied; and he is not to be envied if he killed him justly.

Pol At any rate you will allow that he who is unjustly put to death is wretched, and to be pitied?

Soc Not so much, Polus, as he who kills him, and not so much as he who is justly killed.

Pol How can that be, Socrates?

Soc That may very well be, inasmuch as doing injustice is the greatest of evils.

Pol But is it the greatest? Is not suffering injustice a greater evil?

Soc Certainly not.

Pol Then would you rather suffer than do injustice?

Soc I should not like either, but if I must choose between them, I would rather suffer than do.

Pol Then you would not wish to be a tyrant?

Soc Not if you mean by tyranny what I mean.

Pol I mean, as I said before, the power of doing whatever seems good to you in a state, killing, banishing, doing in all things as you like.

Soc Well then, illustrious friend, when I have said my say, do you reply to me. Suppose an explanation [466] And if I show an equal inability to make use of yours I hope that you will speak at equal length but if I am able to understand you let me have the benefit of your brevity, as is only fair And now you may do what you please with my answer

Pol What do you mean? do you think that rhetoric is flattery?

Soc Nay I said a part of flattery if at your age Polus you cannot remember what will you do by and by when you get older?

Pol And are the good rhetoricians meanly regarded in states under the idea that they are flatterers?

Soc Is that a question or the beginning of a speech?

Pol I am asking a question

Soc Then my answer is that they are not regarded at all

Pol How not regarded? Have they not very great power in states?

Soc Not if you mean to say that power is a good to the possessor

Pol And that is what I do mean to say

Soc Then if so I think that they have the least power of all the citizens

Pol What! are they not like tyrants? They kill and despoil and exile any one whom they please

Soc By the dog Polus I cannot make out at each deliverance of yours whether you are giving an opinion of your own or asking a question of me

Pol I am asking a question of you

Soc Yes my friend but you ask two questions at once

Pol How two questions?

Soc Why did you not say just now that the rhetoricians are like tyrants and that they kill and despoil or exile any one whom they please?

Pol I did

Soc Well then I say to you that here are two questions in one and I will answer both of them And I tell you, Polus that rhetoricians and tyrants have the least possible power in states as I was just now saying for they do literally nothing which they will but only what they think best

Pol And is not that a great power?

Soc Polus has already said the reverse

Soc No by the great—what do you call him? —not you for you say that power is a good to him who has the power

Pol I do

Soc And would you maintain that if a fool does what he thinks best this is a good and would you call this great power?

Pol I should not

Soc Then you must prove that the rhetorician is not a fool and that rhetoric is an art and not a flattery—and so you will have refuted [467] me but if you leave me unrefuted why the rhetoricians who do what they think best in states and the tyrants will have nothing upon which to congratulate themselves if as you say power be indeed a good admitting at the same time that what is done without sense is an evil

Pol Yes I admit that

Soc How then can the rhetoricians or the tyrants have great power in states unless Polus can refute Socrates and prove to him that they do as they will?

Pol This fellow—

Soc I say that they do not do as they will—now refute me

Pol Why have you not already said that they do as they think best?

Soc And I say so still

Pol Then surely they do as they will?

Soc I deny it

Pol But they do what they think best?

Soc Aye

Pol That Socrates is monstrous and absurd

Soc Good words good Polus as I may say in your own peculiar style but if you have any questions to ask of me either prove that I am in error or give the answer yourself

Pol Very well I am willing to answer that I may know what you mean

Soc Do men appear to you to will that which they do or to will that further end for the sake of which they do a thing? when they take medicine for example, at the bidding of a physician do they will the drinking of the medicine which is painful or the health for the sake of which they drink?

Pol Clearly the health

Soc And when men go on a voyage or engage in business they do not will that which they are doing at the time for who would desire to take the risk of a voyage or the trouble of business?—But they will to have the wealth for the sake of which they go on a voyage.

Pol Certainly

Soc And is not this universally true? If a man does something for the sake of something else he wills not that which he does, but that for the sake of which he does it

Pol Yes

Soc And are not all things either good or evil or intermediate and indifferent?

morse? he had a younger brother a child of seven years old, who was the legitimate son of Perdiccas, and to him of right the kingdom belonged, Archelaus, however had no mind to bring him up as he ought and restore the king dom to him, that was not his notion of happiness but not long afterwards he threw him into a well and drowned him, and declared to his mother Cleopatra that he had fallen in while running after a goose, and had been killed And now as he is the greatest criminal of all the Macedonians, he may be supposed to be the most miserable and not the happiest of them, and I dare say that there are many Athenians, and you would be at the head of them, who would rather be any other Macedonian than Archelaus!

Soc I praised you at first, Polus, for being a rhetorician rather than a reasoner And this, as I suppose, is the sort of argument with which you fancy that a child might refute me, and by which I stand refuted when I say that the unjust man is not happy But, my good friend, where is the refutation? I cannot admit a word which you have been saying

Pol. That is because you will not, for you surely must think as I do.

Soc Not so, my simple friend, but because you will refute me after the manner which rhetoricians practise in courts of law For there the one party think that they refute the other when they bring forward a number of witnesses of good repute in proof of their allegations, [472] and their adversary has only a single one or none at all. But this kind of proof is of no value where truth is the aim a man may often be sworn down by a multitude of false witnesses who have a great air of respectability And in this argument nearly every one, Athenian and stranger alike, would be on your side, if you should bring witnesses in disproof of my statement—you may if you will, summon Nicias the son of Niceratus, and let his brothers, who gave the row of tripods which stand in the precincts of Dionysus, come with him or you may summon Aristocrates, the son of Scellius, who is the giver of that famous offering which is at Delphi summon, if you will, the whole house of Pericles, or any other great Athenian family whom you choose—they will all agree with you I only am left alone and cannot agree, for you do not convince me although you produce many false witnesses against me, in the hope of depriving me of my inheritance, which is the truth. But I consider that nothing worth speaking of will have been effected by me unless I make you the one witness of my words nor by you, unless you make me the one witness of yours no matter about the rest of the world For there are two ways of refutation, one which is yours and that of the world in general but mine is of another sort—let us compare them, and see in what they differ For indeed we are at issue about matters which to know is honourable and not to know disgraceful to know or not to know happiness and misery—that is the chief of them And what knowledge can be nobler? or what ignorance more disgraceful than this? And therefore I will begin by asking you whether you do not think that a man who is unjust and doing injustice can be happy seeing that you think Archelaus unjust, and yet happy? May I assume this to be your opinion?

Pol Certainly

Soc But I say that this is an impossibility—here is one point about which we are at issue—very good. And do you mean to say also that if he meets with retribution and punishment he will still be happy?

Pol. Certainly not in that case he will be most miserable.

Soc On the other hand, if the unjust be not punished, then, according to you, he will be happy?

Pol Yes.

Soc But in my opinion, Polus, the unjust or doer of unjust actions is miserable in any case,—more miserable, however if he be not punished and does not meet with retribution, and less miserable if he be punished and meets with retribution at the hands of gods [473] and men.

Pol You are maintaining a strange doctrine Socrates.

Soc I shall try to make you agree with me, O my friend, for as a friend I regard you. Then these are the points at issue between us—are they not? I was saying that to do is worse than to suffer injustice?

Pol Exactly so.

Soc And you said the opposite?

Pol Yes.

Soc I said also that the wicked are miserable, and you refuted me?

Pol By Zeus, I did.

Soc In your own opinion, Polus.

Pol Yes, and I rather suspect that I was in the right.

Soc You further said that the wrong-doer is happy if he be unpunished?

Pol Certainly

Soc And I affirm that he is most miserable, and that those who are punished are less miser that I go into a crowded Agora and take a dagger under my arm Polus, I say to you I have just acquired rare power and become a tyrant for if I think that any of these men whom you see ought to be put to death the man whom I have a mind to kill is as good as dead and if I am disposed to break his head or tear his garment he will have his head broken or his garment torn in an instant Such is my great power in this city And if you do not believe me and I show you the dagger you would probably reply Socrates in that sort of way any one may have great power—he may burn any house which he pleases and the docks and triremes of the Athenians and all their other vessels whether public or private—but can you believe that this mere doing as you think best is great power?

Pol Certainly not such doing as this [470] Soc But can you tell me why you disapprove of such a power?

Pol I can

Soc Why then?

Pol Why, because he who did as you say would be certain to be punished

Soc And punishment is an evil?

Pol Certainly

Soc And you would admit once more my good sir that great power is a benefit to a man if his actions turn out to his advantage and that this is the meaning of great power and if not then his power is an evil and is no power But let us look at the matter in another way —do we not acknowledge that the things of which we were speaking the infliction of death and exile and the deprivation of property are sometimes a good and sometimes not a good?

Pol Certainly

Soc About that you and I may be supposed to agree?

Pol Yes

Soc Tell me then when do you say that they are good and when that they are evil—what principle do you lay down?

Pol I would rather Socrates that you should answer as well as ask that question

Soc Well Polus since you would rather have the answer from me I say that they are good when they are just and evil when they are unjust

Pol You are hard of refutation Socrates but might not a child refute that statement?

Soc Then I shall be very grateful to the child and equally grateful to you if you will refute me and deliver me from my foolishness And I hope that refute me you will and not weary of doing good to a friend

Pol Yes Socrates, and I need not go far or appeal to antiquity events which happened only a few days ago are enough to refute you and to prove that many men who do wrong are happy

Soc What events?

Pol You see I presume that Archelaus the son of Perdiccas is now the ruler of Macedonia?

Soc At any rate I hear that he is

Pol And do you think that he is happy or miserable?

Soc I cannot say Polus for I have never had any acquaintance with him

Pol And cannot you tell at once, and without having an acquaintance with him, whether a man is happy?

Soc Most certainly not

Pol Then clearly Socrates, you would say that you did not even know whether the great king was a happy man?

Soc And I should speak the truth for I do not know how he stands in the matter of education and justice

Pol What! and does all happiness consist in this?

Soc Yes indeed Polus that is my doctrine the men and women who are gentle and good are also happy as I maintain and the unjust and evil are miserable

[471] Pol Then, according to your doctrine, the said Archelaus is miserable?

Soc Yes my friend if he is wicked

Pol That he is wicked I cannot deny for he had no title at all to the throne which he now occupies he being only the son of a woman who was the slave of Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas he himself therefore in strict right was the slave of Alcetas and if he had meant to do rightly he would have remained his slave and then according to your doctrine he would have been happy But now he is unspeakably miserable for he has been guilty of the greatest crimes in the first place he invited his uncle and master Alcetas to come to him under the pretence that he would restore to him the throne which Perdiccas has usurped and after entertaining him and his son Alexander who was his own cousin and nearly of an age with him and making them drunk he threw them into a waggon and carried them off by night and slew them and got both of them out of the way and when he had done all this wickedness he never discovered that he was the most miserable of all men and was very far from repenting shall I tell you how he showed his re ly measured by the opposite standard of pain and evil?

Pol Certainly

Soc Then when of two beautiful things one exceeds in beauty the measure of the excess is to be taken in one or both of these that is to say in pleasure or utility or both?

Pol Very true.

Soc And of two deformed things that which exceeds in deformity or disgrace, exceeds either in pain or evil—must it not be so?

Pol Yes.

Soc But then again, what was the observation which you just now made, about doing and suffering wrong? Did you not say that suffering wrong was more evil, and doing wrong more disgraceful?

Pol I did

Soc Then, if doing wrong is more disgraceful than suffering the more disgraceful must be more painful and must exceed in pain or in evil or both does not that also follow?

Pol Of course.

Soc First, then, let us consider whether the doing of injustice exceeds the suffering in the consequent pain Do the injurers suffer more than the injured?

Pol No, Socrates certainly not.

Soc Then they do not exceed in pain?

Pol No

Soc But if not in pain then not in both?

Pol Certainly not

Soc Then they can only exceed in the other?

Pol Yes.

Soc That is to say in evil?

Pol True.

Soc Then doing injustice will have an excess of evil and will therefore be a greater evil than suffering injustice?

Pol Clearly

Soc But have not you and the world already agreed that to do injustice is more disgraceful than to suffer?

Pol Yes

Soc And that is now discovered to be more evil?

Pol True

Soc And would you prefer a greater evil or a greater dishonour to a less one? Answer Polus, and fear not for you will come to no harm if you nobly resign yourself into the healing hand of the argument as to a physician without shrinking and either say "Yes" or "No" to me.

Pol I should say "No"

Soc Would any other man prefer a greater to a less evil?

Pol No not according to this way of putting the case Socrates

Soc Then I said truly Polus, that neither you, nor I nor any man would rather do than suffer injustice for to do injustice is the greater evil of the two

Pol That is the conclusion

Soc You see, Polus, when you compare the two kinds of refutations, how unlike they are All men with the exception of myself are of your way of thinking [476] but your single assent and witness are enough for me—I have no need of any other I take your suffrage, and am regardless of the rest. Enough of this, and now let us proceed to the next question which is Whether the greatest of evils to a guilty man is to suffer punishment, as you supposed, or whether to escape punishment is not a greater evil as I supposed Consider —You would say that to suffer punishment is another name for being justly corrected when you do wrong?

Pol I should

Soc And would you not allow that all just things are honourable in so far as they are just? Please to reflect, and tell me your opinion

Pol Yes, Socrates, I think that they are.

Soc Consider again —Where there is an agent, must there not also be a patient?

Pol I should say so

Soc And will not the patient suffer that which the agent does and will not the suffering have the quality of the action? I mean for example, that if a man strikes, there must be something which is stricken?

Pol Yes.

Soc And if the striker strikes violently or quickly that which is struck will be struck violently or quickly?

Pol True

Soc And the suffering to him who is stricken is of the same nature as the act of him who strikes?

Pol Yes.

Soc And if a man burns, there is something which is burned?

Pol Certainly

Soc And if he burns in excess or so as to cause pain, the thing burned will be burned in the same way?

Pol Truly

Soc And if he cuts, the same argument holds —there will be something cut?

Pol Yes.

Soc And if the cutting be great or deep or such as will cause pain, the cut will be of the same nature?

able—are you going to refute this proposition also?

Pol A proposition which is harder of refutation than the other Socrates

Soc Say rather Polus impossible for who can refute the truth?

Pol What do you mean? If a man is detected in an unjust attempt to make himself a tyrant, and when detected is racked mutilated has his eyes burned out, and after having had all sorts of great injuries inflicted on him and having seen his wife and children suffer the like is at last impaled or tarred and burned alive will he be happier than if he escape and become a tyrant and continue all through life doing what he likes and holding the reins of government the envy and admiration both of citizens and strangers? Is that the paradox which as you say cannot be refuted?

Soc There again noble Polus you are raising hobgoblins instead of refuting me just now you were calling witnesses against me But please to refresh my memory a little did you say— in an unjust attempt to make himself a tyrant ?

Pol Yes I did

Soc Then I say that neither of them will be happier than the other—neither he who unjustly acquires a tyranny nor he who suffers in the attempt for of two miserables one cannot be the happier but that he who escapes and becomes a tyrant is the more miserable of the two Do you laugh Polus? Well this is a new kind of refutation—when any one says anything instead of refuting him to laugh at him

Pol But do you not think Socrates that you have been sufficiently refuted when you say that which no human being will allow? Ask the company

Soc O Polus I am not a public man and only last year when my tribe were serving as Prytanes and it became my duty as their president to take the votes [474] there was a laugh at me because I was unable to take them And as I failed then you must not ask me to count the suffrages of the company now but if as I was saying you have no better argument than numbers let me have a turn and do you make trial of the sort of proof which as I think is required, for I shall produce one witness only of the truth of my words and he is the person with whom I am arguing his suffrage I know how to take, but with the many I have nothing to do and do not even address myself to them May I ask then whether you will answer in turn and have your words put to the proof? For I certainly think that I and you and every man do really believe that to do is a greater evil than to suffer injustice and not to be punished than to be punished

Pol And I should say neither I nor any man would you yourself for example suffer rather than do injustice?

Soc Yes and you too I or any man would

Pol Quite the reverse neither you nor I nor any man

Soc But will you answer?

Pol To be sure I will for I am curious to hear what you can have to say

Soc Tell me then and you will know and let us suppose that I am beginning at the beginning which of the two Polus in your opinion is the worst?—to do injustice or to suffer?

Pol I should say that suffering was worst

Soc And which is the greater disgrace?—Answer

Pol To do

Soc And the greater disgrace is the greater evil?

Pol Certainly not

Soc I understand you to say if I am not mistaken that the honourable is not the same as the good or the disgraceful as the evil?

Pol Certainly not

Soc Let me ask a question of you When you speak of beautiful things such as bodies colours figures sounds institutions do you not call them beautiful in reference to some standard bodies for example are beautiful in proportion as they are useful or as the sight of them gives pleasure to the spectators can you give any other account of personal beauty?

Pol I cannot

Soc And you would say of figures or colours generally that they were beautiful either by reason of the pleasure which they give or of their use or both?

Pol Yes I should

Soc And you would call sounds and music beautiful for the same reason?

Pol I should

Soc Laws and institutions also have no beauty in them except in so far as they are useful or pleasant or both?

[475] Pol I think not.

Soc And may not the same be said of the beauty of knowledge?

Pol To be sure Socrates and I very much approve of your measuring beauty by the standard of pleasure and utility

Soc And deformity or disgrace may be equal

Soc And to whom do we go with the unjust and intemperate?

Pol To the judges, you mean

Soc—Who are to punish them?

Pol Yes.

Soc And do not those who rightly punish others, punish them in accordance with a certain rule of justice?

Pol Clearly

Soc Then the art of money making frees a man from poverty medicine from disease and justice from intemperance and injustice?

Pol That is evident

Soc Which then is the best of these three?

Pol Will you enumerate them?

Soc Money making medicine and justice

Pol Justice Socrates far excels the two others

Soc And justice if the best, gives the greatest pleasure or advantage or both?

Pol Yes

Soc But is the being healed a pleasant thing and are those who are being healed pleased?

Pol I think not.

Soc A useful thing then?

Pol Yes

Soc Yes, because the patient is delivered from a great evil and this is the advantage of enduring the pain—that you get well?

Pol Certainly

Soc And would he be the happier man in his bodily condition who is healed or who never was out of health?

Pol Clearly he who was never out of health

Soc Yes for happiness surely does not consist in being delivered from evils but in never having had them

Pol True

Soc And suppose the case of two persons who have some evil in their bodies and that one of them is healed and delivered from evil, and another is not healed, but retains the evil —which of them is the most miserable?

Pol Clearly he who is not healed

Soc And was not punishment said by us to be a deliverance from the greatest of evils which is vice?

Pol True

Soc And justice punishes us, and makes us more just, and is the medicine of our vice?

Pol True

Soc He, then has the first place in the scale of happiness who has never had vice in his soul for this has been shown to be the greatest of evils

Pol Clearly

Soc And he has the second place who is delivered from vice?

Pol True

Soc That is to say he who receives admonition and rebuke and punishment?

Pol Yes

Soc Then he lives worst, who having been unjust has no deliverance from injustice?

Pol Certainly

[479] Soc That is, he lives worst who commits the greatest crimes and who being the most unjust of men succeeds in escaping rebuke or correction or punishment and this as you say has been accomplished by Archelaus and other tyrants and rhetoricians and potentates?

Pol True

Soc May not their way of proceeding my friend be compared to the conduct of a person who is afflicted with the worst of diseases and yet contrives not to pay the penalty to the physician for his sins against his constitution and will not be cured because, like a child he is afraid of the pain of being burned or cut —Is not that a parallel case?

Pol Yes truly

Soc He would seem as if he did not know the nature of health and bodily vigour and if we are right, Polus in our previous conclusions they are in a like case who strive to evade justice, which they see to be painful but are blind to the advantage which ensues from it, not knowing how far more miserable a companion a diseased soul is than a diseased body a soul I say which is corrupt and unrighteous and unholy And hence they do all that they can to avoid punishment and to avoid being released from the greatest of evils they provide themselves with money and friends and cultivate to the utmost their powers of persuasion But if we, Polus are right, do you see what follows or shall we draw out the consequences in form?

Pol If you please.

Soc Is it not a fact that injustice and the doing of injustice, is the greatest of evils?

Pol That is quite clear

Soc And further that to suffer punishment is the way to be released from this evil?

Pol True

Soc And not to suffer is to perpetuate the evil?

Pol Yes

Soc To do wrong then is second only in the scale of evils but to do wrong and not to be punished is first and greatest of all?

Cf Rep bk ix 579 580

Pol That is evident

Soc Then you would agree generally to the universal proposition which I was just now asserting that the affection of the patient answers to the act of the agent?

Pol I agree

Soc Then as this is admitted let me ask whether being punished is suffering or acting?

Pol Suffering Socrates there can be no doubt of that

Soc And suffering implies an agent?

Pol Certainly Socrates and he is the punisher

Soc And he who punishes rightly punishes justly?

Pol Yes

Soc And therefore he acts justly?

Pol Justly

Soc Then he who is punished and suffers retribution, suffers justly?

Pol That is evident

Soc And that which is just has been admitted to be honourable?

Pol Certainly

Soc Then the punisher does what is honourable, and the punished suffers what is honourable?

Pol True

Soc And if what is honourable then what is good for the honourable is either pleasant or useful? [477]

Pol Certainly

Soc Then he who is punished suffers what is good?

Pol That is true

Soc Then he is benefited?

Pol Yes

Soc Do I understand you to mean what I mean by the term benefited ? I mean that if he be justly punished his soul is improved

Pol Surely

Soc Then he who is punished is delivered from the evil of his soul?

Pol Yes

Soc And is he not then delivered from the greatest evil? Look at the matter in this way —In respect of a man s estate do you see any greater evil than poverty?

Pol There is no greater evil

Soc Again in a man s bodily frame you would say that the evil is weakness and disease and deformity?

Pol I should

Soc And do you not imagine that the soul likewise has some evil of her own?

Pol Of course

Soc And this you would call injustice and ignorance and cowardice and the like?

Pol Certainly

Soc So then in mind body and estate which are three you have pointed out three corresponding evils—injustice, disease poverty?

Pol True

Soc And which of the evils is the most disgraceful?—Is not the most disgraceful of them injustice and in general the evil of the soul?

Pol By far the most

Soc And if the most disgraceful then also the worst?

Pol What do you mean Socrates?

Soc I mean to say that what is most disgraceful has been already admitted to be most painful or hurtful or both

Pol Certainly

Soc And now injustice and all evil in the soul has been admitted by us to be most disgraceful?

Pol It has been admitted

Soc And most disgraceful either because most painful and causing excessive pain or most hurtful or both?

Pol Certainly

Soc And therefore to be unjust and intemperate and cowardly and ignorant is more painful than to be poor and sick?

Pol Nay Socrates the painfulness does not appear to me to follow from your premises

Soc Then if as you would argue not more painful the evil of the soul is of all evils the most disgraceful and the excess of disgrace must be caused by some preternatural greatness or extraordinary hurtfulness of the evil

Pol Clearly

Soc And that which exceeds most in hurtfulness will be the greatest of evils?

Pol Yes

Soc Then injustice and intemperance and in general the depravity of the soul are the greatest of evils!

Pol That is evident

Soc Now what art is there which delivers us from poverty? Does not the art of making money?

Pol Yes

Soc And what art frees us from disease? Does not the art of medicine?

Pol Very true

[478] Soc And what from vice and injustice? If you are not able to answer at once ask yourself whither we go with the sick and to whom we take them

Pol To the physicians, Socrates

word or opinion of his but as he changes you change, backwards and forwards. When the Athenian Demus denies anything that you are saying in the assembly you go over to his opinion and you do the same with Demus, the fair young son of Pyrilampes. For you have not the power to resist the words and ideas of your loves, and if a person were to express surprise at the strangeness of what you say from time to time when under their influence, [482] you would probably reply to him, if you were honest, that you cannot help saying what your loves say unless they are prevented and that you can only be silent when they are. Now you must understand that my words are an echo too, and therefore you need not wonder at me, but if you want to silence me, silence philosophy who is my love, for she is always telling me what I am now telling you, my friend neither is she capricious like my other love, for the son of Cleinias says one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow but philosophy is always true. She is the teacher at whose words you are now wondering, and you have heard her yourself Her you must refute, and either show as I was saying, that to do injustice and to escape punishment is not the worst of all evils or if you leave her word unrefuted, by the dog, the god of Egypt, I declare, O Callicles, that Callicles will never be at one with himself but that his whole life will be a discord And yet, my friend, I would rather that my lyre should be inharmonious, and that there should be no music in the chorus which I provided aye, or that the whole world should be at odds with me, and oppose me, rather than that I myself should be at odds with myself, and contradict myself

Cal. O Socrates, you are a regular declaimer and seem to be running riot in the argument. And now you are declaiming in this way because Polus has fallen into the same error himself of which he accused Gorgias —for he said that when Gorgias was asked by you, whether if some one came to him who wanted to learn rhetoric, and did not know justice, he would teach him justice, Gorgias in his modesty replied that he would, because he thought that mankind in general would be displeased if he answered No and then in consequence of this admission, Gorgias was compelled to contradict himself that being just the sort of thing in which you delight. Whereupon Polus laughed at you deservedly as I think but now he has himself fallen into the same trap I cannot say very much for his wit when he conceded to you that to do is more dishonourable than to suffer injustice, for this was the admission which led to his being entangled by you and because he was too modest to say what he thought, he had his mouth stopped For the truth is, Socrates, that you, who pretend to be engaged in the pursuit of truth are appealing now to the popular and vulgar notions of right, which are not natural but only conventional Convention and nature are generally at variance with one another and hence, if a person is too modest to say what he thinks, [483] he is compelled to contradict himself and you, in your ingenuity perceiving the advantage to be thereby gained, slyly ask of him who is arguing conventionally a question which is to be determined by the rule of nature and if he is talking of the rule of nature you slip away to custom as, for instance, you did in this very discussion about doing and suffering injustice. When Polus was *speaking of the con*ventionally dishonourable, you assailed him from the point of view of nature for by the rule of nature, to suffer injustice is the greater disgrace because the greater evil but conventionally to do evil is the more disgraceful. For the suffering of injustice is not the part of a man, but of a slave, who indeed had better die than live since when he is wronged and trampled upon, he is unable to help himself, or any other about whom he cares. The reason, as I conceive, is that the makers of laws are the majority who are weak and they make laws and distribute praises and censures with a view to themselves and to their own interests and they terrify the stronger sort of men and those who are able to get the better of them, in order that they may not get the better of them and they say that dishonesty is shameful and unjust meaning by the word injustice, the desire of a man to have more than his neighbours for knowing their own inferiority I suspect that they are too glad of equality And therefore the endeavour to have more than the many is conventionally said to be shameful and unjust, and is called injustice, whereas nature herself intimates that it is just for the better to have more than the worse, the more powerful than the weaker and in many ways she shows, among men as well as among animals, and indeed among whole cities and races, that justice consists in the superior ruling over and having more than the inferior For on what principle of justice did Xerxes invade Hellas, or his father the Scythians[1] (not to speak of numberless other examples) Nay but

[1] Cf. Rep. II. 359.

Pol That is true

Soc Well and was not this the point in dispute my friend? You deemed Archelaus happy because he was a very great criminal and unpunished I on the other hand maintained that he or any other who like him has done wrong and has not been punished is and ought to be, the most miserable of all men and that the doer of injustice is more miserable than the sufferer and he who escapes punishment more miserable than he who suffers—Was not that what I said?

Pol Yes

Soc And it has been proved to be true?

Pol Certainly

[480] Soc Well Polus but if this is true where is the great use of rhetoric? If we admit what has been just now said every man ought in every way to guard himself against doing wrong for he will thereby suffer great evil?

Pol True

Soc And if he or any one about whom he cares does wrong he ought of his own accord to go where he will be immediately punished he will run to the judge as he would to the physician in order that the disease of injustice may not be rendered chronic and become the incurable cancer of the soul must we not allow this consequence Polus if our former admissions are to stand —is any other inference consistent with them?

Pol To that Socrates there can be but one answer

Soc Then rhetoric is of no use to us Polus in helping a man to excuse his own injustice or that of his parents or friends or children or country but may be of use to any one who holds that instead of excusing he ought to accuse—himself above all and in the next degree his family or any of his friends who may be doing wrong he should bring to light the iniquity and not conceal it that so the wrong doer may suffer and be made whole and he should even force himself and others not to shrink but with closed eyes like brave men to let the physician operate with knife or searing iron not regarding the pain in the hope of attaining the good and the honourable let him who has done things worthy of stripes allow himself to be scourged if of bonds to be bound if of a fine to be fined if of exile to be exiled it of death to die himself being the first to accuse himself and his own relations and using rhetoric to this end that his and their unjust actions may be made manifest and that they themselves may be delivered from injustice, which is the greatest evil Then Polus rhetoric would indeed be useful Do you say Yes or No to that?

Pol To me Socrates what you are saying appears very strange though probably in agreement with your premises

Soc Is not this the conclusion if the premises are not disproven?

Pol Yes it certainly is

Soc And from the opposite point of view if indeed it be our duty to harm another whether an enemy or not—I except the case of self-defence—then I have to be upon my guard—but if my enemy [481] injures a third person then in every sort of way by word as well as deed I should try to prevent his being punished or appearing before the judge and if he appears, I should contrive that he should escape and not suffer punishment if he has stolen a sum of money let him keep what he has stolen and spend it on him and his, regardless of religion and justice and if he has done things worthy of death let him not die but rather be immortal in his wickedness or if this is not possible, let him at any rate be allowed to live as long as he can For such purposes Polus rhetoric may be useful but is of small if of any use to him who is not intending to commit injustice at least there was no such use discovered by us in the previous discussion

Cal Tell me Chaerephon is Socrates in earnest or is he joking?

Chaer I should say Callicles that he is in most profound earnest but you may as well ask him

Cal By the gods and I will Tell me Socrates are you in earnest or only in jest? For if you are in earnest and what you say is true is not the whole of human life turned upside down and are we not doing as would appear in everything the opposite of what we ought to be doing?

Soc O Callicles if there were not some community of feelings among mankind however varying in different persons—I mean to say if every man s feelings were peculiar to himself and were not shared by the rest of his species—I do not see how we could ever communicate our impressions to one another I make this remark because I perceive that you and I have a common feeling For we are lovers both and both of us have two loves apiece —I am the lover of Alcibiades the son of Cleinias and of philosophy and you of the Athenian Demus, and of Demus the son of Pyrilampes Now I observe that you with all your cleverness do not venture to contradict your favourite in any any one of your sort, off to prison declaring that you had done wrong when you had done no wrong you must allow that you would not know what to do — there you would stand gid dy and gaping and not having a word to say and when you went up before the Court even if the accuser were a poor creature and not good for much, you would die if he were disposed to claim the penalty of death And yet, Socrates what is the value of

An art wh ch converts a m an of sense i to a fool

who is helpless and has no power to save either himself or others, when he is in the greatest danger and is going to be despoiled by his enemies of all his goods and has to live simply deprived of his rights of citizenship?—he being a man who if I may use the expression may be boxed on the ears with impunity Then my good friend take my advice, and refute no more

Cease, then emulating these paltry splitters of words, and emulate only the man of substance and honour who is well to do

Soc If my soul Callicles, were made of gold should I not rejoice to discover one of those stones with which they test gold and the very best possible one to which I might bring my soul and if the stone and I agreed in approving of her training then I should know that I was in a satisfactory state and that no other test was needed by me

C l What is your meaning Socrates?

Soc I will tell you I think that I have found in you the desired touchstone

Cal Why?

Soc Because I am su e that if you agree vith me in any of th opinions which my soul forms I ha e at la t found the truth indeed For I consider that if a man is to make a complete trial of the good or e l of the soul, [48,] he ought to have three qual ties—kno ledge, good ill outspokenness, which are all possessed by you Many whom I meet are un ble to make trial of me because they are not wise as you a e others are wise but they will not tell me the truth because they have not the same inte est in me which you have and these two strangers, Gorgias and Polus are undoubtedly wise men and my very good fr ends but they are not out spoken enough and they are too modest. Why their modesty is so great that they are driven to contradict themsel es, first one and then the other of them in the face of a large company on matters of the highest moment But you have all the qualities in which these others are deficient having received an excellent education to this many Athenians can testify And you are my friend Shall I tell you why I think so? I know that you Callicles and Tisander of Aphidnae, and Andron the son of Androtion and Nausicydes of the deme of Cholarges studied together there were four of you and I once heard you advising with one another as to the extent to which the pursuit of philosophy should be carried and as I know you came to the conclusion that the study should not be pushed too much into detail You were cautioning one another not to be overwise you were afraid that too much wisdom might unconsciously to yourselves be the ruin of you And now when I hear you giving the same advice to me which you then gave to your most intimate friends I have a sufficient evidence of your real good will to me And of the frankness of your nature and freedom from modesty I am assured by yourself and the assurance is confirmed by your last speech Well then the inference in the present case clearly is, that if you agree with me in an argument about any point, that point will have been sufficiently tested by us and will not require to be submitted to any further test For you could not have agreed with me either from lack of knowledge or from superfluity of modesty nor yet from a desire to deceive me for you are my fr end as you tell me yourself And therefore when you and I are agreed the result ill be the attainment of perfect truth Now there is no nobler enquiry Callicles than that which you censure me for making— What ought the character of a man to be and what his pursuits, and how far is he to go both in maturer years and in youth? [488] For be assured that if I err in my o vn conduct I do not err intentionally but from ignorance Do not then desist from advising me now that you have begun until I have learned clearly what this is which I am to practise, and how I may acquire it And if you find me assenting to your words, and hereafter not doing that to which I assented call me dolt and deem me unworthy of receiving further instruction Once more, then, tell me what you and Pindar mean by these are the men who act according to nature yes by Heaven and according to the law of nature not perhaps according to that artificial law which we invent and impose upon our fellows of whom we take the best and strongest from their youth upwards and tame them like young lions [484]—charming them with the sound of the voice and saying to them that with equality they must be content and that the equal is the honourable and the just But if there were a man who had sufficient force he would shake off and break through and escape from all this he would trample under foot all our formulas and spells and charms and all our laws which are against nature the slave would rise in rebellion and be lord over us and the light of natural justice would shine forth And this I take to be the sentiment of Pindar, when he says in his poem that

Law is the king of all of mortals as well as of immortals

this as he says

Makes might to be right doing violence with highest hand as I infer from the deeds of Heracles for without buying them—

—I do not remember the exact words but the meaning is that without buying them and without their being given to him he carried off the oxen of Geryon according to the law of natural right and that the oxen and other possessions of the weaker and inferior properly belong to the stronger and superior And this is true as you may ascertain if you will leave philosophy and go on to higher things for philosophy Socrates if pursued in moderation and at the proper age is an elegant accomplishment but too much philosophy is the ruin of human life Even if a man has good parts still if he carries philosophy into later life he is necessarily ignorant of all those things which a gentleman and a person of honour ought to know he is inexperienced in the laws of the State and in the language which ought to be used in the dealings of man with man whether private or public and utterly ignorant of the pleasures and desires of mankind and of human character in general And people of this sort when they betake themselves to politics or business are as ridiculous as I imagine the politicians to be when they make their appearance in the arena of philosophy For as Euripides says,

Every man shines in that and pursues that and devotes the greatest portion of the day to that in which he most excels but anything in which he is inferior [485] he avoids and depreciates and praises the opposite from partiality to himself and because he thinks that he will thus praise himself The true principle is to unite them Philosophy as a part of education, is an excellent thing and there is no disgrace to a man while he is young in pursuing such a study but when he is more advanced in years the thing becomes ridiculous, and I feel towards philosophers as I do towards those who lisp and imitate children For I love to see a little child who is not of an age to speak plainly lisping at his play there is an appearance of grace and freedom in his utterance, which is natural to his childish years But when I hear some small creature carefully articulating its words I am offended the sound is disagreeable and has to my ears the twang of slavery So when I hear a man lisping or see him playing like a child his behaviour appears to me ridiculous and unmanly and worthy of stripes And I have the same feeling about students of philosophy when I see a youth thus engaged—the study appears to me to be in character and becoming a man of liberal education and him who neglects philosophy I regard as an inferior man who will never aspire to anything great or noble But if I see him continuing the study in later life and not leaving off I should like to beat him Socrates for as I was saying such a one even though he have good natural parts becomes effeminate He flies from the busy centre and the market place, in which as the poet says men become distinguished he creeps into a corner for the rest of his life and talks in a whisper with three or four admiring youths but never speaks out like a freeman in a satisfactory manner Now I Socrates am very well inclined towards you and my feeling may be compared with that of Zethus towards Amphion in the play of Euripides whom I was mentioning just now for I am disposed to say to you much what Zethus said to his brother that you Socrates are careless about the things of which you ought to be careful and that you

Who have a soul so noble are remarkable for a puerile exterior
[486] Neither in a court of justice could you state a case or give any reason or proof
Or offer valiant counsel on another s behalf

And you must not be offended my dear Socrates for I am speaking out of good will towards you if I ask whether you are not ashamed of being thus defenceless which I affirm to be the condition not of you only but of all those who will carry the study of philosophy too far For suppose that some one were to take you or eral of us, and we have a large common store of meats and drinks, and there are all sorts of per sons in our company having various degrees of strength and weakness, and one of us, being physician, is wiser in the matter of food than all the rest, and he is probably stronger than some and not so strong as others of us—will he not, being wiser be also better than we are, and our superior in this matter of food?

Cal Certainly

Soc Either then, he will have a larger share of the meats and drinks, because he is better or he will have the distribution of all of them by reason of his authority but he will not expend or make use of a larger share of them on his own person, or if he does, he will be punished—his share will exceed that of some, and be less than that of others, and if he be the weakest of all, he being the best of all will have the smallest share of all, Callicles —am I not right, my friend?

Cal. You talk about meats and drinks and physicians and other nonsense I am not speaking of them.

Soc Well, but do you admit that the wiser is the better? Answer Yes or No"

Cal Yes.

Soc And ought not the better to have a larger share?

Cal. Not of meats and drinks

Soc I understand then perhaps, of coats—the skilfullest weaver ought to have the largest coat, and the greatest number of them, and go about clothed in the best and finest of them?

Cal Fudge about coats!

Soc Then the skilfullest and best in making shoes ought to have the advantage in shoes the shoemaker clearly should walk about in the largest shoes, and have the greatest number of them?

Cal Fudge about shoes! What nonsense are you talking?

Soc Or if this is not your meaning perhaps you would say that the wise and good and true husbandman should actually have a larger share of seeds, and have as much seed as possible for his own land?

Cal How you go on, always talking in the same way Socrates!

[491] Soc Yes, Callicles, and also about the same things.

Cal Yes, by the Gods, you are literally always talking of cobblers and fullers and cooks and doctors as if thus had to do with our argument.

Soc But why will you not tell me in what a man must be superior and wiser in order to claim a larger share will you neither accept a suggestion, nor offer one?

Cal I have already told you. In the first place, I mean by superiors not cobblers or cooks, but wise politicians who understand the administration of a state, and who are not only wise but also valiant and able to carry out their designs, and not the men to faint from want of soul

Soc See now most excellent Callicles, how different my charge against you is from that which you bring against me, for you reproach me with always saying the same but I reproach you with never saying the same about the same things, for at one time you were defining the better and the superior to be the stronger then again as the wiser and now you bring forward a new notion the superior and the better are now declared by you to be the more courageous I wish my good friend, that you would tell me, once for all whom you affirm to be the better and superior and in what they are better?

Cal I have already told you that I mean those who are wise and courageous in the administration of a state—they ought to be the rulers of their states, and justice consists in their having more than their subjects

Soc But whether rulers or subjects will they or will they not have more than themselves, my friend?

Cal What do you mean?

Soc I mean that every man is his own ruler but perhaps you think that there is no necessity for him to rule himself he is only required to rule others?

Cal What do you mean by his ruling over himself?

Soc A simple thing enough just what is commonly said that a man should be temperate and master of himself and ruler of his own pleasures and passions

Cal What innocence! you mean those fools—the temperate?

Soc Certainly —any one may know that to be my meaning

Cal Quite so, Socrates and they are really fools, for how can a man be happy who is the servant of anything? On the contrary I plainly assert, that he who would truly live ought to allow his desires to wax to the uttermost and not to chastise them but when they have grown to their greatest he should have courage and intelligence [492] to minister to them and to satisfy all his longings. And this I affirm to be natural justice and nobility To this however natural justice Do you not mean that the superior should take the property of the inferior by force that the better should rule the worse the noble have more than the mean? Am I not right in my recollection?

Cal Yes that is what I was saying and so I still aver

Soc And do you mean by the better the same as the superior? for I could not make out what you were saying at the time—whether you meant by the superior the stronger, and that the weaker must obey the stronger as you seemed to imply when you said that great cities attack small ones in accordance with natural right because they are superior and stronger as though the superior and stronger and better were the same or whether the better may be also the inferior and weaker and the superior the worse or whether better is to be defined in the same way as superior this is the point which I want to have cleared up Are the superior and better and stronger the same or different?

Cal I say unequivocally that they are the same

Soc Then the many are by nature superior to the one against whom as you were saying they make the laws?

Cal Certainly

Soc Then the laws of the many are the laws of the superior?

Cal Very true

Soc Then they are the laws of the better for the superior class are far better as you were saying?

Cal Yes

Soc And since they are superior the laws which are made by them are by nature good?

Cal Yes

Soc And are not the many of opinion as you were lately saying that justice is equality [489] and that to do is more disgraceful than to suffer injustice?—is that so or not? Answer Callicles and let no modesty be found to come in the way do the many think or do they not think thus?—I must beg of you to answer in order that if you agree with me I may fortify myself by the assent of so competent an authority

Cal Yes the opinion of the many is what you say

Soc Then not only custom but nature also affirms that to do is more disgraceful than to suffer injustice and that justice is equality so that you seem to have been wrong in your former assertion when accusing me you said that nature and custom are opposed and that I knowing this was dishonestly playing between them appealing to custom when the argument is about nature and to nature when the argument is about custom?

Cal This man will never cease talking nonsense At your age Socrates, are you not ashamed to be catching at words and chuckling over some verbal slip? do you not see—have I not told you already that by superior I mean better do you imagine me to say that if a rabble of slaves and nondescripts, who are of no use except perhaps for their physical strength, get together their ipsissima verba are laws?

Soc Ho! my philosopher is that your line?

Cal Certainly

Soc I was thinking Callicles that something of the kind must have been in your mind and that is why I repeated the question—What is the superior? I wanted to know clearly what you meant for you surely do not think that two men are better than one or that your slaves are better than you because they are stronger? Then please to begin again and tell me who the better are if they are not the stronger and I will ask you great Sir to be a little milder in your instructions or I shall have to run away from you

Cal You are ironical

Soc No by the hero Zethus Callicles, by whose aid you were just now saying (486) many ironical things against me I am not — tell me then whom you mean by the better?

Cal I mean the more excellent

Soc Do you not see that you are yourself using words which have no meaning and that you are explaining nothing?—will you tell me whether you mean by the better and superior the wiser or if not whom?

[490] Cal Most assuredly I do mean the wiser

Soc Then according to you one wise man may often be superior to ten thousand fools and he ought to rule them and they ought to be his subjects and he ought to have more than they should This is what I believe that you mean (and you must not suppose that I am word-catching) if you allow that the one is superior to the ten thousand?

Cal Yes that is what I mean and that is what I conceive to be natural justice—that the better and wiser should rule and have more than the inferior

Soc Stop there, and let me ask you what you would say in this case Let us suppose that we are all together as we are now there are sev

[1] Cf what is said of Gorgias by Callicles 482.

And now would you say that the life of the intemperate is happier than that of the temperate? Do I not convince you that the opposite is the truth?

Cal. You do not convince me, Socrates, for the one who has filled himself has no longer any pleasure left and this as I was just now saying, is the life of a stone he has neither joy nor sorrow after he is once filled but the pleasure depends on the superabundance of the influx.

Soc But the more you pour in, the greater the waste and the holes must be large for the liquid to escape.

Cal. Certainly

Soc The life which you are now depicting is not that of a dead man, or of a stone, but of a cormorant you mean that he is to be hungering and eating?

Cal Yes.

Soc And he is to be thirsting and drinking?

Cal Yes, that is what I mean he is to have all his desires about him, and to be able to live happily in the gratification of them

Soc Capital, excellent, go on as you have begun, and have no shame I too, must disencumber myself of shame and first, will you tell me whether you include itching and scratching, provided you have enough of them and pass your life in scratching, in your notion of happiness?

Cal What a strange being you are, Socrates! a regular mob-orator

Soc That was the reason, Callicles, why I scared Polus and Gorgias, until they were too modest to say what they thought but you will not be too modest and will not be scared, for you are a brave man. And now answer my question.

Cal. I answer that even the scratcher would live pleasantly

Soc And if pleasantly then also happily?

Cal. To be sure.

Soc. But what if the itching is not confined to the head? Shall I pursue the question? And here, Callicles, I would have you consider how you would reply if consequences are pressed upon you, especially if in the last resort you are asked, whether the life of a catamite is not terrible, foul, miserable? Or would you venture to say that they too are happy if they only get enough of what they want?

Cal Are you not ashamed, Socrates, of introducing such topics into the argument?

Soc Well my fine friend, but am I the introducer of these topics, or he who says without any qualification that all who feel pleasure in whatever manner are happy [495] and who admits of no distinction between good and bad pleasures? And I would still ask, whether you say that pleasure and good are the same, or whether there is some pleasure which is not a good?

Cal Well, then for the sake of consistency I will say that they are the same.

Soc You are breaking the original agreement, Callicles, and will no longer be a satisfactory companion in the search after truth, if you say what is contrary to your real opinion.

Cal Why that is what you are doing too, Socrates

Soc Then we are both doing wrong Still my dear friend, I would ask you to consider whether pleasure, from whatever source derived, is the good for if this be true, then the disagreeable consequences which have been darkly intimated must follow and many others.

Cal That, Socrates, is only your opinion

Soc And do you, Callicles, seriously maintain what you are saying?

Cal Indeed I do

Soc Then as you are in earnest, shall we proceed with the argument?

Cal By all means.

Soc Well, if you are willing to proceed, determine this question for me —There is some thing, I presume, which you would call knowledge?

Cal There is.

Soc And were you not saying just now that some courage implied knowledge?

Cal I was.

Soc And you were speaking of courage and knowledge as two things different from one another?

Cal Certainly I was.

Soc And would you say that pleasure and knowledge are the same, or not the same?

Cal Not the same, O man of wisdom.

Soc And would you say that courage differed from pleasure?

Cal Certainly

Soc Well, then, let us remember that Callicles, the Acharnian, says that pleasure and good are the same but that knowledge and courage are not the same, either with one another or with the good.

Cal And what does our friend Socrates, of Foxton, say—does he assent to this, or not?

Soc He does not assent neither will Callicles, when he sees himself truly You will ad-

the many cannot attain and they blame the strong man because they are ashamed of their own weakness which they desire to conceal and hence they say that intemperance is base As I have remarked already, they enslave the nobler natures and being unable to satisfy their pleasures they praise temperance and justice out of their own cowardice For if a man had been originally the son of a king or had a nature capable of acquiring an empire or a tyranny or sovereignty what could be more truly base or evil than temperance—to a man like him I say who might freely be enjoying every good, and has no one to stand in his way and yet has admitted custom and reason and the opinion of other men to be lords over him?—must not he be in a miserable plight whom the reputation of justice and temperance hinders from giving more to his friends than to his enemies even though he be a ruler in his city? Nay Socrates for you profess to be a votary of the truth and the truth is this —that luxury and intemperance and licence if they be provided with means are virtue and happiness—all the rest is a mere bauble agreements contrary to nature foolish talk of men nothing worth [1]

Soc There is a noble freedom Callicles in your way of approaching the argument for what you say is what the rest of the world think but do not like to say And I must beg of you to persevere that the true rule of human life may become manifest Tell me then —you say do you not that in the rightly-developed man the passions ought not to be controlled but that we should let them grow to the utmost and somehow or other satisfy them and that this is virtue?

Cal Yes I do

Soc Then those who want nothing are not truly said to be happy?

Cal No indeed for then stones and dead men would be the happiest of all

Soc But surely life according to your view is an awful thing and indeed I think that Euripides may have been right in saying

Who knows if life be not death and death life and that we are very likely dead [493] I have heard a philosopher say that at this moment we are actually dead and that the body (σωμα) is our tomb (σημα) [2] and that the part of the soul which is the seat of the desires is liable to be tossed about by words and blown up and down and some ingenious person probably a Sicilian or an Italian playing with the word invented a tale in which he called the soul—because of its believing and make believe nature—a vessel and the ignorant he called the uninitiated or leaky and the place in the souls of the uninitiated in which the desires are seated, being the intemperate and incontinent part he compared to a vessel full of holes because it can never be satisfied He is not of your way of thinking Callicles for he declares that of all the souls in Hades meaning the invisible world (αειδες) these uninitiated or leaky persons are the most miserable and that they pour water into a vessel which is full of holes out of a colander which is similarly perforated The colander as my informer assures me is the soul and the soul which he compares to a colander is the soul of the ignorant which is likewise full of holes and therefore incontinent owing to a bad memory and want of faith These notions are strange enough but they show the principle which if I can I would fain prove to you that you should change your mind and instead of the intemperate and insatiate life choose that which is orderly and sufficient and has a due provision for daily needs Do I make any impression on you and are you coming over to the opinion that the orderly are happier than the intemperate? Or do I fail to persuade you and however many tales I rehearse to you do you continue of the same opinion still?

Cal The latter Socrates is more like the truth

Soc Well I will tell you another image which comes out of the same school —Let me request you to consider how far you would accept this as an account of the two lives of the temperate and intemperate in a figure —There are two men both of whom have a number of casks the one man has his casks sound and full one of wine another of honey and a third of milk besides others filled with other liquids and the streams which fill them are few and scanty and he can only obtain them with a great deal of toil and difficulty but when his casks are once filled he has no need to feed them any more and has no further trouble with them or care about them The other in like manner can procure streams though not without difficulty but his vessels are leaky and unsound and night and day he is compelled to be filling them and if he pauses for a moment [494] he is in an agony of pain Such are their respective lives —

An untranslateable pun—διὰ τὸ π θα ὁ τε καὶ πιστικὸ ω μ σε πίθο

Soc. I envy you, Callicles, for having been initiated into the great mysteries before you were initiated into the lesser. I thought that this was not allowable. But to return to our argument:—Does not a man cease from thirsting and from the pleasure of drinking at the same moment?

Cal. True.

Soc. And if he is hungry, or has any other desire, does he not cease from the desire and the pleasure at the same moment?

Cal. Very true.

Soc. Then he ceases from pain and pleasure at the same moment?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. But he does not cease from good and evil at the same moment, as you have admitted: do you still adhere to what you said?

Cal. Yes, I do; but what is the inference?

Soc. Why, my friend, the inference is that the good is not the same as the pleasant, or the evil the same as the painful; there is a cessation of pleasure and pain at the same moment; but not of good and evil, for they are different. How then can pleasure be the same as good, or pain as evil? And I would have you look at the matter in another light, which could hardly, I think, have been considered by you when you identified them: Are not the good good because they have good present with them, as the beautiful are those who have beauty present with them?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. And do you call the fools and cowards good men? For you were saying just now that the courageous and the wise are the good—would you not say so?

Cal. Certainly.

Soc. And did you never see a foolish child rejoicing?

Cal. Yes, I have.

Soc. And a foolish man too?

Cal. Yes, certainly; but what is your drift?

[498] Soc. Nothing particular, if you will only answer.

Cal. Yes, I have.

Soc. And did you ever see a sensible man rejoicing or sorrowing?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. Which rejoice and sorrow most—the wise or the foolish?

Cal. They are much upon a par, I think, in that respect.

Soc. Enough: And did you ever see a coward in battle?

Cal. To be sure.

Soc. And which rejoiced most at the departure of the enemy, the coward or the brave?

Cal. I should say "most" of both; or at any rate, they rejoiced about equally.

Soc. No matter; then the cowards, and not only the brave, rejoice?

Cal. Greatly.

Soc. And the foolish; so it would seem?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. And are only the cowards pained at the approach of their enemies, or are the brave also pained?

Cal. Both are pained.

Soc. And are they equally pained?

Cal. I should imagine that the cowards are more pained.

Soc. And are they not better pleased at the enemy's departure?

Cal. I dare say.

Soc. Then are the foolish and the wise and the cowards and the brave all pleased and pained, as you were saying, in nearly equal degree; but are the cowards more pleased and pained than the brave?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. But surely the wise and brave are the good, and the foolish and the cowardly are the bad?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. Then the good and the bad are pleased and pained in a nearly equal degree?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. Then are the good and bad good and bad in a nearly equal degree, or have the bad the advantage both in good and evil? [i. e. in having more pleasure and more pain.]

Cal. I really do not know what you mean.

Soc. Why, do you not remember saying that the good were good because good was present with them, and the evil because evil; and that pleasures were goods and pains evils?

Cal. Yes, I remember.

Soc. And are not these pleasures or goods present to those who rejoice—if they do rejoice?

Cal. Certainly.

Soc. Then those who rejoice are good when goods are present with them?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. And those who are in pain have evil or sorrow present with them?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. And would you still say that the evil are evil by reason of the presence of evil?

Cal. I should.

Soc. Then those who rejoice are good, and those who are in pain evil?

mit I suppose that good and evil fortune are opposed to each other?

Cal Yes

Soc And if they are opposed to each other then like health and disease they exclude one another a man cannot have them both, or be without them both at the same time?

Cal What do you mean?

Soc Take the case of any bodily affection — a man may have the complaint in his eyes which is called ophthalmia?

[496] Cal To be sure

Soc But he surely cannot have the same eyes well and sound at the same time?

Cal Certainly not

Soc And when he has got rid of his ophthalmia has he got rid of the health of his eyes too? Is the final result, that he gets rid of them both together?

Cal Certainly not

Soc That would surely be marvellous and absurd?

Cal Very

Soc I suppose that he is affected by them and gets rid of them in turns?

Cal Yes

Soc And he may have strength and weakness in the same way by fits?

Cal Yes

Soc Or swiftness and slowness?

Cal Certainly

Soc And does he have and not have good and happiness, and their opposites evil and misery in a similar alternation? [1]

Cal Certainly he has

Soc If then there be anything which a man has and has not at the same time clearly that cannot be good and evil—do we agree? Please not to answer without consideration

Cal I entirely agree

Soc Go back now to our former admissions —Did you say that to hunger I mean the mere state of hunger was pleasant or painful?

Cal I said painful but that to eat when you are hungry is pleasant

Soc I know but still the actual hunger is painful am I not right?

Cal Yes

Soc And thirst too is painful?

Cal Yes very

Soc Need I adduce any more instances or would you agree that all wants or desires are painful?

Cal I agree and therefore you need not adduce any more instances

Soc Very good And you would admit that to drink when you are thirsty is pleasant?

Cal Yes

Soc And in the sentence which you have just uttered the word thirsty implies pain?

Cal Yes

Soc And the word drinking is expressive of pleasure and of the satisfaction of the want?

Cal Yes

Soc There is pleasure in drinking?

Cal Certainly

Soc When you are thirsty?

Cal Yes

Soc And in pain?

Cal Yes

Soc Do you see the inference —that pleasure and pain are simultaneous when you say that being thirsty, you drink? For are they not simultaneous and do they not affect at the same time the same part whether of the soul or the body?—which of them is affected cannot be supposed to be of any consequence Is not this true?

Cal It is

Soc You said also that no man could have good and evil fortune at the same time?

Cal Yes, I did

[497] Soc But you admitted that when in pain a man might also have pleasure?

Cal Clearly

Soc Then pleasure is not the same as good fortune or pain the same as evil fortune and therefore the good is not the same as the pleasant?

Cal I wish I knew Socrates what your quibbling means

Soc You know Callicles but you affect not to know

Cal Well get on and don t keep fooling then you will know what a wiseacre you are in your admonition of me

Soc Does not a man cease from his thirst and from his pleasure in drinking at the same time?

Cal I do not understand what you are saying

Gor Nay Callicles answer if only for our sakes —we should like to hear the argument out

Cal Yes Gorgias but I must complain of the habitual trifling of Socrates he is always arguing about little and unworthy questions

Gor What matter? Your reputation Callicles is not at stake Let Socrates argue in his own fashion

Cal Well then Socrates you shall ask these little peddling questions since Gorgias wishes to have them

[1] Cf Republic iv 436

Soc And in the sentence which you have just uttered the word thirsty implies pain?

Cal Yes

Soc And the word drinking is expressive of pleasure and of the satisfaction of the want?

Cal Yes

Soc There is pleasure in drinking?

Cal Certainly

Soc When you are thirsty?

Cal Yes

Soc And in pain?

Cal Yes

Soc Do you see the inference —that pleasure and pain are simultaneous when you say that being thirsty you drink? For are they not simultaneous and do they not affect at the same time the same part whether of the soul or the body?—which of them is affected cannot be supposed to be of any consequence Is not this true?

Cal It is

Soc You said also that no man could have good and evil fortune at the same time?

Cal Yes I did

[497] Soc But you admitted that when in pain a man might also have pleasure?

Cal Clearly

Soc Then pleasure is not the same as good fortune or pain the same as evil fortune and therefore the good is not the same as the pleasant?

Cal I wish I knew Socrates what your quibbling means

Soc You know Callicles but you affect not to know

Cal Well get on and don t keep fooling then you will know what a wiseacre you are in your admonition of me

Soc Does not a man cease from his thirst and from his pleasure in drinking at the same time?

Cal I do not understand what you are saying

Gor Nay Callicles answer if only for our sakes —we should like to hear the argument out

Cal Yes Gorgias but I must complain of the habitual trifling of Socrates he is always arguing about little and unworthy questions

Gor What matter? Your reputation Callicles is not at stake Let Socrates argue in his own fashion

Cal Well then Socrates you shall ask these little peddling questions since Gorgias wishes to have them

sembly and cultivating rhetoric, and engaging in public affairs, according to the principles now in vogue or whether he should pursue the life of philosophy—and in what the latter way differs from the former But perhaps we had better first try to distinguish them as I did before, and when we have come to an agreement that they are distinct, we may proceed to consider in what they differ from one another and which of them we should choose. Perhaps, however you do not even now understand what I mean?

Cal No, I do not.

Soc Then I will explain myself more clearly seeing that you and I have agreed that there is such a thing as good, and that there is such a thing as pleasure, and that pleasure is not the same as good, and that the pursuit and process of acquisition of the one that is pleasure, is different from the pursuit and process of acquisition of the other which is good—I wish that you would tell me whether you agree with me thus far or not—do you agree?

Cal I do

Soc Then I will proceed, and ask whether you also agree with me, [501] and whether you think that I spoke the truth when I further said to Gorgias and Polus that cookery in my opinion is only an experience, and not an art at all and that whereas medicine is an art, and attends to the nature and constitution of the patient, and has principles of action and reason in each case, cookery in attending upon pleasure never regards either the nature or reason of that pleasure to which she devotes herself but goes straight to her end, nor ever considers or calculates anything, but works by experience and routine, and just preserves the recollection of what she has usually done when producing pleasure And first, I would have you consider whether I have proved what I was saying, and then whether there are not other similar processes which have to do with the soul—some of them processes of art, making a provision for the soul's highest interest—others despising the interest, and, as in the previous case, considering only the pleasure of the soul, and how this may be acquired, but not considering what pleasures are good or bad, and having no other aim but to afford gratification, whether good or bad In my opinion, Callicles, there are such processes, and this is the sort of thing which I term flattery whether concerned with the body or the soul, or whenever employed with a view to pleasure and without any consideration of good and evil. And now I wish that you would tell me whether you agree with us in this notion or whether you differ

Cal I do not differ on the contrary I agree for in that way I shall soonest bring the argument to an end, and shall oblige my friend Gorgias

Soc And is this notion true of one soul or of two or more?

Cal Equally true of two or more.

Soc Then a man may delight a whole assembly and yet have no regard for their true interests?

Cal Yes

Soc Can you tell me the pursuits which delight mankind—or rather if you would prefer let me ask, and do you answer which of them belong to the pleasurable class, and which of them not? In the first place, what say you of flute playing? Does not that appear to be an art which seeks only pleasure, Callicles, and thinks of nothing else?

Cal I assent.

Soc And is not the same true of all similar arts, as, for example, the art of playing the lyre at festivals?

Cal Yes.

Soc And what do you say of the choral art and of dithyrambic poetry?—are not they of the same nature? Do you imagine that Cinesias the son of Meles cares about what will tend to the moral [502] improvement of his hearers, or about what will give pleasure to the multitude?

Cal There can be no mistake about Cinesias, Socrates.

Soc And what do you say of his father Meles the harp-player? Did he perform with any view to the good of his hearers? Could he be said to regard even their pleasure? For his singing was an infliction to his audience. And of harp-playing and dithyrambic poetry in general what would you say? Have they not been invented wholly for the sake of pleasure?

Cal That is my notion of them

Soc And as for the Muse of Tragedy that solemn and august personage—what are her aspirations? Is all her aim and desire only to give pleasure to the spectators, or does she fight against them and refuse to speak of their pleasant vices, and willingly proclaim in word and song truths welcome and unwelcome?—which in your judgment is her character?

Cal There can be no doubt, Socrates, that Tragedy has her face turned towards pleasure and the gratification of the audience.

Soc And is not that the sort of thing, Calli

Cal Yes

Soc The degrees of good and evil vary with the degrees of pleasure and of pain?

Cal Yes

Soc Have the wise man and the fool the brave and the coward joy and pain in nearly equal degrees? or would you say that the coward has more?

Cal I should say that he has

Soc[1] Help me then to draw out the conclusion which follows from our admissions [499] for it is good to repeat and review what is good twice and thrice over, as they say Both the wise man and the brave man we allow to be good?

Cal Yes

Soc And the foolish man and the coward to be evil?

Cal Certainly

Soc And he who has joy is good?

Cal Yes

Soc And he who is in pain is evil?

Cal Certainly

Soc The good and evil both have joy and pain but perhaps the evil has more of them?

Cal Yes

Soc Then must we not infer that the bad man is as good and bad as the good or perhaps even better?—is not this a further inference which follows equally with the preceding from the assertion that the good and the pleasant are the same —can this be denied Callicles?

Cal I have been listening and making admissions to you, Socrates and I remark that if a person grants you anything in play you like a child want to keep hold and will not give it back But do you really suppose that I or any other human being denies that some pleasures are good and others bad?

Soc Alas Callicles how unfair you are! you certainly treat me as if I were a child sometimes saying one thing and then another as if you were meaning to deceive me And yet I thought at first that you were my friend and would not have deceived me if you could have helped But I see that I was mistaken and now I suppose that I must make the best of a bad business as they said of old and take what I can get out of you —Well then as I understand you to say I may assume that some pleasures are good and others evil?

Cal Yes

Soc The beneficial are good and the hurtful are evil?

Cal To be sure

Soc And the beneficial are those which do some good and the hurtful are those which do some evil?

Cal Yes

Soc Take for example, the bodily pleasures of eating and drinking which we were just now mentioning—you mean to say that those which promote health or any other bodily excellence, are good and their opposites evil?

Cal Certainly

Soc And in the same way there are good pains and there are evil pains?

Cal To be sure

Soc And ought we not to choose and use the good pleasures and pains?

Cal Certainly

Soc But not the evil?

Cal Clearly

Soc Because if you remember Polus and I have agreed that all our actions are to be done for the sake of the good—and will you agree with us in saying that the good is the end of all our actions and that all our actions are to be done for the sake of the good [500] and not the good for the sake of them?—will you add a third vote to our two?

Cal I will

Soc Then pleasure like everything else is to be sought for the sake of that which is good and not that which is good for the sake of pleasure?

Cal To be sure

Soc But can every man choose what pleasures are good and what are evil or must he have art or knowledge of them in detail?

Cal He must have art

Soc Let me now remind you of what I was saying to Gorgias and Polus I was saying as you will not have forgotten that there were some processes which aim only at pleasure and know nothing of a better and worse and there are other processes which know good and evil And I considered that cookery which I do not call an art but only an experience was of the former class which is concerned with pleasure and that the art of medicine was of the class which is concerned with the good And now by the god of friendship I must beg you Callicles not to jest, or to imagine that I am jesting with you do not answer at random and contrary to your real opinion—for you will observe that we are arguing about the way of human life and to a man who has any sense at all what question can be more serious than this?—whether he should follow after that way of life to which you exhort me and act what you call the manly part of speaking in the as-order in the soul? Try and discover a name for this as well as for the other

Cal Why not give the name yourself Socrates?

Soc Well if you had rather that I should I will and you shall say whether you agree with me, and if not, you shall refute and answer me. Healthy as I conceive, is the name which is given to the regular order of the body whence comes health and every other bodily excellence is that true or not?

Cal True.

Soc And lawful and law are the names which are given to the regular order and action of the soul and these make men lawful and orderly —and so we have temperance and justice have we not?

Cal Granted

Soc And will not the true rhetorician who is honest and understands his art have his eye fixed upon these, in all the words which he addresses to the souls of men and in all his actions, both in what he gives and in what he takes away? Will not his aim be to implant justice in the souls of his citizens and take away injustice to implant temperance and take away intemperance, to implant every virtue and take away every vice? Do you not agree?

Cal I agree.

Soc For what use is there, Callicles, in giving to the body of a sick man who is in a bad state of health a quantity of the most delightful food or drink or any other pleasant thing which may be really as bad for him as if you gave him nothing or even worse if rightly estimated Is not that true?

[505] Cal I will not say No to it.

Soc For in my opinion there is no profit in a man's life if his body is in an evil plight—in that case his life also is evil am I not right?

Cal Yes

Soc When a man is in health the physicians will generally allow him to eat when he is hungry and drink when he is thirsty and to satisfy his desires as he likes, but when he is sick they hardly suffer him to satisfy his desires at all even you will admit that?

Cal Yes.

Soc And does not the same argument hold of the soul my good sir? While she is in a bad state and is senseless and intemperate and unjust and unholy her desires ought to be controlled and she ought to be prevented from doing anything which does not tend to her own improvement.

Cal Yes

Soc Such treatment will be better for the soul herself?

Cal To be sure.

Soc And to restrain her from her appetites is to chastise her?

Cal Yes

Soc Then restraint or chastisement is better for the soul than intemperance or the absence of control which you were just now preferring?

Cal I do not understand you Socrates and I wish that you would ask some one who does

Soc Here is a gentleman who cannot endure to be improved or to subject himself to that very chastisement of which the argument speaks!

Cal I do not heed a word of what you are saying and have only answered hitherto out of civility to Gorgias.

Soc What are we to do then? Shall we break off in the middle?

Cal You shall judge for yourself.

Soc Well but people say that a tale should have a head and not break off in the middle and I should not like to have the argument going about without a head please then to go on a little longer and put the head on

Cal How tyrannical you are Socrates! I wish that you and your argument would rest, or that you would get some one else to argue with you

Soc But who else is willing?—I want to finish the argument.

Cal Cannot you finish without my help either talking straight on or questioning and answering yourself?

Soc Must I then say with Epicharmus Two men spoke before but now one shall be enough ? I suppose that there is absolutely no help And if I am to carry on the enquiry by myself I will first of all remark that not only I but all of us should have an ambition to know what is true and what is false in this matter for the discovery of the truth is a common good And now I will proceed to argue according to my own notion [506] But if any of you think that I arrive at conclusions which are untrue you must interpose and refute me, for I do not speak from any knowledge of what I am saying I am an enquirer like yourselves, and therefore if my opponent says anything which is of force I shall be the first to agree with him I am speaking on the supposition that the argument ought to be completed but if you think otherwise let us leave off and go our ways.

Gor I think Socrates, that we should not go

cles which we were just now describing as flattery?

Cal Quite true

Soc Well now suppose that we strip all poetry of song and rhythm and metre there will remain speech?

Cal To be sure

Soc And this speech is addressed to a crowd of people?

Cal Yes

Soc Then poetry is a sort of rhetoric?

Cal True

Soc And do not the poets in the theatres seem to you to be rhetoricians?

Cal Yes

Soc Then now we have discovered a sort of rhetoric which is addressed to a crowd of men women and children freemen and slaves And this is not much to our taste for we have described it as having the nature of flattery

Cal Quite true

Soc Very good And what do you say of that other rhetoric which addresses the Athenian assembly and the assemblies of freemen in other states? Do the rhetoricians appear to you always to aim at what is best and do they seek to improve the citizens by their speeches or are they too like the rest of mankind bent upon giving them pleasure forgetting the public good in the thought of their own interest playing with the people as with children and trying to amuse them but never considering whether they are better or worse for this?

[503] Cal I must distinguish There are some who have a real care of the public in what they say while others are such as you describe

Soc I am contented with the admission that rhetoric is of two sorts one which is mere flattery and disgraceful declamation the other which is noble and aims at the training and improvement of the souls of the citizens and strives to say what is best whether welcome or unwelcome to the audience but have you ever known such a rhetoric or if you have and can point out any rhetorician who is of this stamp who is he?

Cal But indeed I am afraid that I cannot tell you of any such among the orators who are at present living

Soc Well then can you mention any one of a former generation who may be said to have improved the Athenians who found them worse and made them better from the day that he began to make speeches? for indeed I do not know of such a man

Cal What! did you never hear that Themistocles was a good man and Cimon and Miltiades and Pericles who is just lately dead and whom you heard yourself?

Soc Yes Callicles they were good men if as you said at first, true virtue consists only in the satisfaction of our own desires and those of others but if not and if as we were afterwards compelled to acknowledge the satisfaction of some desires makes us better and of others worse and we ought to gratify the one and not the other and there is an art in distinguishing them—can you tell me of any of these statesmen who did distinguish them?

Cal No indeed I cannot

Soc Yet, surely Callicles if you look you *will find such a one Suppose that we just calm*ly consider whether any of these was such as I have described Will not the good man who says whatever he says with a view to the best speak with a reference to some standard and not at random just as all other artists whether the painter the builder the shipwright or any other look all of them to their own work and do not select and apply at random what they apply but strive to give a definite form to it?[1] The artist disposes all things in order and compels the one part to harmonize and accord with the other part [504] until he has constructed a regular and systematic whole and this is true of all artists and in the same way the trainers and physicians of whom we spoke before give order and regularity to the body do you deny this?

Cal No I am ready to admit it.

Soc Then the house in which order and regularity prevail is good that in which there is disorder evil?

Cal Yes

Soc And the same is true of a ship?

Cal Yes

Soc And the same may be said of the human body?

Cal Yes

Soc And what would you say of the soul? Will the good soul be that in which disorder is prevalent or that in which there is harmony and order?

Cal The latter follows from our previous admissions

Soc What is the name which is given to the effect of harmony and order in the body?

Cal I suppose that you mean health and strength?

Soc Yes I do and what is the name which you would give to the effect of harmony and

[1] Cf Republic iii 392 ff

in earnest when I said that a man ought to accuse himself and his son and his friend if he did anything wrong, and that to this end he should use his rhetoric—all those consequences are true. And that which you thought that Polus was led to admit out of modesty is true viz., that, to do injustice, if more disgraceful than to suffer, is in that degree worse and the other position, which, according to Polus, Gorgias admitted out of modesty that he who would truly be a rhetorician ought to be just and have a knowledge of justice, has also turned out to be true.

And now these things being as we have said, let us proceed in the next place to consider whether you are right in throwing in my teeth that I am unable to help myself or any of my friends or kinsmen or to save them in the extremity of danger and that I am in the power of another like an outlaw to whom any one may do what he likes—he may box my ears, which was a brave saying of yours or take away my goods or banish me, or even do his worst and kill me a condition which, as you say is the height of disgrace My answer to you is one which has been already often repeated, but may as well be repeated once more I tell you Callicles that to be boxed on the ears wrongfully is not the worst evil which can befall a man, nor to have my purse or my body cut open, but that to smite and slay me and mine wrongfully is far more disgraceful and more evil, aye, and to despoil and enslave and pillage, or in any way at all to wrong me and mine, is far more disgraceful and evil to the doer of the wrong than to me who am the sufferer [509] These truths, which have been already set forth as I state them in the previous discussion would seem now to have been fixed and riveted by us, if I may use an expression which is certainly bold, in words which are like bonds of iron and adamant and unless you or some other still more enterprising hero shall break them, there is no possibility of denying what I say For my position has always been, that I myself am ignorant how these things are, but that I have never met any one who could say otherwise, any more than you can, and not appear ridiculous. This is my position still and if what I am saying is true, and injustice is the greatest of evils to the doer of injustice, and yet there is if possible a greater than this greatest of evils, in an unjust man not suffering retribution, what is that defence of which the want will make a man truly ridiculous Must not the defence be one which will avert the greatest of human evils? And will not the worst of all defences be that with which a man is unable to defend himself or his family or his friends?—and next will come that which is unable to avert the next greatest evil thirdly that which is unable to avert the third greatest evil and so of other evils As is the greatness of evil so is the honour of being able to avert them in their several degrees, and the disgrace of not being able to avert them Am I not right Callicles?

Cal Yes, quite right.

Soc Seeing then that there are these two evils, the doing injustice and the suffering injustice—and we affirm that to do injustice is a greater and to suffer injustice a lesser evil—by what devices can a man succeed in obtaining the two advantages the one of not doing and the other of not suffering injustice? must he have the power or only the will to obtain them? I mean to ask whether a man will escape injustice if he has only the will to escape, or must he have provided himself with the power?

Cal He must have provided himself with the power that is clear

Soc And what do you say of doing injustice? Is the will only sufficient, and will that prevent him from doing injustice, or must he have provided himself with power and art and if he has not studied and practised will he be unjust still? Surely you might say Callicles whether you think that Polus and I were right in admitting the conclusion that no one does wrong voluntarily but that all do wrong against their will?

[510] Cal Granted Socrates, if you will only have done

Soc Then, as would appear power and art have to be provided in order that we may do no injustice?

Cal Certainly

Soc And what art will protect us from suffering injustice, if not wholly yet as far as possible? I want to know whether you agree with me for I think that such an art is the art of one who is either a ruler or even tyrant himself or the equal and companion of the ruling power

Cal Well said Socrates and please to observe how ready I am to praise you when you talk sense

Soc Think and tell me whether you would approve of another view of mine To me every man appears to be most the friend of him who is most like to him—like to like, as ancient sages say Would you not agree to this?

Cal I should.

Soc But when the tyrant is rude and uneducated

Cf Republic ii. 558 ff.

our ways until you have completed the argument and this appears to me to be the wish of the rest of the company I myself should very much like to hear what more you have to say

Soc I too Gorgias should have liked to continue the argument with Callicles and then I might have given him an Amphion in return for his Zethus [1] but since you, Callicles are unwilling to continue I hope that you will listen, and interrupt me if I seem to you to be in error And if you refute me I shall not be angry with you as you are with me but I shall inscribe you as the greatest of benefactors on the tablets of my soul

Cal My good fellow never mind me but get on

Soc Listen to me then while I recapitulate the argument —Is the pleasant the same as the good? Not the same Callicles and I are agreed about that And is the pleasant to be pursued for the sake of the good? or the good for the sake of the pleasant? The pleasant is to be pursued for the sake of the good And that is pleasant at the presence of which we are pleased and that is good at the presence of which we are good? To be sure And we are good and all good things whatever are good when some virtue is present in us or them? That Callicles, is my conviction But the virtue of each thing whether body or soul instrument or creature when given to them in the best way comes to them not by chance but as the result of the order and truth and art which are imparted to them Am I not right? I maintain that I am And is not the virtue of each thing dependent on order or arrangement? Yes I say And that which makes a thing good is the proper order inhering in each thing? Such is my view And is not the soul which has an order of her own better than that which has no order? Certainly And the soul which has order is orderly? Of course And that which is orderly is temperate? [507] Assuredly And the temperate soul is good? No other answer can I give Callicles dear have you any?

Cal Go on my good fellow

Soc Then I shall proceed to add that if the temperate soul is the good soul the soul which is in the opposite condition that is the foolish and intemperate is the bad soul Very true

And will not the temperate man do what is proper both in relation to the gods and to men —for he would not be temperate if he did not? Certainly he will do what is proper In his relation to other men he will do what is just and in his relation to the gods he will do what is holy and he who does what is just and holy must be just and holy? Very true. And must he not be courageous? for the duty of a temperate man is not to follow or to avoid what he ought not but what he ought whether things or men or pleasures or pains and patiently to endure when he ought and therefore Callicles, the temperate man being as we have described, also just and courageous and holy, cannot be other than a perfectly good man nor can the good man do otherwise than well and perfectly whatever he does and he who does well must of necessity be happy and blessed and the evil man who does evil miserable now this latter is he whom you were applauding,—the intemperate who is the opposite of the temperate. Such is my position and these things I affirm to be true And if they are true, then I further affirm that he who desires to be happy must pursue and practise temperance and run away from intemperance as fast as his legs will carry him he had better order his life so as not to need punishment but if either he or any of his friends whether private individual or city are in need of punishment then justice must be done and he must suffer punishment if he would be happy This appears to me to be the aim which a man ought to have, and towards which he ought to direct all the energies both of himself and of the state acting so that he may have temperance and justice present with him and be happy not suffering his lusts to be unrestrained and in the never-ending desire to satisfy them leading a robber s life Such a one is the friend neither of God nor man for he is incapable of communion and he who is incapable of communion is also incapable of friendship And philosophers tell us [508] Callicles, that communion and friendship and orderliness and temperance and justice bind together heaven and earth and gods and men and that this universe is therefore called Cosmos or order not disorder or misrule my friend But although you are a philosopher you seem to me never to have observed that geometrical equality is mighty both among gods and men you think that you ought to cultivate inequality or excess and do not care about geometry —Well then either the principle that the happy are made happy by the possession of justice and temperance and the miserable miserable by the possession of vice, must be refuted or if it is granted what will be the consequences? All the consequences which I drew before Callicles, and about which you asked me whether I was else, in his saving power for he sometimes sa es whole cit es. Is there any comparison be tween him and the pleader? And if he were to talk, Callicles, in your grandiose style, he would bury you under a mountain of words, declaring and insisting that we ought all of us to be en gine makers, and that no other profession is worth thinking about he would ha e plenty to say Nevertheless you despise him and his art, and sneeringly call him an engine-maker and you will not allow your daughters to marry his son, or marry your son to his daughters And yet, on your principle, what justice or reason is there in your refusal? What right have you to despise the engine maker and the others whom I was just now mentioning? I know that you will say I am better and better born" But if the better is not what I say and virtue consists only in a man sa ing himself and his, whatever may be his character then your cen sure of the engine maker and of the physician and of the other arts of sal ation, is ridiculous. O my friend! I want you to see that the noble and the good may possibly be something differ ent from saving and being saved —May not he who is truly a man cease to care about living a certain time?—he knows, as women say that no man can escape fate, and therefore he is not fond of life he leaves all that with God, and considers in what way he can best spend his ap poin ed term—whether by assimilating him self to the constitution under which he lives, [513] as you at this moment have to cons der how you may become as like as possible to the Athenian people, if you mean to be in their good graces, and to ha e power in the state whereas I want you to think and see whether this is for the interest of either of us—I would not have us risk that which is dearest on the acquis tion of this power like the Thessalian enchantresses, who as they say bring down the moon f om hea en at the r sk of their own per dition But if you suppose that any man will how you the art of becoming great in the city and yet not conforming yourself to the ways of the city whether for better or worse, then I can only say that you are mistaken, Callicles for he wh would deserve to be the true natural fr end of the Athenian Demus, aye, or of Pyrilampes d lin who is called after them, must be by nature like them, and not an imitator on l He, then who will make you most like them w ll make you s you desire, a statesman nd orator for every man i pleased when he is poken to in h own language and sp it, nd d sl kes any other But perhaps you, sweet Callicles, may be of another mind What do you say?

Cal Somehow or other your words, Socrates, always appear to me to be good words and yet, like the rest of the world, I am not quite convinced by them.

Soc The reason is, Callicles, that the love of Demus wh ch ab des in your soul is an adver sary to me but I dare say that if we recur to these same matters, and consider them more thoroughly you may be convinced for all that. Please then to remember that there are two processes of training all things, including body and soul in the one, as we said we treat them with a view to pleasure, and in the other with a view to the highest good, and then we do not indulge but resist them. was not that the distinction which we drew?

Cal Very true.

Soc And the one which had pleasure in view was just a vulgar flattery — vas not that an other of our conclusions?

Cal Be it so, if you will have it

Soc And the other had in view the greatest improvement of that which was ministered to whether body or soul?

Cal Qu te true.

Soc And must we not have the same end in view in the treatment of our city and citizens? Must we not try and make them as good as poss ble? [514] For we have already discovered that there is no use in imparting to them any other good unless the mind of those who are to have the good whether money or office, or any other sort of power be gentle and good. Shall we say that?

Cal Yes, certainly if you like

Soc Well then, if you and I Callicles, were intending to set about some public business, and were ad sing one another to undertake build ngs, such as walls docks or temples of the largest size, ought we not to examine our selves, first, as to whether we know or do not know the art of building and who taught us? —would not that be necessary Callicles?

Cal True.

Soc In the second place, we should have to consider wl ether we had ever construct d any pri ate house, either of our own or or our friends, and whether this build ng of ours was a success or not and if upon consideration v e found that we had had good and eminent masters, and had been successful in constructing many fine buildings, not only with their assistance, but without them, by our own una ded cated he may be expected to fear any one who is his superior in virtue, and will never be able to be perfectly friendly with him

Cal That is true

Soc Neither will he be the friend of any one who is greatly his inferior, for the tyrant will despise him and will never seriously regard him as a friend

Cal That again is true

Soc Then the only friend worth mentioning whom the tyrant can have will be one who is of the same character and has the same likes and dislikes and is at the same time willing to be subject and subservient to him he is the man who will have power in the state and no one will injure him with impunity —is not that so?

Cal Yes

Soc And if a young man begins to ask how he may become great and formidable this would seem to be the way—he will accustom himself from his youth upward to feel sorrow and joy on the same occasions as his master and will contrive to be as lil e him as possible?

Cal Yes

Soc And in this way he will have accomplished as you and your friends would say the end of becoming a great man and not suffering injury?

Cal Very true

Soc But will he also escape from doing injury? Must not the very opposite be true if he is to be like the tyrant in his injustice and to have influence with him? [511] Will he not rather contrive to do as much wrong as possible and not be punished?

Cal True

Soc And by the imitation of his master and by the power which he thus acquires will not his soul become bad and corrupted and will not this be the greatest evil to him?

Cal You always contrive somehow or other Socrates to invert everything do you not know that he who imitates the tyrant will if he has a mind kill him who does not imitate him and take away his goods?

Soc Excellent Callicles I am not deaf and I have heard that a great many times from you and from Polus and from nearly every man in the city, but I wish that you would hear me too I dare say that he will kill him if he has a mind —the bad man will kill the good and true

Cal And is not that just the provoking thing?

Soc Nay not to a man of sense as the argument shows do you think that all our cares should be directed to prolonging life to the uttermost and to the study of those arts which secure us from danger always like that art of rhetoric which saves men in courts of law and which you advise me to cultivate?

Cal Yes truly and very good advice too

Soc Well my friend but what do you think of swimming is that an art of any great pretensions?

Cal No indeed

Soc And yet surely swimming saves a man from death and there are occasions on which he must know how to swim And if you despise the swimmers I will tell you of another and greater art the art of the pilot who not only saves the souls of men but also their bodies and properties from the extremity of danger just like rhetoric Yet his art is modest and unpresuming it has no airs or pretences of doing anything extraordinary and in return for the same salvation which is given by the pleader demands only two obols if he brings us from Aegina to Athens or for the longer voyage from Pontus or Egypt at the utmost two drachmae when he has saved as I was just now saying the passenger and his wife and children and goods and safely disembarked them at the Piraeus—this is the payment which he asks in return for so great a boon and he who is the master of the art and has done all this, gets out and walks about on the sea shore by his ship in an unassuming way For he is able to reflect and is aware that he cannot tell which of his fellow passengers he has benefited and which of them he has injured in not allowing them to be drowned He knows that they are just the same when he has disembarked them as when they [512] embarked and not a whit better either in their bodies or in their souls and he considers that if a man who is afflicted by great and incurable bodily diseases is only to be pitied for having escaped and is in no way benefited by him in having been saved from drowning much less he who has great and incurable diseases not of the body but of the soul which is the more valuable part of him neither is life worth having nor of any profit to the bad man whether he be delivered from the sea or the law-courts or any other devourer—and so he reflects that such a one had better not live for he cannot live well [1]

And this is the reason why the pilot, although he is our saviour is not usually conceited any more than the engineer who is not at all behind either the general or the pilot or any one saying whether man is an animal?

Cal Certainly he is.

Soc And was not Pericles a shepherd of men?

Cal Yes.

Soc And if he was a good political shepherd, ought not the animals who were his subjects, as we were just now acknowledging to have become more just, and not more unju t?

Cal Quite true

Soc And are not just men gentle, as Homer says?—or are you of another mind?

Cal I agree.

Soc And yet he really d d make them more savage than he received them, and their savage ness was shown towards himself which he must ave been very far from des ring

Cal Do you want me to agree with you?

Soc Yes, if I seem to yo to speak the truth

Cal Granted then.

Soc And if they were more sa age, must they ot ha e been more unjust and inferior?

Cal Granted aga n.

Soc Then upon this v ew Pericles was not a good statesman?

Cal That is, upon your iew

Soc Nay the view is yours, after what you ha e admitted. Take the case of Cimon again Did not the ery persons whom he was serv ing ostracize him, in order that they might not hear his oice for ten years? and they did just the same to Themistocles, adding the penalty of exile and they oted that Miltiades, the hero of Mar thon, should be thrown into the p t of death, and he was only sa ed by the Prytanis And yet, if t ey had been really good men, as you say these things would never have happened to them. For the good charioteers are not those who at first keep their place, and then, when they ha e broken-in their horses, and themsel es become better charioteers, are th w out—that is not the way e ther in char ioteering or in any pro ession—What do you th nk?

Cal I should think not.

[517] Soc Well but f so, the truth is as I ha said a eady that in the Athenian State no one has ever shown himself to be a good statesman—you admitted that th s was true of our present sta esmen, but not true of former ones, and you p eferred them to the others yet they ha turned out to be no better than our present nes and therefo e, if they we e rhetoricia s, they d d not use the true art of rhetoric or of flattery or they would not ha e fallen out of f our

Cal But surely Socrates, no l ing man ever came near any one of them in his performances.

Soc O my dear friend I say nothing against them regarded as the serving men of the State and I do think that they were certainly more serviceable than those who are living now and better able to gratify the wishes of the State but as to transforming those desires and not allowing them to have their way and using the powers which they had whether of persuasion or of force, in the improvement of their fellow citizens, which is the prime object of the truly good c tizen, I do not see that in these respects they were a whit superior to our present statesmen althou h I do admit that they were more cle er at pro iding ships and walls and docks, and all that. You and I have a ridiculous vay for during the whole time that e are arguing we are always going round and round to the same point, and constantly misunderstanding one another If I am not mistaken, you have admitted and acknowledged more than once, that there are two kinds of operations which have to do with the body and two which have to do with the soul one of the two is ministerial and if our bodies are hungry provides food for them and if they are thirsty gives them drink, or if they are cold suppl es them with garments, blankets shoes, and all that they crave. I use the same images as before intentionally in order that you may understand me the better The purveyor of the articles may provide them ei ther holesale or retail or he may be the maker of any of them —the baker or the cook or the weaver or the shoemaker or the currier and in so doing being such as he is, he is naturally supposed by himself and every one to minister to the body For none of them know that there is anot er art—an art of gymnastic and medi cine which is the true minister of the body and ought to be the mistress of all the rest, and to use their results accordin to the knowledge which she has and they have not, of the real good or bad effects of meats and drinks on the body [518] All other arts which have to do with the body are servile and menial and illiber al and gymnastic and medicine are, as they ought to be, their mistresses

Now when I say that all this is equally true of the soul you seem at first to know and under stand and assent to my words and then a little while afterwar is you come repeating, Has not the State had good and noble c tizens? and when I a k you who they are, you reply seemingly quite in earnest, as if I had asked, Who are or have been good train rs?—and you had replied Thearion, the baker Mithoecus, who wrote the skill—in that case prudence would not dissuade us from proceeding to the construction of public works But if we had no master to show and only a number of worthless buildings or none at all then, surely it would be ridiculous in us to attempt public works or to advise one another to undertake them Is not this true?

Cal Certainly

Soc And does not the same hold in all other cases? If you and I were physicians and were advising one another that we were competent to practise as state physicians, should I not ask about you and would you not ask about me Well but how about Socrates himself has he good health? and was any one else ever known to be cured by him whether slave or freeman? And I should make the same enquiries about you And if we arrived at the conclusion that no one whether citizen or stranger man or woman had ever been any the better for the medical skill of either of us then, by Heaven Callicles what an absurdity to think that we or any human being should be so silly as to set up as state physicians and advise others like ourselves to do the same without having first practised in private whether successfully or not and acquired experience of the art! Is not this as they say to begin with the big jar when you are learning the potter s art, which is a foolish thing?

[515] Cal True.

Soc And now, my friend as you are already beginning to be a public character and are admonishing and reproaching me for not being one suppose that we ask a few questions of one another Tell me then Callicles how about making any of the citizens better? Was there ever a man who was once vicious or unjust or intemperate or foolish and became by the help of Callicles good and noble? Was there ever such a man whether citizen or stranger slave or freeman? Tell me Callicles if a person were to ask these questions of you what would you answer? Whom would you say that you had improved by your conversation? There may have been good deeds of this sort which were done by you as a private person before you came forward in public Why will you not answer?

Cal You are contentious Socrates

Soc Nay I ask you not from a love of contention but because I really want to know in what way you think that affairs should be administered among us—whether when you come to the administration of them you have any other aim but the improvement of the citizens? Have we not already admitted many times over that such is the duty of a public man? Nay we have surely said so for if you will not answer for yourself I must answer for you But if this is what the good man ought to effect for the benefit of his own state, allow me to recall to you the names of those whom you were just now mentioning Pericles and Cimon and Miltiades and Themistocles and ask whether you still think that they were good citizens

Cal I do

Soc But if they were good then clearly each of them must have made the citizens better instead of worse?

Cal Yes

Soc And therefore when Pericles first began to speak in the assembly the Athenians were not so good as when he spoke last?

Cal Very likely

Soc Nay my friend likely is not the word for if he was a good citizen the inference is certain

Cal And what difference does that make?

Soc None only I should like further to know whether the Athenians are supposed to have been made better by Pericles or on the contrary to have been corrupted by him for I hear that he was the first who gave the people pay and made them idle and cowardly and encouraged them in the love of talk and money

Cal You heard that Socrates, from the laconising set who bruise their ears

Soc But what I am going to tell you now is not mere hearsay but well known both to you and me that at first Pericles was glorious and his character unimpeached by any verdict of the [516] Athenians—this was during the time when they were not so good—yet afterwards when they had been made good and gentle by him at the very end of his life they convicted him of theft and almost put him to death, clearly under the notion that he was a malefactor

Cal Well but how does that prove Pericles badness?

Soc Why surely you would say that he was a bad manager of asses or horses or oxen who had received them originally neither kicking nor butting nor biting him and implanted in them all these savage tricks? Would he not be a bad manager of any animals who received them gentle and made them fiercer than they were when he received them? What do you say?

Cal I will do you the favour of saying yes"

Soc And will you also do me the favour of as if a man has been benefited in any other way if, for example, he has been taught to run by a trainer he might possibly defraud him of his pay if the trainer left the matter to him, and made no agreement with him that he should receive money as soon as he had given him the utmost speed, for not because of any deficiency of speed do men act unjustly but by reason of injustice.

Cal. Very true.

Soc. And he who removes injustice can be in no danger of being treated unjustly he alone can safely leave the honorarium to his pupils, if he be really able to make them good—am I not right?

Cal. Yes.

Soc. Then we have found the reason why there is no dishonour in a man receiving pay who is called in to advise about building or any other art?

Cal. Yes, we have found the reason.

Soc. But when the point is, how a man may become best himself, and best govern his family and state, then to say that you will give no advice gratis is held to be dishonourable?

Cal. True.

Soc. And why? Because only such benefits call forth a desire to requite them, and there is evidence that a benefit has been conferred when the benefactor receives a return otherwise not. Is this true?

Cal. It is.

[521] Soc. Then to which service of the State do you in[illegible] te me? determine for me. Am I to be the physician of the State who will strive and struggle to make the Athenians as good as possible or am I to be the servant and flatterer of the State? Speak out, my good friend, freely and fairly as you did at first and ought to do again, and tell me your entire mind.

Cal. I say then that you should be the servant of the State.

Soc. The flatterer? well, sir that is a noble invitation.

Cal. The Mysian, Socrates, or what you please For if you refuse, the consequences will be—

Soc. Do not repeat the old story—that he who likes will kill me and get my money for then I shall have to repeat the old answer that he will be a bad man and will kill the good, and that the money will be of no use to him, but that he will wrongly use that which he wrongly took, and if wrongly basely and if basely hurtfully

Cf. Protagoras 328.

Cal. How confident you are, Socrates, that you will never come to harm! you seem to think that you are living in another country and can never be brought into a court of justice, as you very likely may be brought by some miserable and mean person.

Soc. Then I must indeed be a fool Callicles, if I do not know that in the Athenian State any man may suffer anything And if I am brought to trial and incur the dangers of which you speak, he will be a villain who brings me to trial—of that I am very sure, for no good man would accuse the innocent. Nor shall I be surprised if I am put to death Shall I tell you why I anticipate this?

Cal. By all means.

Soc. I think that I am the only or almost the only Athenian living who practises the true art of politics I am the only politician of my time. Now seeing that when I speak my words are not uttered with any view of gaining favour and that I look to what is best and not to what is most pleasant, having no mind to use those arts and graces which you recommend, I shall have nothing to say in the justice court. And you might argue with me, as I was arguing with Polus —I shall be tried just as a physician would be tried in a court of little boys at the indictment of the cook. What would he reply under such circumstances, if some one were to accuse him, saying, O my boys, many evil things has this man done to you he is the death of you, especially of the younger ones among you, cutting and burning and starving and suffocating you, [522] until you know not what to do he gives you the bitterest potions, and compels you to hunger and thirst. How unlike the variety of meats and sweets on which I feasted you!" What do you suppose that the physician would be able to reply when he found himself in such a predicament? If he told the truth he could only say All these evil things, my boys, I did for your health," and then would there not just be a clamour among a jury like that? How they would cry out!

Cal. I dare say

Soc. Would he not be utterly at a loss for a reply?

Cal. He certainly would.

Soc. And I too shall be treated in the same way as I well know if I am brought before the court. For I shall not be able to rehearse to the people the pleasures which I have procured for them, and which, although I am not disposed to envy either the procurers or enjoyers of them, are deemed by them to be benefits and advan-

Sicilian cookery book Sarambus the vintner these are ministers of the body first rate in their art for the first makes admirable loaves the second excellent dishes and the third capital wine—to me these appear to be the exact parallel of the statesmen whom you mention Now you would not be altogether pleased if I said to you My friend you know nothing of gymnastics, those of whom you are speaking to me are only the ministers and purveyors of luxury who have no good or noble notions of their art and may very likely be filling and fattening men s bodies and gaining their approval although the result is that they lose their original flesh in the long run and become thinner than they were before and yet they in their simplicity will not attribute their diseases and loss of flesh to their entertainers but when in after years the unhealthy surfeit brings the attendant penalty of disease he who happens to be near them at the time and offers them advice is accused and blamed by them and if they could they would do him some harm while they proceed to eulogize the men who have been the real authors of the mischief

And that Callicles is just what you are now doing You praise the men who feasted the citizens and satisfied their desires and people say that they have made the city great not seeing that the swollen and ulcerated condition of the State is to be attributed to these elder statesmen for they have filled the city full of harbours and docks and walls and revenues and all that [519] and have left no room for justice and temperance And when the crisis of the disorder comes the people will blame the advisers of the hour and applaud Themistocles and Cimon and Pericles who are the real authors of their calamities and if you are not careful they may assail you and my friend Alcibiades when they are losing not only their new acquisitions but also their original possessions not that you are the authors of these misfortunes of theirs although you may perhaps be accessories to them A great piece of work is always being made as I see and am told now as of old about our statesmen When the State treats any of them as malefactors I observe that there is a great uproar and indignation at the supposed wrong which is done to them after all their many services to the State that they should unjustly perish —so the tale runs But the cry is all a lie for no statesman ever could be unjustly put to death by the city of which he is the head The case of the professed statesman is I believe, very much like that of the professed sophist for the sophists, although they are wise men are nevertheless guilty of a strange piece of folly professing to be teachers of virtue, they will often accuse their disciples of wronging them and defrauding them of their pay and showing no gratitude for their services Yet what can be more absurd than that men who have become just and good and whose injustice has been taken away from them and who have had justice implanted in them by their teachers, should act unjustly by reason of the injustice which is not in them? Can anything be more irrational my friends than this? You Callicles, compel me to be a mob-orator because you will not answer

Cal And you are the man who cannot speak unless there is some one to answer?

Soc I suppose that I can just now at any rate the speeches which I am making are long enough because you refuse to answer me But I adjure you by the god of friendship my good sir do tell me whether there does not appear to you to be a great inconsistency in saying that you have made a man good and then blaming him for being bad?

Cal Yes it appears so to me.

[520] Soc Do you never hear our professors of education speaking in this inconsistent manner?

Cal Yes but why talk of men who are good for nothing?

Soc I would rather say, why talk of men who profess to be rulers and declare that they are devoted to the improvement of the city and nevertheless upon occasion declaim against the utter vileness of the city —do you think that there is any difference between one and the other? My good friend the sophist and the rhetorician as I was saying to Polus are the same or nearly the same but you ignorantly fancy that rhetoric is a perfect thing and sophistry a thing to be despised whereas the truth is, that sophistry is as much superior to rhetoric as legislation is to the practice of law or gymnastic to medicine The orators and sophists as I am inclined to think are the only class who cannot complain of the mischief ensuing to themselves from that which they teach others without in the same breath accusing themselves of having done no good to those whom they profess to benefit Is not this a fact?

Cal Certainly it is

Soc If they were right in saying that they make men better then they are the only class who can afford to leave their remuneration to those who have been benefited by them Where alive, will remain as he was, after he is dead and the fat man will remain fat and so on and the dead man, who in life had a fancy to have flowing hair will have flowing hair And if he was marked with the whip and had the prints of the scourge, or of wounds in him when he was alive, you might see the same in the dead body and if his limbs were broken or misshapen when he was alive, the same appearance would be visible in the dead. And in a word whatever was the habit of the body during life would be distinguishable after death either perfectly or in a great measure and for a certain time. And I should imagine that this is equally true of the soul, Callicles when a man is stripped of the body all the natural or acquired affections of the soul are laid open to view And when they come to the judge, as those from Asia come to Rhadamanthus he places them near him and inspects them quite impartially not knowing whose the soul is perhaps he may lay hands on the soul of the great king or of some other king or potentate, who has no soundness in him, but his soul is marked with the whip, and is full of the prints and scars of perjuries and crimes with which each action has stained him, [525] and he is all crooked with falsehood and imposture, and has no straightness, because he has lived without truth Him Rhadamanthus beholds, full of all deformity and disproportion, which is caused by licence and luxury and insolence and incontinence, and despatches him ignominiously to his prison, and there he undergoes the punishment which he deserves

Now the proper office of punishment is twofold he who is rightly punished ought either to become better and profit by it, or he ought to be made an example to his fellows that they may see what he suffers, and fear and become better Those who are improved when they are punished by gods and men, are those whose sins are curable and they are improved as in this world so also in another by pain and suffering for there is no other way in which they can be delivered from their evil But they who have been guilty of the worst crimes, and are incurable by reason of their crimes, are made examples for as they are incurable, the time has passed at which they can receive any benefit. They get no good themselves, but others get good when they behold them enduring for ever the most terrible and painful and fearful suffering as the penalty of their sins—there they are, hanging up as examples, in the prison house of the world below a spectacle and a warning to all unrighteous men who come thither And among them as I confidently affirm will be found Archelaus if Polus truly reports of him, and any other tyrant who is like him Of these fearful examples most, as I believe are taken from the class of tyrants and kings and potentates and public men for they are the authors of the greatest and most impious crimes, because they have the power And Homer witnesses to the truth of this for they are always kings and potentates whom he has described as suffering everlasting punishment in the world below such were Tantalus and Sisyphus and Tityus But no one ever described Thersites, or any private person who was a villain as suffering everlasting punishment, or as incurable. For to commit the worst crimes, as I am inclined to think, was not in his power and he was happier than those who had the power No Callicles [526] the very bad men come from the class of those who have power And yet in that very class there may arise good men and worthy of all admiration they are, for where there is great power to do wrong, to live and to die justly is a hard thing and greatly to be praised and few there are who attain to this Such good and true men however there have been, and will be again, at Athens and in other states, who have fulfilled their trust righteously and there is one who is quite famous all over Hellas, Aristeides, the son of Lysimachus But, in general great men are also bad my friend

As I was saying Rhadamanthus when he gets a soul of the bad kind, knows nothing about him neither who he is, nor who his parents are he knows only that he has got hold of a villain and seeing this he stamps him as curable or incurable, and sends him away to Tartarus, whither he goes and receives his proper recompense Or again, he looks with admiration on the soul of some just one who has lived in holiness and truth he may have been a private man or not and I should say Callicles, that he is most likely to have been a philosopher who has done his own work, and not troubled himself with the doings of other men in his lifetime him Rhadamanthus sends to the Islands of the Blessed Aeacus does the same and they both have sceptres and judge but Minos alone has a golden sceptre and is seated looking on as Odysseus in Homer declares that he saw him

Holding a sceptre of gold and giving laws to the dead

Now I Callicles, am persuaded of the truth of

Cf. Republic x. 615.

tages And if any one says that I corrupt young men and perplex their minds or that I speak evil of old men and use bitter words towards them whether in private or public it is useless for me to reply, as I truly might — All this I do for the sake of justice and with a view to your interest, my judges and to nothing else And therefore there is no saying what may happen to me

Cal And do you think, Socrates that a man who is thus defenceless is in a good position?

Soc Yes Callicles, if he have that defence, which as you have often acknowledged he should have—if he be his own defence and have never said or done anything wrong either in respect of gods or men and this has been repeatedly acknowledged by us to be the best sort of defence And if anyone could convict me of inability to defend myself or others after this sort I should blush for shame whether I was convicted before many or before a few or by myself alone and if I died from want of ability to do so that would indeed grieve me But if I died because I have no powers of flattery or rhetoric I am very sure that you would not find me repining at death For no man who is not an utter fool and coward is afraid of death itself but he is afraid of doing wrong For to go to the world below having one s soul full of injustice is the last and worst of all evils And in proof of what I say if you have no objection I should like to tell you a story

Cal Very well proceed and then we shall have done

[523] Soc Listen then as story tellers say to a very pretty tale, which I dare say that you may be disposed to regard as a fable only but which as I believe is a true tale, for I mean to speak the truth Homer tells us how Zeus and Poseidon and Pluto divided the empire which they inherited from their father Now in the days of Cronos there existed a law respecting the destiny of man which has always been and still continues to be in Heaven—that he who has lived all his life in justice and holiness shall go when he is dead to the Islands of the Blessed and dwell there in perfect happiness out of the reach of evil but that he who has lived unjustly and impiously shall go to the house of vengeance and punishment which is called Tartarus And in the time of Cronos and even quite lately in the reign of Zeus the judgment was given on the very day on which the men were to die the judges were alive and the men were alive and the consequence was that the judgments were not well given Then Pluto and the authorities from the Islands of the Blessed came to Zeus and said that the souls found their way to the wrong places Zeus said I shall put a stop to this the judgments are not well given because the persons who are judged have their clothes on for they are alive and there are many who having evil souls, are apparelled in fair bodies or encased in wealth or rank and when the day of judgment arrives, numerous witnesses come forward and testify on their behalf that they have lived righteously The judges are awed by them and they themselves too have their clothes on when judging their eyes and ears and their whole bodies are interposed as a veil before their own souls All this is a hindrance to them there are the clothes of the judges and the clothes of the judged—What is to be done? I will tell you —In the first place I will deprive men of the foreknowledge of death which they possess at present this power which they have Prometheus has already received my orders to take from them in the second place, they shall be entirely stripped before they are judged for they shall be judged when they are dead and the judge too shall be naked that is to say dead—he with his naked soul shall pierce into the other naked souls and they shall die suddenly and be deprived of all their kindred and leave their brave attire strewn upon the earth—conducted in this manner the judgment will be just. I knew all about the matter before any of you, and therefore I have made my sons judges two from Asia Minos and Rhadamanthus and one from Europe [524] Aeacus And these when they are dead shall give judgment in the meadow at the parting of the ways whence the two roads lead one to the Islands of the Blessed, and the other to Tartarus Rhadamanthus shall judge those who come from Asia and Aeacus those who come from Europe. And to Minos I shall give the primacy and he shall hold a court of appeal in case either of the two others are in any doubt —then the judgment respecting the last journey of men will be as just as possible.

From this tale Callicles which I have heard and believe I draw the following inferences — Death if I am right is in the first place the separation from one another of two things soul and body nothing else. And after they are separated they retain their several natures, as in life the body keeps the same habit, and the results of treatment or accident are distinctly visible in it for example, he who by nature or training or both, was a tall man while he was al e, will remain as he vas, after he is dead and the fat man will remain fat and so on and the dead man, who in life had a fancy to have flowing hair will have flowing hair And if he was marked with the whip and had the prints of the scourge, or of wounds in him when he was alive, you might see the same in the dead body and if his limbs were broken or misshapen when he was alive, the same appearance would be visible in the dead And in a word, whatever was the hab t of the body during life would be distinguishable after death, either perfectly or in a great measure and for a certain time. And I should imagine that this is equally true of the soul Callicles when a man is stripped of the body all the natural or acquired affections of the soul are laid open to view And when they come to the judge as those from Asia come to Rhadamanthus, he places them near him and inspects them quite impartially not knowing whose the soul is perhaps he may lay hands on the soul of the great king, or of some other king or potentate, who has no soundness in him, but his soul is marked with the whip, and is full of the prints and scars of perjuries and crimes with hich each action has stained him, [525] and he is all crooked with falsehood and imposture, and has no straightness, because he has lived w thout truth. Him Rhadamanthus beholds, full of all deformity and disproportion, which is caused by licence and luxury and insolence and incontinence, and despatches him ignominiously to his prison, and there he undergoes the punishment which he deserves.

N w the proper office of punishment is twofold he who is rightly pun shed ought e ther to become better and profit by it, or he ought to be made an example to his fellows that they may see what he suffers, and fear and become better Those who are impro ed when they are punished by gods and men, are those whose sins are curable and they are improved, as in this world so also in another by pain and suffering, for there is no other way in which they can be del ered fr m their evil But they who have been gu lty of the worst crimes, and are incurable by reason of their crimes, are made examples for as they are incur ble, the time has passed at which they can recei e any benefit. Of these fearful examples, most, as I believe ar taken from the class of tyrants and kings and potentates and public men for they are the authors of the greatest and most impious crimes, because they have the po er And Homer witnesses to the truth of this for they are always kings and potentates whom he has described as suffering everlasting punishment in the world below such were Tantalus and Sisyphus and Tityus. But no one ever described Thersites, or any private person who was a villain, as suffering everlasting punishment, or as incurable. For to commit the worst crimes, as I am inclined to think, was not in his power and he was happier than those who had the power No Callicles, [526] the very bad men come from the class of those who have power And yet in that very class there may arise good men and worthy of all admiration they are, for where there is great power to do wrong to live and to die justly is a hard thing and greatly to be praised, and few there are who attain to this. As I was saying Rhadamanthus, when he gets a soul of the bad kind, knows nothing about him neither who he is, nor who his parents are he knows only that he has got hold of a villain and seeing this, he stamps him as curable or incurable, and sends him away to Tartarus, whither he goes and receives his proper recompense. Or again he looks with admiration on the soul of some just one who has lived in holiness and truth he may have been a private man or not and I should say Callicles, that he is most l kely to have been a philosopher who has done his own work, and not troubled himself with the doings of other men in his lifetime him Rhadamanthus sends to the Islands of the Blessed Aeacus does the same and they both have sceptres and judge but Minos alone has a golden sceptre and is seated looking on as Odysseus in Homer declares that he saw him

tages And if any one says that I corrupt young men, and perplex their minds or that I speak evil of old men and use bitter words towards them whether in private or public it is useless for me to reply as I truly might — All this I do for the sake of justice and with a view to your interest my judges and to nothing else And therefore there is no saying what may happen to me

Cal And do you think Socrates that a man who is thus defenceless is in a good position?

Soc Yes Callicles if he have that defence which as you have often acknowledged he should have—if he be his own defence and have never said or done anything wrong either in respect of gods or men and this has been repeatedly acknowledged by us to be the best sort of defence And if anyone could convict me of inability to defend myself or others after this sort I should blush for shame whether I was convicted before many or before a few or by myself alone and if I died from want of ability to do so that would indeed grieve me But if I died because I have no powers of flattery or rhetoric I am very sure that you would not find me repining at death For no man who is not an utter fool and coward is afraid of death itself but he is afraid of doing wrong For to go to the world below having one s soul full of injustice is the last and worst of all evils And in proof of what I say if you have no objection I should like to tell you a story

Cal Very well proceed and then we shall have done

[523] Soc Listen then as story tellers say, to a very pretty tale, which I dare say that you may be disposed to regard as a fable only but which as I believe is a true tale, for I mean to speak the truth Homer tells us how Zeus and Poseidon and Pluto divided the empire which they inherited from their father Now in the days of Cronos there existed a law respecting the destiny of man which has always been and still continues to be in Heaven—that he who has lived all his life in justice and holiness shall go when he is dead to the Islands of the Blessed and dwell there in perfect happiness out of the reach of evil but that he who has lived unjustly and impiously shall go to the house of vengeance and punishment which is called Tartarus And in the time of Cronos and even quite lately in the reign of Zeus the judgment was given on the very day on which the men were to die the judges were alive and the men were alive and the consequence was that the judgments were not well given Then Pluto and the authorities from the Islands of the Blessed came to Zeus and said that the souls found their way to the wrong places Zeus said I shall put a stop to this the judgments are not well given because the persons who are judged have their clothes on for they are alive and there are many who, having evil souls, are apparelled in fair bodies or encased in wealth or rank and when the day of judgment arrives, numerous witnesses come forward and testify on their behalf that they have lived righteously The judges are awed by them and they themselves too have their clothes on when judging their eyes and ears and their whole bodies are interposed as a veil before their own souls All this is a hindrance to them there are the clothes of the judges and the clothes of the judged— What is to be done? I will tell you —In the first place I will deprive men of the foreknowledge of death which they possess at present this power which they have Prometheus has already received my orders to take from them in the second place, they shall be entirely stripped before they are judged, for they shall be judged when they are dead and the judge too shall be naked that is to say dead—he with his naked soul shall pierce into the other naked souls and they shall die suddenly and be deprived of all their kindred and leave their brave attire strewn upon the earth—conducted in this manner the judgment will be just I knew all about the matter before any of you, and therefore I have made my sons judges two from Asia Minos and Rhadamanthus and one from Europe [524] Aeacus And these when they are dead shall give judgment in the meadow at the parting of the ways, whence the two roads lead one to the Islands of the Blessed and the other to Tartarus Rhadamanthus shall judge those who come from Asia and Aeacus those who come from Europe And to Minos I shall give the primacy and he shall hold a court of appeal in case either of the two others are in any doubt —then the judgment respecting the last journey of men will be as just as possible.

From this tale Callicles which I have heard and believe I draw the following inferences — Death if I am right is in the first place the separation from one another of two things soul and body nothing else And after they are separated they retain their several natures as in life the body keeps the same habit, and the results of treatment or accident are distinctly visible in it for example he who by nature or training or both was a tall man while he was alive, will remain as he was, after he is dead and the fat man will remain fat and so on and the dead man, who in life had a fancy to have flowing hair will have flowing hair And if he was marked with the whip and had the prints of the scourge, or of wounds in him when he was alive, you might see the same in the dead body and if his limbs were broken or misshapen when he was alive, the same appearance would be visible in the dead. And in a word, whatever was the habit of the body during life would be distinguishable after death, either perfectly or in a great measure and for a certain time. And I should imagine that this is equally true of the soul, Callicles: when a man is stripped of the body all the natural or acquired affections of the soul are laid open to view And when they come to the judge, as those from Asia come to Rhadamanthus, he places them near him and inspects them quite impartially not knowing whose the soul is. perhaps he may lay hands on the soul of the great king or of some other king or potentate, who has no soundness in him, but his soul is marked with the whip, and is full of the prints and scars of perjuries and crimes with which each action has stained him, [525] and he is all crooked with falsehood and imposture, and has no straightness, because he has lived without truth. Him Rhadamanthus beholds, full of all deformity and disproportion, which is caused by licence and luxury and insolence and incontinence, and despatches him ignominiously to his prison, and there he undergoes the punishment which he deserves.

Now the proper office of punishment is twofold he who is rightly punished ought either to become better and profit by it, or he ought to be made an example to his fellows, that they may see what he suffers, and fear and become better Those who are improved when they are punished by gods and men, are those whose sins are curable and they are improved, as in this world so also in another by pain and suffering for there is no other way in which they can be delivered from their evil. But they who have been guilty of the worst crimes, and are incurable by reason of their crimes, are made examples for as they are incurable, the time has passed at which they can receive any benefit. They get no good themselves, but others get good when they behold them enduring for ever the most terrible and painful and fearful sufferings as the penalty of their sins—there they are, hanging up as examples, in the prison house of the world below a spectacle and a warning to all unrighteous men who come thither And among them as I confidently affirm, will be found Archelaus, if Polus truly reports of him, and any other tyrant who is like him. Of these fearful examples, most, as I believe, are taken from the class of tyrants and kings and potentates and public men, for they are the authors of the greatest and most impious crimes, because they have the power And Homer witnesses to the truth of this for they are always kings and potentates whom he has described as suffering everlasting punishment in the world below such were Tantalus and Sisyphus and Tityus. But no one ever described Thersites, or any private person who was a villain, as suffering everlasting punishment, or as incurable. For to commit the worst crimes, as I am inclined to think, was not in his power and he was happier than those who had the power No, Callicles, [526] the very bad men come from the class of those who have power And yet in that very class there may arise good men and worthy of all admiration they are, for where there is great power to do wrong, to live and to die justly is a hard thing and greatly to be praised, and few there are who attain to this. Such good and true men however there have been, and will be again, at Athens and in other states, who have fulfilled their trust righteously and there is one who is quite famous all over Hellas, Aristeides, the son of Lysimachus. But, in general great men are also bad, my friend.

As I was saying, Rhadamanthus, when he gets a soul of the bad kind, knows nothing about him, neither who he is, nor who his parents are he knows only that he has got hold of a villain and seeing this, he stamps him as curable or incurable, and sends him away to Tartarus, whither he goes and receives his proper recompense. Or again, he looks with admiration on the soul of some just one who has lived in holiness and truth he may have been a private man or not and I should say Callicles, that he is most likely to have been a philosopher who has done his own work, and not troubled himself with the doings of other men in his lifetime: him Rhadamanthus sends to the Islands of the Blessed Aeacus does the same, and they both have sceptres, and judge but Minos alone has a golden sceptre and is seated looking on, as Odysseus in Homer declares that he saw him

THE REPUBLIC

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE: SOCRATES, who is the narrator; GLAUCON; ADEIMANTUS; POLEMARCHUS; CEPHALUS; THRASYMACHUS; CLEITOPHON. And others who are mute auditors. The Scene is laid in the house of Cephalus at the Piraeus; and the whole dialogue is narrated by Socrates the day after it actually took place to Timaeus, Hermocrates, Critias, and a nameless person, who are introduced in the Timaeus.

BOOK I

[327] I WENT down yesterday to the Piraeus with Glaucon the son of Ariston, that I might offer up my prayers to the goddess;[1] and also because I wanted to see in what manner they would celebrate the festival, which was a new thing. I was delighted with the procession of the inhabitants; but that of the Thracians was equally, if not more, beautiful. When we had finished our prayers and viewed the spectacle, we turned in the direction of the city; and at that instant Polemarchus the son of Cephalus chanced to catch sight of us from a distance as we were starting on our way home, and told his servant to run and bid us wait for him. The servant took hold of me by the cloak behind, and said: Polemarchus desires you to wait.

I turned round, and asked him where his master was.

There he is, said the youth, coming after you, if you will only wait.

Certainly we will, said Glaucon; and in a few minutes Polemarchus appeared, and with him Adeimantus, Glaucon's brother, Niceratus the son of Nicias, and several others who had been at the procession.

Polemarchus said to me: I perceive, Socrates, that you and your companion are already on your way to the city.

You are not far wrong, I said.

But do you see, he rejoined, how many we are?

Of course.

And are you stronger than all these? for if not, you will have to remain where you are.

May there not be the alternative, I said, that we may persuade you to let us go?

But can you persuade us, if we refuse to listen to you? he said.

Certainly not, replied Glaucon.

Then we are not going to listen; of that you may be assured.

[328] Adeimantus added: Has no one told you of the torch-race on horseback in honour of the goddess which will take place in the evening?

With horses! I replied: That is a novelty. Will horsemen carry torches and pass them one to another during the race?

Yes, said Polemarchus, and not only so, but a festival will be celebrated at night, which you certainly ought to see. Let us rise soon after supper and see this festival; there will be a gathering of young men, and we will have a good talk. Stay then, and do not be perverse.

Glaucon said: I suppose, since you insist, that we must.

Very good, I replied.

Accordingly we went with Polemarchus to his house; and there we found his brothers

[1] Bendis, the Thracian Artemis.

these things and I consider how I shall present my soul whole and undefiled before the judge in that day Renouncing the honours at which the world aims I desire only to know the truth and to live as well as I can and when I die to die as well as I can And to the utmost of my power, I exhort all other men to do the same And in return for your exhortation of me I exhort you also to take part in the great combat which is the combat of life and greater than every other earthly conflict And I retort your reproach of me and say that you will not be able to help yourself when the day of trial and judgment of which I was speaking comes upon you you will go before the judge, [527] the son of Aegina and when he has got you in his grip and is carrying you off you will gape and your head will swim round just as mine would in the courts of this world and very likely some one will shamefully box you on the ears and put upon you any sort of insult

Perhaps this may appear to you to be only an old wife s tale which you will contemn And there might be reason in your contemning such tales if by searching we could find out anything better or truer but now you see that you and Polus and Gorgias who are the three wisest of the Greeks of our day are not able to show that we ought to live any life which does not profit in another world as well as in this And of all that has been said nothing remains unshaken but the saying that to do injustice is more to be avoided than to suffer injustice and that the reality and not the appearance of virtue is to be followed above all things as well in public as in private life and that when any one has been wrong in anything he is to be chastised and that the next best thing to a man being just is that he should become just, and be chastised and punished also that he should avoid all flattery of himself as well as of others of the few or of the many and rhetoric and any other art should be used by him and all his actions should be done always with a view to justice.

Follow me then and I will lead you where you will be happy in life and after death as the argument shows And never mind if some one despises you as a fool and insults you if he has a mind let him strike you by Zeus and do you be of good cheer and do not mind the insulting blow for you will never come to any harm in the practise of virtue if you are a really good and true man When we have practised virtue together we will apply ourselves to politics, if that seems desirable, or we will advise about whatever else may seem good to us for we shall be better able to judge then In our present condition we ought not to give ourselves airs for even on the most important subjects we are always changing our minds so utterly stupid are we! Let us then, take the argument as our guide which has revealed to us that the best way of life is to practise justice and every virtue in life and death This way let us go and in this exhort all men to follow not in the way to which you trust and in which you exhort me to follow you, for that way Callicles, is nothing worth those wl o have inherited their fortunes than of those who have acquired them the makers of fortunes have a second love of money as a creation of their own, resembling the affection of authors for their own poems, or of parents for their children besides that natural love of it for the sake of use and profit which is com mon to them and all men And hence they are very bad company for they can talk about nothing but the praises of wealth

That is true he said

Yes, that is very true but may I ask another question?—What do you consider to be the greatest blessing which you have reaped from your wealth?

One, he said of which I could not expect easily to convince others For let me tell you, Socrates, that when a man thinks himself to be near death, fears and cares enter into his mind which he never had before the tales of a world below and the punishment which is exacted there of deeds done here were once a laughing matter to him, but now he is tormented with the thought that they may be true either from the weakness of age, or because he is now draw ing nearer to that other place, he has a clearer iew of these things suspicions and alarms crowd thickly upon him and he begins to re flect and cons der what wrongs he has done to others And when he finds that the sum of his transgressions is great he will many a time l ke a hild start up in his sleep for fear and he s filled with dark forebod ngs [331] But to him ho is conscious of no sin, sweet hope, as Pindar charmingly says, s the kind nurse of his age

> Hope [he says] herishes the soul of h m who l justice a d h li e s a d s the u s of his ag a d the comp on of h s j r ey —hope which s m ghtest to sway th eatless s ul of m

Ho v admirable are his ords! And the great blessing of riches I do not say to e ery man, but to a good man. is that he has had no occa s n to decei e or to defraud others, e ther in tentionally or unint ntionally and when he departs to the world below he is not in any ap prehension about offe ings due to the gods or debts which he wes to men Now to this peace of mind the possession of wealth greatly con tr butes and therefore I say that, setting one thing against another of the many adv ntages which wealth has to g e, to a man of sense this s in my op nion the g eatest.

Well said, Cephalus, I eplied but as con cerning justice, what is t —to speak the truth and to pay your debts—no more than this? And even to this are there not exceptions? Suppose that a friend when in his right mind has de posited arms with me and he asks for them when he is not in his right mind ought I to give them back to him? No one would say that I ought or that I should be right in doing so any more than they would say that I ought al ways to speak the truth to one who is in his cond tion

You are quite right he replied

But then I said speaking the truth and pay ing your debts is not a correct definition of jus tice

Quite correct, Socrates, if Simonides is to be believed said Polemarchus interposing

I fear said Cephalus, that I must go now for I have to look after the sacrifices, and I hand over the argument to Polemarchus and the company

Is not Polemarchus your heir? I said

To be sure he answered and went away laughing to the sacrifices.

Tell me then, O thou heir of the argument what did Simonides say and according to you truly say about justice?

He said that the re payment of a debt is just, and in saying so he appears to me to be right.

I should be sorry to doubt the word of such a wise and inspired man but his meaning though probably clear to you, is the reverse of clear to me For he certainly does not mean as we were just now saying that I ought to return a deposit of arms or of anything else to one who asks for it when he is not in his right senses and yet a deposit cannot be denied to be a debt. [33]

True

Then when the person who asks me is not in h s right mind I am by no means to make the return?

Certainly not

When Simonides said that the repayment of a debt was justice, he did not mean to include that case?

Certainly not for he thinks that a friend ought always to do good to a friend and never evil

You mean that the return of a deposit of gold which is to the injury of the receiver if the two parties are frien ls is not the repay ment of a debt—that is what you would imag ine him to say?

Yes

And are enemies also to recei e what v e o e to th m?

Lysias and Euthydemus and with them Thrasymachus the Chalcedonian Charmantides the Paeanian and Cleitophon the son of Aristonymus There too was Cephalus the father of Polemarchus whom I had not seen for a long time, and I thought him very much aged He was seated on a cushioned chair and had a garland on his head, for he had been sacrificing in the court and there were some other chairs in the room arranged in a semicircle upon which we sat down by him He saluted me eagerly and then he said —

You don t come to see me, Socrates as often as you ought If I were still able to go and see you I would not ask you to come to me But at my age I can hardly get to the city and therefore you should come oftener to the Piraeus. For let me tell you that the more the pleasures of the body fade away the greater to me is the pleasure and charm of conversation Do not then deny my request, but make our house your resort and keep company with these young men we are old friends and you will be quite at home with us

I replied There is nothing which for my part I like better Cephalus than conversing with aged men for I regard them as travellers who have gone a journey which I too may have to go and of whom I ought to enquire whether the way is smooth and easy or rugged and difficult And this is a question which I should like to ask of you who have arrived at that time which the poets call the threshold of old age —Is life harder towards the end or what report do you give of it?

[329] I will tell you Socrates he said what my own feeling is Men of my age flock together we are birds of a feather as the old proverb says and at our meetings the tale of my acquaintance commonly is—I cannot eat I cannot drink the pleasures of youth and love are fled away there was a good time once but now that is gone and life is no longer life Some complain of the slights which are put upon them by relations and they will tell you sadly of how many evils their old age is the cause But to me, Socrates these complainers seem to blame that which is not really in fault For if old age were the cause, I too being old and every other old man would have felt as they do But this is not my own experience nor that of others whom I have known How well I remember the aged poet Sophocles when in answer to the question How does love suit with age Sophocles—are you still the man you were? Peace he replied, most gladly have I escaped the thing of which you speak I feel as if I had escaped from a mad and furious master His words have often occurred to my mind since and they seem as good to me now as at the time when he uttered them. For certainly old age has a great sense of calm and freedom when the passions relax their hold then as Sophocles says we are freed from the grasp not of one mad master only but of many The truth is Socrates that these regrets and also the complaints about relations are to be attributed to the same cause which is not old age, but men s characters and tempers for he who is of a calm and happy nature will hardly feel the pressure of age, but to him who is of an opposite disposition youth and age are equally a burden

I listened in admiration and wanting to draw him out, that he might go on—Yes Cephalus I said but I rather suspect that people in general are not convinced by you when you speak thus, they think that old age sits lightly upon you not because of your happy disposition but because you are rich and wealth is well known to be a great comforter

You are right he replied they are not convinced and there is something in what they say not however so much as they imagine. I might answer them as Themistocles answered the Seriphian who was abusing him and saying that he was famous not for his own merits but because he was an Athenian [330] If you had been a native of my country or I of yours neither of us would have been famous" And to those who are not rich and are impatient of old age the same reply may be made for to the good poor man old age cannot be a light burden nor can a bad rich man ever have peace with himself

May I ask Cephalus whether your fortune was for the most part inherited or acquired by you?

Acquired! Socrates do you want to know how much I acquired? In the art of making money I have been midway between my father and grandfather for my grandfather whose name I bear doubled and trebled the value of his patrimony that which he inherited being much what I possess now but my father Lysanias reduced the property below what it is at present and I shall be satisfied if I leave to these my sons not less but a little more than I received

That was why I asked you the question I replied because I see that you are indifferent about money which is a characteristic rather of

Certainly

And he who is most skilful in preventing or escaping from a disease is best able to create one?

True.

And he is the best guard of a camp who is best able to steal a march upon the enemy? [334]

Certainly

Then he who is a good keeper of anything is also a good thief?

That, I suppose, is to be inferred.

Then if the just man is good at keeping money he is good at stealing it.

That is implied in the argument.

Then after all the just man has turned out to be a thief. And this is a lesson which I suspect you must have learnt out of Homer· for he, speaking of Autolycus, the maternal grandfather of Odysseus, who is a favourite of his, affirms that

He was excellent above all men in theft and perjury

And so, you and Homer and Simonides are agreed that justice is an art of theft to be practised however for the good of friends and for the harm of enemies —that was what you were saying?

No, certainly not that, though I do not now know what I did say but I still stand by the latter words.

Well, there is another question By friends and enemies do we mean those who are so really or only in seeming?

Surely he said, a man may be expected to love those whom he thinks good, and to hate those whom he thinks evil.

Yes, but do not persons often err about good and evil many who are not good seem to be so, and conversely?

That is true.

Then to them the good will be enemies and the evil will be their friends?

True.

And in that case they will be right in doing good to the evil and evil to the good?

Clearly

But the good are just and would not do an injustice?

True.

Then according to your argument it is just to injure those who do no wrong

Nay Socrates the doctrine is immoral

Then I suppose that we ought to do good to the just and harm to the unjust?

I like that better

But see the consequence —Many a man who is ignorant of human nature has friends who are bad friends, and in that case he ought to do harm to them and he has good enemies whom he ought to benefit but, if so, we shall be saying the very opposite of that which we affirmed to be the meaning of Simonides.

Very true, he said and I think that we had better correct an error into which we seem to have fallen in the use of the words "friend" and "enemy"

What was the error Polemarchus? I asked

We assumed that he is a friend who seems to be or who is thought good

And how is the error to be corrected?

We should rather say that he is a friend who is, as well as seems, good [335] and that he who seems only and is not good, only seems to be and is not a friend and of an enemy the same may be said.

You would argue that the good are our friends and the bad our enemies?

Yes.

And instead of saying simply as we did at first, that it is just to do good to our friends and harm to our enemies, we should further say It is just to do good to our friends when they are good and harm to our enemies when they are evil?

Yes, that appears to me to be the truth.

But ought the just to injure any one at all?

Undoubtedly he ought to injure those who are both wicked and his enemies.

When horses are injured, are they improved or deteriorated?

The latter

Deteriorated, that is to say in the good qualities of horses, not of dogs?

Yes, of horses.

And dogs are deteriorated in the good qualities of dogs, and not of horses?

Of course.

And will not men who are injured be deteriorated in that which is the proper virtue of man?

Certainly

And that human virtue is justice?

To be sure.

Then men who are injured are of necessity made unjust?

That is the result.

But can the musician by his art make men unmusical?

Certainly not.

Or the horseman by his art make them bad horsemen?

To be sure he said they are to receive what we owe them and an enemy as I take it owes to an enemy that which is due or proper to him—that is to say evil

Simonides then after the manner of poets would seem to have spoken darkly of the nature of justice for he really meant to say that justice is the giving to each man what is proper to him and this he termed a debt

That must have been his meaning he said

By heaven! I replied and if we asked him what due or proper thing is given by medicine and to whom what answer do you think that he would make to us?

He would surely reply that medicine gives drugs and meat and drink to human bodies

And what due or proper thing is given by cookery and to what?

Seasoning to food

And what is that which justice gives and to whom?

If Socrates we are to be guided at all by the analogy of the preceding instances, then justice is the art which gives good to friends and evil to enemies

That is his meaning then?

I think so

And who is best able to do good to his friends and evil to his enemies in time of sickness?

The physician

Or when they are on a voyage, amid the perils of the sea?

The pilot

And in what sort of actions or with a view to what result is the just man most able to do harm to his enemy and good to his friend?

In going to war against the one and in making alliances with the other

But when a man is well my dear Polemarchus there is no need of a physician?

No

And he who is not on a voyage has no need of a pilot?

No

Then in time of peace justice will be of no use?

I am very far from thinking so

[333] You think that justice may be of use in peace as well as in war?

Yes

Like husbandry for the acquisition of corn?

Yes

Or like shoemaking for the acquisition of shoes—that is what you mean?

Yes

And what similar use or power of acquisition has justice in time of peace?

In contracts, Socrates justice is of use

And by contracts you mean partnerships?

Exactly

But is the just man or the skilful player a more useful and better partner at a game of draughts?

The skilful player

And in the laying of bricks and stones is the just man a more useful or better partner than the builder?

Quite the reverse

Then in what sort of partnership is the just man a better partner than the harp-player as in playing the harp the harp-player is certainly a better partner than the just man?

In a money partnership

Yes Polemarchus but surely not in the use of money for you do not want a just man to be your counsellor in the purchase or sale of a horse a man who is knowing about horses would be better for that, would he not?

Certainly

And when you want to buy a ship, the shipwright or the pilot would be better?

True

Then what is that joint use of silver or gold in which the just man is to be preferred?

When you want a deposit to be kept safely

You mean when money is not wanted but allowed to lie?

Precisely

That is to say justice is useful when money is useless?

That is the inference

And when you want to keep a pruning hook safe then justice is useful to the individual and to the state but when you want to use it then the art of the vine-dresser?

Clearly

And when you want to keep a shield or a lyre and not to use them you would say that justice is useful but when you want to use them, then the art of the soldier or of the musician?

Certainly

And so of all the other things—justice is useful when they are useless and useless when they are useful?

That is the inference.

Then justice is not good for much But let us consider this further point Is not he who can best strike a blow in a boxing match or in any kind of fighting best able to ward off a blow?

Just as if the t o cases were at all alike! he said

Why should they not be? I replied and even f they are not, but only appear to be so to the person who is asked ought he not to say what he thinks, whether you and I forbid him or not?

I presume then that you are going to make one of the interdicted answers?

I dare say that I may notwithstanding the danger if upon reflection I approve of any of them

But what if I gi e you an answer about justice other and better he said than any of these? What do you deserve to have done to you?

Done to me!—as becomes the ignorant, I must learn from the wise—that is what I deserve to have done to me

What, and no payment! a pleasant notion!

I will pay when I ha e the money I replied

But you have, Socrates, said Glaucon and you Thrasymachus, need be under no anxiety about money for we will all make a contribution for Socrates

Yes he replied and then Socrates will do as he always does—refuse to answer himself, but take and pull to pieces the answer of some one else

Why my good friend I said how can any one answer who knows and says that he knows, just nothing and who even if he has some faint notions of his own is told by a man of authority not to utter them? [338] The natural thing is that the speaker should be some one like yourself who professes to know and can tell what he knows Will you then kindly answer for the edification of the company and f myself?

C laucon and the rest of the company joined in my request and Thrasymachus as any one m ght see was in real ty eager to speak for he thought that he had an excellent answer and would d stinguish himself But at *first he af*fected to insist on my answering at length he consented to beg n Behold he said the wisdom of Socrates he refu es to teach himself and goes about learning of others to whom he ne er even says Thank you

Th t I learn of others I eplied is qu te true b t that I am ungrateful I h lly deny M ney I have none, and therefore I pay in praise wh ch is all I have and how ready I am to pr se any one who appears to me to speak well you will very soon find out when you ans ver for I expect that you will answer well.

Listen then he said I proclaim that justice is nothing else than the interest of the stronger And now hy do you not praise me? But of course you won t

Let me first understand you I r plied Justice as you say is the interest of the stronger What, Thrasymachus, is the meaning of this? You cannot mean to say that because Polydam as, the pancratiast is stron er than we are and finds the eating of beef conducive to h s bodily strength, that to eat beef is th refore equally for our good who are weaker than he is and right and just for us?

That s abominable of you Socr tes you take the words in the sense which is most damagin to the argument.

Not at all my good sir I said I am trying to understand them and I wish that you would be a little clearer

Well he said have you never heard that forms of government differ there are tyrannies and there are democracies, and there are aristoc racies?

Yes, I know

And the government is the ruling power in each state?

Certainly

And the different forms of government make laws democrat cal aristocratical tyrannical with a view to their several interests and these laws which are made by them for their own in*terests* are the justice which they deliver to their subjects and him who transgresses them they punish as a breaker of the law and unjust And that is what I mean when I say that in all states there is the same principle of justice which is the interest of the government and as the government must be supposed to have power [339] the only reasonable conclusion is that everyw here there is one principle of justice which is the interest of the stronger

Now I understand you I said and whether you are right or not I will try to d scover But let me remark that in defining just ce you have yourself used the w rd interest hich you forb de me to use It s true however that in your defin tion the words of the stronger" are added

A small add tion you must allow he said

Great or small never mind about that we mu t fir t enquire whether what you are saying is the truth N w w e are both agreed that just e is nterest of some sort, but you go on to say of the stronger about this addition I am not so su e and must therefore consider further

Proceed

Impossible

And can the just by justice make men unjust or speaking generally can the good by virtue make them bad?

Assuredly not.

Any more than heat can produce cold?

It cannot

Or drought moisture?

Clearly not

Nor can the good harm any one?

Impossible

And the just is the good?

Certainly

Then to injure a friend or any one else is not the act of a just man but of the opposite who is the unjust?

I think that what you say is quite true, Socrates

Then if a man says that justice consists in the repayment of debts and that good is the debt which a man owes to his friends and evil the debt which he owes to his enemies—to say this is not wise for it is not true if as has been clearly shown the injuring of another can be in no case just

I agree with you said Polemarchus

Then you and I are prepared to take up arms against any one who attributes such a saying to Simonides or Bias or Pittacus or any other wise man or seer?

I am quite ready to do battle at your side he said

[336] Shall I tell you whose I believe the saying to be?

Whose?

I believe that Periander or Perdiccas or Xerxes or Ismenias the Theban or some other rich and mighty man who had a great opinion of his own power was the first to say that justice is doing good to your friends and harm to your enemies

Most true he said

Yes I said but if this definition of justice also breaks down what other can be offered?

Several times in the course of the discussion Thrasymachus had made an attempt to get the argument into his own hands and had been put down by the rest of the company who wanted to hear the end But when Polemarchus and I had done speaking and there was a pause he could no longer hold his peace and gathering himself up he came at us like a wild beast seeking to devour us We were quite panic stricken at the sight of him

He roared out to the whole company What folly Socrates has taken possession of you all? And why sillybillies do you knock under to one another? I say that if you want really to know what justice is you should not only ask but answer and you should not seek honour to yourself from the refutation of an opponent, but have your own answer for there is many a one who can ask and cannot answer And now I will not have you say that justice is duty or advantage or profit or gain or interest, for this sort of nonsense will not do for me I must have clearness and accuracy

I was panic stricken at his words and could not look at him without trembling Indeed I believe that if I had not fixed my eye upon him I should have been struck dumb but when I saw his fury rising I looked at him first, and was therefore able to reply to him

Thrasymachus I said with a quiver don't be hard upon us Polemarchus and I may have been guilty of a little mistake in the argument, but I can assure you that the error was not intentional If we were seeking for a piece of gold you would not imagine that we were knocking under to one another and so losing our chance of finding it And why when we are seeking for justice a thing more precious than many pieces of gold do you say that we are weakly yielding to one another and not doing our utmost to get at the truth? Nay my good friend we are most willing and anxious to do so but the fact is that we cannot And if so, you people who know all things should pity us and not be angry with us [337] How characteristic of Socrates! he replied with a bitter laugh—that's your ironical style! Did I not foresee—have I not already told you that whatever he was asked he would refuse to answer and try irony or any other shuffle in order that he might avoid answering?

You are a philosopher Thrasymachus I replied and well know that if you ask a person what numbers make up twelve taking care to prohibit him whom you ask from answering twice six or three times four or six times two or four times three for this sort of nonsense will not do for me —then obviously if that is your way of putting the question no one can answer you But suppose that he were to retort Thrasymachus what do you mean? If one of these numbers which you interdict be the true answer to the question am I falsely to say some other number which is not the right one?—is that your meaning? —How would you answer him?

I shall not make the attempt my dear man but to avoid any misunderstanding occurring between us in future, let me ask, in what sense do you speak of a ruler or stronger whose interest, as you were saying he being the superior it is just that the inferior should execute—is he a ruler in the popular or in the strict sense of the term?

In the strictest of all senses, he said And now cheat and play the informer if you can I ask no quarter at your hands But you never will be able, never

And do you imagine, I said that I am such a madman as to try and cheat Thrasymachus? I might as well shave a lion

Why he said you made the attempt a minute ago and you failed

Enough I said of these civilities. It will be better that I should ask you a question Is the physician taken in that strict sense of which you are speaking a healer of the sick or a maker of money? And remember that I am now speaking of the true physician

A healer of the sick, he replied

And the pilot—that is to say the true pilot—is he a captain of sailors or a mere sailor?

A captain of sailors.

The circumstance that he sails in the ship is not to be taken into account neither is he to be called a sailor the name pilot by which he is distinguished has nothing to do with sailing but is significant of his skill and of his authority over the sailors.

Very true, he said.

Now I said every art has an interest?

Certainly

For which the art has to consider and provide?

Yes, that is the aim of art

And the interest of any art is the perfection of it—this and nothing else?

What do you mean

I mean what I may illustrate negatively by the example of the body Suppose you were to ask me whether the body is self sufficing or has wants, I should reply Certainly the body has wants for the body may be ill and require to be cured and has therefore interests to which the art of medicine ministers and this is the origin and intention of medicine as you will acknowledge Am I not right?

[342] Quite right, he replied

But is the art of medicine or any other art faulty or deficient in any quality in the same way that the eye may be deficient in sight or the ear fail of hearing, and therefore requires another art to provide for the interests of seeing and hearing—has art in itself I say any similar liability to fault or defect, and does every art require another supplementary art to provide for its interests, and that another and another without end? Or have the arts to look only after their own interests? Or have they no need either of themselves or of another?—having no faults or defects, they have no need to correct them either by the exercise of their own art or of any other they have only to consider the interest of their subject matter For every art remains pure and faultless while remaining true—that is to say while perfect and unimpaired Take the words in your precise sense, and tell me whether I am not right.

Yes, clearly

Then medicine does not consider the interest of medicine, but the interest of the body?

True, he said.

Nor does the art of horsemanship consider the interests of the art of horsemanship but the interests of the horse neither do any other arts care for themselves, for they have no needs they care only for that which is the subject of their art?

True, he said

But surely Thrasymachus, the arts are the superiors and rulers of their own subjects?

To this he assented with a good deal of reluctance

Then, I said no science or art considers or enjoins the interest of the stronger or superior but only the interest of the subject and weaker?

He made an attempt to contest this proposition also, but finally acquiesced

Then, I continued, no physician, in so far as he is a physician considers his own good in what he prescribes, but the good of his patient for the true physician is also a ruler having the human body as a subject, and is not a mere money maker that has been admitted?

Yes.

And the pilot likewise, in the strict sense of the term is a ruler of sailors and not a mere sailor?

That has been admitted

And such a pilot and ruler will provide and prescribe for the interest of the sailor who is under him and not for his own or the ruler s interest?

He gave a reluctant Yes

Then I said Thrasymachus, there is no one in any rule who in so far as he is a ruler considers or enjoins what is for his own interest, but always what is for the interest of his subject

I will and first tell me, Do you admit that it is just for subjects to obey their rulers?

I do

But are the rulers of states absolutely infallible or are they sometimes liable to err?

To be sure he replied they are liable to err

Then in making their laws they may sometimes make them rightly and sometimes not?

True

When they make them rightly they make them agreeably to their interest when they are mistaken contrary to their interest you admit that?

Yes

And the laws which they make must be obeyed by their subjects—and that is what you call justice?

Doubtless

Then justice according to your argument is not only obedience to the interest of the stronger but the reverse?

What is that you are saying? he asked

I am only repeating what you are saying I believe But let us consider Have we not admitted that the rulers may be mistaken about their own interest in what they command and also that to obey them is justice? Has not that been admitted?

Yes

Then you must also have acknowledged justice not to be for the interest of the stronger when the rulers unintentionally command things to be done which are to their own injury For if as you say justice is the obedience which the subject renders to their commands in that case O wisest of men is there any escape from the conclusion that the weaker are commanded to do not what is for the interest but what is for the injury of the stronger?

Nothing can be clearer Socrates said Polemarchus

[340] Yes said Cleitophon interposing if you are allowed to be his witness

But there is no need of any witness said Polemarchus for Thrasymachus himself acknowledges that rulers may sometimes command what is not for their own interest and that for subjects to obey them is justice

Yes Polemarchus—Thrasymachus said that for subjects to do what was commanded by their rulers is just

Yes Cleitophon but he also said that justice is the interest of the stronger and while admitting both these propositions he further acknowledged that the stronger may command the weaker who are his subjects to do what is not for his own interest whence follows that justice is the injury quite as much as the interest of the stronger

But said Cleitophon, he meant by the interest of the stronger what the stronger thought to be his interest—this was what the weaker had to do and this was affirmed by him to be justice

Those were not his words rejoined Polemarchus

Never mind I replied if he now says that they are let us accept his statement Tell me, Thrasymachus I said did you mean by justice what the stronger thought to be his interest, whether really so or not?

Certainly not he said Do you suppose that I call him who is mistaken the stronger at the time when he is mistaken?

Yes I said my impression was that you did so, when you admitted that the ruler was not infallible but might be sometimes mistaken

You argue like an informer Socrates Do you mean for example that he who is mistaken about the sick is a physician in that he is mistaken? or that he who errs in arithmetic or grammar is an arithmetician or grammarian at the time when he is making the mistake in respect of the mistake? True we say that the physician or arithmetician or grammarian has made a mistake but this is only a way of speaking for the fact is that neither the grammarian nor any other person of skill ever makes a mistake in so far as he is what his name implies they none of them err unless their skill fails them and then they cease to be skilled artists No artist or sage or ruler errs at the time when he is what his name implies though he is commonly said to err and I adopt the common mode of speaking But to be perfectly accurate since you are such a lover of accuracy we should say that the ruler in so far as he is a ruler is unerring [341] and being unerring always commands that which is for his own interest and the subject is required to execute his commands and therefore as I said at first and now repeat justice is the interest of the stronger

Indeed Thrasymachus and do I really appear to you to argue like an informer?

Certainly he replied

And do you suppose that I ask these questions with any design of injuring you in the argument?

Nay he replied suppose is not the word—I know it but you will be found out and by sheer force of argument you will never prevail injustice, and there may be others who are in the same predicament with myself. Perhaps we may be wrong; if so, you in your wisdom should convince us that we are mistaken in preferring justice to injustice.

And how am I to convince you, he said, if you are not already convinced by what I have just said; what more can I do for you? Would you have me put the proof bodily into your souls?

Heaven forbid! I said; I would only ask you to be consistent; or, if you change, change openly and let there be no deception. For I must remark, Thrasymachus, if you will recall what was previously said, that although you began by defining the true physician in an exact sense, you did not observe a like exactness when speaking of the shepherd; you thought that the shepherd as a shepherd tends the sheep not with a view to their own good, but like a mere diner or banquetter with a view to the pleasures of the table; or, again, as a trader for sale in the market, and not as a shepherd. Yet surely the art of the shepherd is concerned only with the good of his subjects; he has only to provide the best for them, since the perfection of the art is already ensured whenever all the requirements of it are satisfied. And that was what I was saying just now about the ruler. I conceived that the art of the ruler, considered as ruler, whether in a state or in private life, could only regard the good of his flock or subjects; whereas you seem to think that the rulers in states, that is to say, the true rulers, like being in authority.

Think! Nay, I am sure of it.

Then why in the case of lesser offices do men never take them willingly without payment, unless under the idea that they govern for the advantage not of themselves but of others? [346] Let me ask you a question: Are not the several arts different, by reason of their each having a separate function? And, my dear illustrious friend, do say what you think, that we may make a little progress.

Yes, that is the difference, he replied.

And each art gives us a particular good and not merely a general one—medicine, for example, gives us health; navigation, safety at sea, and so on?

Yes, he said.

And the art of payment has the special function of giving pay: but we do not confuse this with other arts, any more than the art of the pilot is to be confused with the art of medicine, because the health of the pilot may be improved by a sea voyage. You would not be inclined to say, would you, that navigation is the art of medicine, at least if we are to adopt your exact use of language?

Certainly not.

Or because a man is in good health when he receives pay you would not say that the art of payment is medicine?

I should say not.

Nor would you say that medicine is the art of receiving pay because a man takes fees when he is engaged in healing?

Certainly not.

And we have admitted, I said, that the good of each art is specially confined to the art?

Yes.

Then, if there be any good which all artists have in common, that is to be attributed to something of which they all have the common use?

True, he replied.

And when the artist is benefited by receiving pay the advantage is gained by an additional use of the art of pay, which is not the art professed by him?

He gave a reluctant assent to this.

Then the pay is not derived by the several artists from their respective arts. But the truth is, that while the art of medicine gives health, and the art of the builder builds a house, another art attends them which is the art of pay. The various arts may be doing their own business and benefiting that over which they preside, but would the artist receive any benefit from his art unless he were paid as well?

I suppose not.

But does he therefore confer no benefit when he works for nothing?

Certainly, he confers a benefit.

Then now, Thrasymachus, there is no longer any doubt that neither arts nor governments provide for their own interests; but, as we were before saying, they rule and provide for the interests of their subjects who are the weaker and not the stronger—to their good they attend and not to the good of the superior. And this is the reason, my dear Thrasymachus, why, as I was just now saying, no one is willing to govern; because no one likes to take in hand the reformation of evils which are not his concern without remuneration. For [347] in the execution of his work, and in giving his orders to another, the true artist does not regard his own interest, but always that of his subjects; and therefore in order that rulers may be willing to rule, they must be paid in one of three modes of payment, money or suitable to his art to that he looks and that alone he considers in everything which he says and does [343] When we had got to this point in the argument and everyone saw that the definition of justice had been completely upset Thrasymachus instead of replying to me, said Tell me Socrates have you got a nurse?

Why do you ask such a question I said when you ought rather to be answering?

Because she leaves you to snivel and never wipes your nose she has not even taught you to know the shepherd from the sheep

What makes you say that? I replied

Because you fancy that the shepherd or neatherd fattens or tends the sheep or oxen with a view to their own good and not to the good of himself or his master and you further imagine that the rulers of states if they are true rulers never think of their subjects as sheep, and that they are not studying their own advantage day and night Oh no and so entirely astray are you in your ideas about the just and unjust as not even to know that justice and the just are in reality another s good that is to say the interest of the ruler and stronger and the loss of the subject and servant and injustice the opposite for the unjust is lord over the truly simple and just he is the stronger and his subjects do what is for his interest and minister to his happiness which is very far from being their own Consider further most foolish Socrates that the just is always a loser in comparison with the unjust First of all in private contracts wherever the unjust is the partner of the just you will find that when the partnership is dissolved the unjust man has always more and the just less Secondly in their dealings with the State when there is an income tax the just man will pay more and the unjust less on the same amount of income and when there is anything to be received the one gains nothing and the other much Observe also what happens when they take an office there is the just man neglecting his affairs and perhaps suffering other losses and getting nothing out of the public because he is just moreover he is hated by his friends and acquaintance for refusing to serve them in unlawful ways [344] But all this is reversed in the case of the unjust man I am speaking as before of injustice on a large scale in which the advantage of the unjust is more apparent and my meaning will be most clearly seen if we turn to that highest form of injustice in which the criminal is the happiest of men and the sufferers or those who refuse to do injustice are the most miserable—that is to say tyranny which by fraud and force takes away the property of others not little by little but wholesale comprehending in one, things sacred as well as profane private and public for which acts of wrong if he were detected perpetrating any one of them singly he would be punished and incur great disgrace—they who do such wrong in particular cases are called robbers of temples, and man stealers and burglars and swindlers and thieves But when a man besides taking away the money of the citizens has made slaves of them then instead of these names of reproach he is termed happy and blessed not only by the citizens but by all who hear of his having achieved the consummation of injustice. For mankind censure injustice fearing that they may be the victims of it and not because they shrink from committing it And thus, as I have shown Socrates injustice when on a sufficient scale has more strength and freedom and mastery than justice and as I said at first, justice is the interest of the stronger whereas injustice is a man s own profit and interest

Thrasymachus when he had thus spoken, having like a bathman deluged our ears with his words had a mind to go away But the company would not let him they insisted that he should remain and defend his position and I myself added my own humble request that he would not leave us Thrasymachus I said to him excellent man how suggestive are your remarks! And are you going to run away before you have fairly taught or learned whether they are true or not? Is the attempt to determine the way of man s life so small a matter in your eyes —to determine how life may be passed by each one of us to the greatest advantage?

And do I differ from you he said as to the importance of the enquiry?

You appear rather I replied to have no care or thought about us Thrasymachus—whether we live better or worse from not knowing what you say you know is to you a matter of indifference Prithee friend [345] do not keep your knowledge to yourself we are a large party and any benefit which you confer upon us will be amply rewarded For my own part I openly declare that I am not convinced and that I do not believe injustice to be more gainful than justice even if uncontrolled and allowed to have free play For granting that there may be an unjust man who is able to commit injustice either by fraud or force still this does not convince me of the superior advantage of

Now I said, you are on more substantial and almost unanswerable ground for if the injustice which you were maintaining to be profitable had been admitted by you as by others to be vice and deformity an answer might have been given to you on received principles [349] but now I perceive that you will call injustice honourable and strong and to the unjust you will attribute all the qualities which were attributed by us before to the just, seeing that you do not hesitate to rank injustice with wisdom and virtue.

You have guessed most infallibly he replied

Then I certainly ought not to shrink from going through with the argument so long as I have reason to think that you Thrasymachus, are speaking your real mind for I do believe that you are now in earnest and are not amusing yourself at our expense

I may be in earnest or not, but what is that to you?—to refute the argument is your business.

Very true, I said that is what I have to do But will you be so good as answer yet one more question? Does the just man try to gain any advantage over the just?

Far otherwise if he did he would not be the simple amusing creature which he is.

And would he try to go beyond just action?

He would not.

And how would he regard the attempt to gain an advantage over the unjust would that be considered by him as just or unjust?

He would think it just, and would try to gain the advantage but he would not be able

Whether he would or would not be able, I said is not to the point. My question is only whether the just man, while refusing to have more than another just man, would wish and claim to have more than the unjust?

Yes, he would.

And what of the unjust—does he claim to have more than the just man and to do more than is just?

Of course, he said, for he claims to have more than all men.

And the unjust man will strive and struggle to obtain more than the unjust man or action, in order that he may have more than all?

True

We may put the matter thus, I said—the just does not desire more than his like but more than his unlike, whereas the unjust desires more than both his like and his unlike?

Nothing, he said, can be better than that statement.

And the unjust is good and wise, and the just is neither?

Good again, he said

And is not the unjust like the wise and good and the just unlike them?

Of course he said he who is of a certain nature, is like those who are of a certain nature he who is not, not.

Each of them I said is such as his like is?

Certainly he replied

Very good Thrasymachus, I said and now to take the case of the arts you would admit that one man is a musician and another not a musician?

Yes.

And which is wise and which is foolish?

Clearly the musician is wise and he who is not a musician is foolish

And he is good in as far as he is wise, and bad in as far as he is foolish?

Yes.

And you would say the same sort of thing of the physician?

Yes

And do you think, my excellent friend that a musician when he adjusts the lyre would desire or claim to exceed or go beyond a musician in the tightening and loosening the strings?

I do not think that he would

But he would claim to exceed the non musician?

Of course.

[350] And what would you say of the physician? In prescribing meats and drinks would he wish to go beyond another physician or beyond the practice of medicine?

He would not.

But he would wish to go beyond the non physician?

Yes

And about knowledge and ignorance in general see whether you think that any man who has knowledge ever would wish to have the choice of saying or doing more than another man who has knowledge Would he not rather say or do the same as his like in the same case?

That, I suppose, can hardly be denied.

And what of the ignorant? would he not desire to have more than either the knowing or the ignorant?

I dare say

And the knowing is wise?

Yes.

And the wise is good?

True.

Then the wise and good will not desire to or honour or a penalty for refusing

What do you mean Socrates? said Glaucon The first two modes of payment are intelligible enough but what the penalty is I do not understand or how a penalty can be a payment

You mean that you do not understand the nature of this payment which to the best men is the great inducement to rule? Of course you know that ambition and avarice are held to be as indeed they are a disgrace?

Very true

And for this reason, I said money and honour have no attraction for them good men do not wish to be openly demanding payment for governing and so to get the name of hirelings nor by secretly helping themselves out of the public revenues to get the name of thieves And not being ambitious they do not care about honour Wherefore necessity must be laid upon them and they must be induced to serve from the fear of punishment And this as I imagine is the reason why the forwardness to take office instead of waiting to be compelled has been deemed dishonourable Now the worst part of the punishment is that he who refuses to rule is liable to be ruled by one who is worse than himself And the fear of this as I conceive induces the good to take office not because they would but because they cannot help—not under the idea that they are going to have any benefit or enjoyment themselves but as a necessity and because they are not able to commit the task of ruling to any one who is better than themselves or indeed as good For there is reason to think that if a city were composed entirely of good men then to avoid office would be as much an object of contention as to obtain office is at present then we should have plain proof that the true ruler is not meant by nature to regard his own interest but that of his subjects and every one who knew this would choose rather to receive a benefit from another than to have the trouble of conferring one So far am I from agreeing with Thrasymachus that justice is the interest of the stronger This latter question need not be further discussed at present but when Thrasymachus says that the life of the unjust is more advantageous than that of the just his new statement appears to me to be of a far more serious character Which of us has spoken truly? And which sort of life Glaucon do you prefer?

I for my part deem the life of the just to be the more advantageous he answered

[348] Did you hear all the advantages of the unjust which Thrasymachus was rehearsing?

Yes I heard him he replied but he has not convinced me

Then shall we try to find some way of convincing him if we can that he is saying what is not true?

Most certainly he replied

If I said he makes a set speech and we make another recounting all the advantages of being just and he answers and we rejoin there must be a numbering and measuring of the goods which are claimed on either side and in the end we shall want judges to decide but if we proceed in our enquiry as we lately did by making admissions to one another we shall unite the offices of judge and advocate in our own persons

Very good, he said

And which method do I understand you to prefer? I said

That which you propose

Well then Thrasymachus I said suppose you begin at the beginning and answer me You say that perfect injustice is more gainful than perfect justice?

Yes that is what I say and I have given you my reasons

And what is your view about them? Would you call one of them virtue and the other vice?

Certainly

I suppose that you would call justice virtue and injustice vice?

What a charming notion! So likely too seeing that I affirm injustice to be profitable and justice not

What else then would you say?

The opposite he replied

And would you call justice vice?

No I would rather say sublime simplicity

Then would you call injustice malignity?

No I would rather say discretion

And do the unjust appear to you to be wise and good?

Yes he said at any rate those of them who are able to be perfectly unjust and who have the power of subduing states and nations but perhaps you imagine me to be talking of cutpurses Even this profession if undetected has advantages though they are not to be compared with those of which I was just now speaking

I do not think that I misapprehend your meaning Thrasymachus I replied but still I cannot hear without amazement that you class injustice with wisdom and virtue and justice with the opposite

Certainly I do so class them

Now I said, you are on more substantial and almost unanswerable ground for if the injustice which you were maintaining to be profitable had been admitted by you as by others to be vice and deformity an answer might have been given to you on received principles [349] but now I perceive that you will call injustice honourable and strong and to the unjust you will attribute all the qualities which were attributed by us before to the just, seeing that you do not hesitate to rank injustice with wisdom and virtue.

You have guessed most infallibly he replied.

Then I certainly ought not to shrink from going through with the argument so long as I have reason to think that you Thrasymachus, are speaking your real mind for I do believe that you are now in earnest and are not amusing yourself at our expense

I may be in earnest or not, but what is that to you?—to refute the argument is your business.

Very true, I said that is what I have to do But will you be so good as answer yet one more question? Does the just man try to gain any advantage over the just?

Far otherwise if he did he would not be the simple amusing creature which he is.

And would he try to go beyond just action?

He would not.

And how would he regard the attempt to gain an advantage over the unjust would that be considered by him as just or unjust?

He would think it just, and would try to gain the advantage but he would not be able

Whether he would or would not be able, I said, is not to the point. My question is only whether the just man, while refusing to have more than another just man, would wish and claim to have more than the unjust?

Yes, he would.

And what of the unjust—does he claim to have more than the just man and to do more than is just?

Of course, he said, for he claims to have more than all men.

And the unjust man will strive and struggle to obtain more than the unjust man or action, in order that he may have more than all?

True.

We may put the matter thus, I said—the just does not desire more than his like but more than his unlike, whereas the unjust desires more than both his like and his unlike?

Nothing he said, can be better than that statement.

And the unjust is good and wise, and the just is neither?

Good again, he said

And is not the unjust like the wise and good and the just unlike them?

Of course, he said he who is of a certain nature, is like those who are of a certain nature he who is not, not

Each of them, I said is such as his like is?

Certainly he replied

Very good, Thrasymachus, I said and now to take the case of the arts you would admit that one man is a musician and another not a musician?

Yes.

And which is wise and which is foolish?

Clearly the musician is wise, and he who is not a musician is foolish

And he is good in as far as he is wise, and bad in as far as he is foolish?

Yes.

And you would say the same sort of thing of the physician?

Yes

And do you think, my excellent friend that a musician when he adjusts the lyre would desire or claim to exceed or go beyond a musician in the tightening and loosening the strings?

I do not think that he would

But he would claim to exceed the non-musician?

Of course.

[350] And what would you say of the physician? In prescribing meats and drinks would he wish to go beyond another physician or beyond the practice of medicine?

He would not.

But he would wish to go beyond the non-physician?

Yes.

And about knowledge and ignorance in general see whether you think that any man who has knowledge ever would wish to have the choice of saying or doing more than another man who has knowledge. Would he not rather say or do the same as his like in the same case?

That, I suppose, can hardly be denied

And what of the ignorant? would he not desire to have more than either the knowing or the ignorant?

I dare say

And the knowing is wise?

Yes.

And the wise is good?

True.

Then the wise and good will not desire to gain more than his like but more than his unlike and opposite?

I suppose so

Whereas the bad and ignorant will desire to gain more than both?

Yes

But did we not say, Thrasymachus that the unjust goes beyond both his like and unlike? Were not these your words?

They were

And you also said that the just will not go beyond his like but his unlike?

Yes

Then the just is like the wise and good and the unjust like the evil and ignorant?

That is the inference

And each of them is such as his like is?

That was admitted

Then the just has turned out to be wise and good and the unjust evil and ignorant

Thrasymachus made all these admissions not fluently as I repeat them but with extreme reluctance it was a hot summer s day and the perspiration poured from him in torrents and then I saw what I had never seen before Thrasymachus blushing As we were now agreed that justice was virtue and wisdom and injustice vice and ignorance I proceeded to another point

Well I said Thrasymachus that matter is now settled but were we not also saying that injustice had strength do you remember?

Yes I remember he said but do not suppose that I approve of what you are saying or have no answer if however I were to answer you would be quite certain to accuse me of harangu ing therefore either permit me to have my say out or if you would rather ask do so and I will answer Very good as they say to story telling old women and will nod Yes and No

Certainly not I said if contrary to your real opinion

Yes he said I will to please you since you will not let me speak What else would you have?

Nothing in the world I said and if you are so disposed I will ask and you shall answer

Proceed

Then I will repeat the question which I asked before in order that our examination of the relative nature of justice and injustice [351] may be carried on regularly A statement was made that injustice is stronger and more power ful than justice but now justice having been identified with wisdom and virtue, is easily shown to be stronger than injustice, if injustice is ignorance this can no longer be questioned by any one But I want to view the matter, Thrasymachus in a different way You would not deny that a state may be unjust and may be unjustly attempting to enslave other states, or may have already enslaved them and may be holding many of them in subjection?

True he replied and I will add that the best and most perfectly unjust state will be most likely to do so

I know I said that such was your position but what I would further consider is whether this power which is possessed by the superior state can exist or be exercised without justice or only with justice

If you are right in your view and justice is wisdom then only with justice but if I am right then without justice

I am delighted Thrasymachus to see you not only nodding assent and dissent, but mak ing answers which are quite excellent

That is out of civility to you he replied

You are very kind I said and would you have the goodness also to inform me whether you think that a state or an army or a band of robbers and thieves or any other gang of evil doers could act at all if they injured one another?

No indeed he said they could not

But if they abstained from injuring one another then they might act together better?

Yes

And this is because injustice creates divisions and hatreds and fighting and justice imparts harmony and friendship is not that true, Thrasymachus?

I agree he said because I do not wish to quarrel with you

How good of you I said but I should like to know also whether injustice having this tendency to arouse hatred wherever existing among slaves or among freemen will not make them hate one another and set them at variance and render them incapable of common action?

Certainly

And even if injustice be found in two only will they not quarrel and fight and become enemies to one another and to the just?

They will

And suppose injustice abiding in a single person would your wisdom say that she loses or that she retains her natural power?

Let us assume that she retains her power

Yet is not the power which injustice exer cises of such a nature that wherever she takes up her abode, whether in a city in an army [352] in a family or in any other body that body is, to begin with, rendered incapable of united action by reason of sedition and distraction and does it not become its own enemy and at variance with all that opposes it, and with the just? Is not this the case?

Yes, certainly

And is not injustice equally fatal when existing in a single person in the first place rendering him incapable of action because he is not at unity with himself, and in the second place making him an enemy to himself and the just? Is not that true Thrasymachus?

Yes.

And O my friend, I said, surely the gods are just?

Granted that they are

But if so, the unjust will be the enemy of the gods, and the just will be their friend?

Feast away in triumph, and take your fill of the argument I will not oppose you, lest I should displease the company

Well then, proceed with your answers, and let me have the remainder of my repast. For we have already shown that the just are clearly wiser and better and abler than the unjust, and that the unjust are incapable of common action nay more, that to speak as we did of men who are evil acting at any time vigorously together is not strictly true, for if they had been perfectly evil, they would have laid hands upon one another but it is evident that there must have been some remnant of justice in them, which enabled them to combine if there had not been they would have injured one another as well as their victims they were but half villains in their enterprises for had they been whole villains, and utterly unjust, they would have been utterly incapable of action. That, as I believe, is the truth of the matter and not what you said at first. But whether the just have a better and happier life than the unjust is a further question which we also proposed to consider I think that they have, and for the reasons which I have given but still I should like to examine further for no light matter is at stake, nothing less than the rule of human life

Proceed.

I will proceed by asking a question. Would you not say that a horse has some end?

I should.

And the end or use of a horse or of any thing would be that which could not be accomplished, or not so well accomplished, by any other thing?

I do not understand, he said.

Let me explain Can you see except with the eye?

Certainly not

Or hear except with the ear?

No.

These then may be truly said to be the ends of these organs?

They may

[353] But you can cut off a vine-branch with a dagger or with a chisel, and in many other ways?

Of course.

And yet not so well as with a pruning hook made for the purpose?

True.

May we not say that this is the end of a pruning hook?

We may

Then now I think you will have no difficulty in understanding my meaning when I asked the question whether the end of anything would be that which could not be accomplished, or not so well accomplished, by any other thing?

I understand your meaning, he said, and assent.

And that to which an end is appointed has also an excellence? Need I ask again whether the eye has an end?

It has.

And has not the eye an excellence?

Yes.

And the ear has an end and an excellence also?

True.

And the same is true of all other things they have each of them an end and a special excellence?

That is so.

Well, and can the eyes fulfil their end if they are wanting in their own proper excellence and have a defect instead?

How can they he said, if they are blind and cannot see?

You mean to say if they have lost their proper excellence, which is sight but I have not arrived at that point yet. I would rather ask the question more generally and only enquire whether the things which fulfil their ends fulfil them by their own proper excellence, and fail of fulfilling them by their own defect?

Certainly he replied

I might say the same of the ears when deprived of their own proper excellence they cannot fulfil their end?

True

And the same observation will apply to all other things?

I agree

Well and has not the soul an end which nothing else can fulfil? for example to superintend and command and deliberate and the like Are not these functions proper to the soul and can they rightly be assigned to any other?

To no other

And is not life to be reckoned among the ends of the soul?

Assuredly he said

And has not the soul an excellence also?

Yes

And can she or can she not fulfil her own ends when deprived of that excellence?

She cannot

Then an evil soul must necessarily be an evil ruler and superintendent and the good soul a good ruler?

Yes necessarily

And we have admitted that justice is the excellence of the soul and injustice the defect of the soul?

That has been admitted

Then the just soul and the just man will live well and the unjust man will live ill?

That is what your argument proves

[354] And he who lives well is blessed and happy and he who lives ill the reverse of happy?

Certainly

Then the just is happy and the unjust miserable?

So be it

But happiness and not misery is profitable

Of course

Then my blessed Thrasymachus injustice can never be more profitable than justice

Let this Socrates he said be your entertainment at the Bendidea

For which I am indebted to you I said now that you have grown gentle towards me and have left off scolding Nevertheless I have not been well entertained but that was my own fault and not yours As an epicure snatches a taste of every dish which is successively brought to table, he not having allowed himself time to enjoy the one before so have I gone from one subject to another without having discovered what I sought at first the nature of justice I left that enquiry and turned away to consider whether justice is virtue and wisdom or evil and folly and when there arose a further question about the comparative advantages of justice and injustice I could not refrain from passing on to that And the result of the whole discussion has been that I know nothing at all For I know not what justice is and therefore I am not likely to know whether it is or is not a virtue nor can I say whether the just man is happy or unhappy

BOOK II

[357] WITH these words I was thinking that I had made an end of the discussion but the end in truth proved to be only a beginning For Glaucon who is always the most pugnacious of men was dissatisfied at Thrasymachus retirement he wanted to have the battle out So he said to me Socrates do you wish really to persuade us or only to seem to have persuaded us that to be just is always better than to be unjust?

I should wish really to persuade you I replied if I could

Then you certainly have not succeeded Let me ask you now —How would you arrange goods—are there not some which we welcome for their own sakes and independently of their consequences as for example harmless pleasures and enjoyments which delight us at the time although nothing follows from them?

I agree in thinking that there is such a class, I replied

Is there not also a second class of goods such as knowledge sight health which are desirable not only in themselves, but also for their results?

Certainly I said

And would you not recognize a third class, such as gymnastic and the care of the sick and the physician's art also the various ways of money making—these do us good but we regard them as disagreeable and no one would choose them for their own sakes but only for the sake of some reward or result which flows from them?

There is I said this third class also But why do you ask?

Because I want to know in which of the three classes you would place justice?

[358] In the highest class I replied—among those goods which he who would be happy desires both for their own sake and for the sake of their results

Then the many are of another mind they think that justice is to be reckoned in the troublesome class among goods which are to be pursued for the sake of rewards and of repu

tion, but in themselves are disagreeable and rather to be avoided

I know I said, that this is their manner of thinking and that this was the thesis which Thrasymachus was maintaining just now when he censured justice and praised injustice. But I am too stupid to be convinced by him.

I wish, he said that you would hear me as well as him, and then I shall see whether you and I agree For Thrasymachus seems to me, like a snake, to have been charmed by your voice sooner than he ought to have been but to my mind the nature of justice and injustice have not yet been made clear Setting aside their rewards and results, I want to know what they are in themsel es, and how they inwardly work in the soul If you please, then, I will revive the argument of Thrasymachus. And first I will speak of the nature and origin of justice according to the common view of them. Secondly I will show that all men who practise justice do so against their will of necessity but not as a good. And thirdly I will argue that there is reason in this iew for the life of the unjust is after all better far than the life of the just—if what they say is true, Socrates, since I myself am not of their opinion But still I acknowledge that I am perplexed when I hear the voices of Thrasymachus and myriads of others d nning in my ears and on the other hand I ha e never yet heard the superiority of justice to injustice maintained by any one in a satisfactory way I want to hear justice praised in respect of itself then I shall be satisfied and you are the person from whom I think that I am most likely to hear this and therefore I will praise the unjust life to the utmost of my power and my manner of speaking will indicate the manner in which I desire to hear y u too praising justice and censuring injust ce Will you say whether you approve of my proposal?

Indeed I do nor can I imagine any theme about which a man of sense would oftener wish to con erse

I am delighted he replied to hear you say so, and shall begin by speaking as I proposed of the nature and origin of justice

They say that to do injustice is, by nature, good to suffer injustice, evil but that the evil is greater than the good And so when men have both done and suffered injustice and have had experience [359] of both, not being able to avoid the one and obtain the other they think that they had better agree among themselves to have neither hence there arise laws and mutual covenants and that which is ordained by law is termed by them lawful and just This they affirm to be the origin and nature of justice—it is a mean or compromise between the best of all, which is to do injustice and not be punished, and the worst of all which is to suffer injustice without the power of retaliation and justice, being at a middle point between the two is tolerated not as a good, but as the lesser evil and honoured by reason of the inability of men to do injustice. For no man who is worthy to be called a man would ever submit to such an agreement if he were able to resist he would be mad if he did Such is the received account, Socrates, of the nature and origin of justice

Now that those who practise justice do so involuntarily and because they have not the power to be unjust will best appear if we imagine something of this kind having given both to the just and the unjust power to do what they will let us watch and see whither desire will lead them then we shall discover in the very act the just and unjust man to be proceeding along the same road, following their interest, which all natures deem to be their good, and are only diverted into the path of justice by the force of law The liberty which we are supposing may be most completely given to them in the form of such a power as is said to have been possessed by Gyges the ancestor of Croesus the Lydian According to the tradition Gyges was a shepherd in the service of the king of Lydia there was a great storm and an earthquake made an opening in the earth at the place where he was feeding his flock. Amazed at the sight, he descended into the opening where, among other marvels, he beheld a hollow brazen horse having doors, at which he stooping and looking in saw a dead body of stature, as appeared to him more than human and having nothing on but a gold ring this he took from the finger of the dead and reascended Now the shepherds met together according to custom, that they might send their monthly report about the flocks to the king into their assembly he came having the ring on his finger and as he was sitting among them he chanced to turn the collet of the ring inside his hand when instantly he became invisible to the rest of the company and they began to speak of him as if he were no longer present. [360] He was astonished at this and again touching the ring he turned the collet outwards and reappeared he made several trials of the ring and always with the same result—when he turned the collet inwards he became invisible when outwards he reappeared Whereupon he contrived to be chosen one of the messengers who were sent to the court where as soon as he arrived he seduced the queen and with her help conspired against the king and slew him and took the kingdom Suppose now that there were two such magic rings and the just put on one of them and the unjust the other no man can be imagined to be of such an iron nature that he would stand fast in justice No man would keep his hands off what was not his own when he could safely take what he liked out of the market or go into houses and lie with any one at his pleasure or kill or release from prison whom he would and in all respects be like a God among men Then the actions of the just would be as the actions of the unjust they would both come at last to the same point And this we may truly affirm to be a great proof that a man is just not willingly or because he thinks that justice is any good to him individually but of necessity for wherever any one thinks that he can safely be unjust there he is unjust For all men believe in their hearts that injustice is far more profitable to the individual than justice and he who argues as I have been supposing will say that they are right If you could imagine any one obtaining this power of becoming invisible and never doing any wrong or touching what was another s he would be thought by the lookers on to be a most wretched idiot although they would praise him to one another s faces and keep up appearances with one another from a fear that they too might suffer injustice Enough of this

Now if we are to form a real judgment of the life of the just and unjust we must isolate them there is no other way and how is the isolation to be effected? I answer Let the unjust man be entirely unjust and the just man entirely just nothing is to be taken away from either of them and both are to be perfectly furnished for the work of their respective lives First, let the unjust be like other distinguished masters of craft like the skilful pilot or physician who knows intuitively his own powers and keeps within their limits [361] and who if he fails at any point is able to recover himself So let the unjust make his unjust attempts in the right way and lie hidden if he means to be great in his injustice (he who is found out is nobody) for the highest reach of injustice is to be deemed just when you are not Therefore I say that in the perfectly unjust man we must assume the most perfect injustice there is to be no deduction, but we must allow him, while doing the most unjust acts to have acquired the greatest reputation for justice. If he have taken a false step he must be able to recover himself he must be one who can speak with effect, if any of his deeds come to light and who can force his way where force is required by his courage and strength and command of money and friends And at his side let us place the just man in his nobleness and simplicity wishing as Aeschylus says to be and not to seem good There must be no seeming for if he seem to be just he will be honoured and rewarded and then we shall not know whether he is just for the sake of justice or for the sake of honours and rewards therefore, let him be clothed in justice only and have no other covering and he must be imagined in a state of life the opposite of the former Let him be the best of men and let him be thought the worst then he will have been put to the proof and we shall see whether he will be affected by the fear of infamy and its consequences And let him continue thus to the hour of death being just and seeming to be unjust When both have reached the uttermost extreme the one of justice and the other of injustice let judgment be given which of them is the happier of the two

Heavens! my dear Glaucon I said how energetically you polish them up for the decision first one and then the other as if they were two statues

I do my best he said And now that we know what they are like there is no difficulty in tracing out the sort of life which awaits either of them This I will proceed to describe but as you may think the description a little too coarse I ask you to suppose Socrates that the words which follow are not mine Let me put them into the mouths of the eulogists of injustice They will tell you that the just man who is thought unjust will be scourged racked bound —will have his eyes burnt out and at last, after suffering every kind of evil he will be impaled Then he will understand that he ought to seem only [362] and not to be just the words of Aeschylus may be more truly spoken of the unjust than of the just For the unjust is pursuing a reality he does not live with a view to appearances—he wants to be really unjust and not to seem only

His mind has a soil deep and fertile
Out of which spring his prudent counsels

In the first place he is thought just, and there fore bears rule in the city; he can marry whom he will, and give in marriage to whom he will; also he can trade and deal where he likes, and always to his own advantage, because he has no misgivings about injustice; and at every contest, whether in public or private, he gets the better of his antagonists, and gains at their expense, and is rich, and out of his gains he can benefit his friends, and harm his enemies; moreover he can offer sacrifices, and dedicate gifts to the gods abundantly and magnificently, and can honour the gods or any man whom he wants to honour in a far better style than the just, and therefore he is likely to be dearer than they are to the gods. And thus, Socrates, gods and men are said to unite in making the life of the unjust better than the life of the just.

I was going to say something in answer to Glaucon, when Adeimantus, his brother, interposed: Socrates, he said, you do not suppose that there is nothing more to be urged?

Why, what else is there? I answered.

The strongest point of all has not been even mentioned, he replied.

Well, then, according to the proverb, 'Let brother help brother'—if he fails in any part do you assist him; although I must confess that Glaucon has already said quite enough to lay me in the dust, and take from me the power of helping justice.

Nonsense, he replied. But let me add something more: There is another side to Glaucon's argument about the praise and censure of justice and injustice, which is equally required in order to bring out what I believe to be his meaning. Parents and tutors are always telling their sons and their wards that they are to be just; [363] but why? not for the sake of justice, but for the sake of character and reputation; in the hope of obtaining for him who is reputed just some of those offices, marriages, and the like which Glaucon has enumerated among the advantages accruing to the unjust from the reputation of justice. More, however, is made of appearances by this class of persons than by the others; for they throw in the good opinion of the gods, and will tell you of a shower of benefits which the heavens, as they say, rain upon the pious; and this accords with the testimony of the noble Hesiod and Homer, the first of whom says, that the gods make the oaks of the just—

To bear acorns at their summit, and bees in the middle;
And the sheep are bowed down with the weight of their fleeces, and many other blessings of a like kind are provided for them. And Homer has a very similar strain; for he speaks of one whose fame is—

As the fame of some blameless king who, like a god,
Maintains justice; to whom the black earth brings forth
Wheat and barley, whose trees are bowed with fruit,
And his sheep never fail to bear, and the sea gives him fish.

Still grander are the gifts of heaven which Musaeus and his son[1] vouchsafe to the just; they take them down into the world below, where they have the saints lying on couches at a feast, everlastingly drunk, crowned with garlands; their idea seems to be that an immortality of drunkenness is the highest meed of virtue. Some extend their rewards yet further; the posterity, as they say, of the faithful and just shall survive to the third and fourth generation. This is the style in which they praise justice. But about the wicked there is another strain; they bury them in a slough in Hades, and make them carry water in a sieve; also while they are yet living they bring them to infamy, and inflict upon them the punishments which Glaucon described as the portion of the just who are reputed to be unjust; nothing else does their invention supply. Such is their manner of praising the one and censuring the other.

Once more, Socrates, I will ask you to consider another way of speaking about justice and injustice, which is not confined to the poets, [364] but is found in prose writers. The universal voice of mankind is always declaring that justice and virtue are honourable, but grievous and toilsome; and that the pleasures of vice and injustice are easy of attainment, and are only censured by law and opinion. They say also that honesty is for the most part less profitable than dishonesty; and they are quite ready to call wicked men happy, and to honour them both in public and private when they are rich or in any other way influential, while they despise and overlook those who may be weak and poor, even though acknowledging them to be better than the others. But most extraordinary of all is their mode of speaking about virtue and the gods: they say that the gods apportion calamity and misery to many good men, and good and happiness to the wicked. And mendicant prophets go to rich men s doors and persuade them that they have a power committed to them by the gods of making an atonement for a man s own or his ancestor s sins by sacrifices or charms with rejoicings and feasts and they promise to harm an enemy whether just or unjust at a small cost with magic arts and incantations binding heaven as they say to execute their will And the poets are the authorities to whom they appeal now smoothing the path of vice with the words of Hesiod

Vice may be had in abundance without trouble the way is smooth and her dwelling place is near But before virtue the gods have set toil and a tedious and uphill road then citing Homer as a witness that the gods may be influenced by men for he also says —

The gods too may be turned from their purpose and men pray to them and avert their wrath by sacrifices and soothing entreaties and by libations and the odour of fat when they have sinned and transgressed

And they produce a host of books written by Musaeus and Orpheus who were children of the Moon and the Muses—that is what they say—according to which they perform their ritual and persuade not only individuals but whole cities that expiations and atonements for sin may be made by sacrifices and amusements which fill a vacant hour and are equally at the service of the living and the dead [365] the latter sort they call mysteries and they redeem us from the pains of hell but if we neglect them no one knows what awaits us

He proceeded And now when the young hear all this said about virtue and vice and the way in which gods and men regard them how are their minds likely to be affected my dear Socrates—those of them I mean who are quick witted and like bees on the wing light on every flower and from all that they hear are prone to draw conclusions as to what manner of persons they should be and in what way they should walk if they would make the best of life? Probably the youth will say to himself in the words of Pindar—

Can I by justice or by crooked ways of deceit ascend a loftier tower which may be a fortress to me all my days?

For what men say is that if I am really just and am not also thought just profit there is none but the pain and loss on the other hand are unmistakeable But if though unjust I acquire the reputation of justice, a heavenly life is promised to me. Since then as philosophers prove, appearance tyrannizes over truth and is lord of happiness to appearance I must devote myself I will describe around me a picture and shadow of virtue to be the vestibule and exterior of my house behind I will trail the subtle and crafty fox, as Archilochus greatest of sages recommends But I hear some one exclaiming that the concealment of wickedness is often difficult to which I answer Nothing great is easy Nevertheless the argument indicates this if we would be happy to be the path along which we should proceed With a view to concealment we will establish secret brotherhoods and political clubs And there are professors of rhetoric who teach the art of persuading courts and assemblies and so partly by persuasion and partly by force, I shall make unlawful gains and not be punished Still I hear a voice saying that the gods cannot be deceived neither can they be compelled. But what if there are no gods? or suppose them to have no care of human things—why in either case should we mind about concealment? And even if there are gods and they do care about us yet we know of them only from tradition and the genealogies of the poets and these are the very persons who say that they may be influenced and turned by sacrifices and soothing entreaties and by offerings Let us be consistent then and believe both or neither If the poets speak truly [366] why then we had better be unjust and offer of the fruits of injustice for if we are just although we may escape the vengeance of heaven we shall lose the gains of injustice but if we are unjust we shall keep the gains and by our sinning and praying and praying and sinning the gods will be propitiated and we shall not be punished But there is a world below in which either we or our posterity will suffer for our unjust deeds Yes my friend will be the reflection but there are mysteries and atoning deities and these have great power That is what mighty cities declare and the children of the gods who were their poets and prophets bear a like testimony

On what principle then shall we any longer choose justice rather than the worst injustice? when if we only unite the latter with a deceitful regard to appearances we shall fare to our mind both with gods and men in life and after death as the most numerous and the highest authorities tell us Knowing all this Socrates, how can a man who has any superiority of mind or person or rank or wealth be willing to honour justice or indeed to refrain from laughing when he hears justice praised? And even if there should be some one who is able to disprove the truth of my words and who is satisfied that justice is best still he is not angry with the unjust, but is very ready to forgive them, because he also knows that men are not just of their own free will unless peradventure there be some one whom the divinity within him may have inspired with a hatred of injustice or who has attained knowledge of the truth—but no other man He only blames injustice who owing to cowardice or age or some weakness has not the power of being unjust. And this is proved by the fact that when he obtains the power he immediately becomes unjust as far as he can be

The cause of all this Socrates was indicated by us at the beginning of the argument, when my brother and I told you how astonished we were to find that of all the professing panegyrists of justice—beginning with the ancient heroes of whom any memorial has been preserved to us and ending with the men of our own time—no one has ever blamed injustice or praised justice except with a view to the glories, honours, and benefits which flow from them No one has ever adequately described either in verse or prose the true essential nature of either of them abiding in the soul and invisible to any human or divine eye or shown that of all the things of a man s soul which he has within him justice is the greatest good [367] and injustice the greatest evil Had this been the universal strain had you sought to persuade us of this from our youth upwards we should not have been on the watch to keep one another from doing wrong but every one would have been his own watchman because afraid if he did wrong, of harbouring in himself the greatest of evils I dare say that Thrasymachus and others would seriously hold the language which I have been merely repeating and words even stronger than these about justice and injustice grossly as I conceive, perverting their true nature But I speak in this vehement manner as I must frankly confess to you, because I want to hear from you the opposite side and I would ask you to show not only the superiority which justice has over injustice, but what effect they have on the possessor of them which makes the one to be a good and the other an evil to him And please, as Glaucon requested of you, to exclude reputations for unless you take away from each of them his true reputation and add on the false we shall say that you do not praise justice but the appearance of it we shall think that you are only exhorting us to keep injustice dark and that you really agree with Thrasymachus in thinking that justice is another s good and the interest of the stronger and that injustice is a man s own profit and interest though injurious to the weaker Now as you have admitted that justice is one of that highest class of goods which are desired indeed for their results but in a far greater degree for their own sakes—like sight or hearing or knowledge or health or any other real and natural and not merely conventional good—I would ask you in your praise of justice to regard one point only I mean the essential good and evil which justice and injustice work in the possessors of them Let others praise justice and censure injustice magnifying the rewards and honours of the one and abusing the other that is a manner of arguing which coming from them, I am ready to tolerate but from you who have spent your whole life in the consideration of this question unless I hear the contrary from your own lips, I expect something better And therefore I say not only prove to us that justice is better than injustice, but show what they either of them do to the possessor of them, which makes the one to be a good and the other an evil whether seen or unseen by gods and men

I had always admired the genius of Glaucon and Adeimantus but on hearing these words I was quite delighted and said Sons of an illustrious father [368] that was not a bad beginning of the Elegiac verses which the admirer of Glaucon made in honour of you after you had distinguished yourselves at the battle of Megara

S s f Aristo di e offspring of an illustrious hero

The epithet is very appropriate, for there is something truly divine in being able to argue as you have done for the superiority of injustice and remaining unconvinced by your own arguments And I do believe that you are not convinced—this I infer from your general character for had I judged only from your speeches I should have mistrusted you But now the greater my confidence in you, the greater is my difficulty in knowing what to say For I am in a strait between two on the one hand I feel that I am unequal to the task and my inability is brought home to me by the fact that you were not satisfied with the answer which I made to Thrasymachus, proving as I thought the superiority which justice has over injustice And yet I cannot refuse to help while breath and speech remain to me I am afraid that there would be an impiety in being present when justice is evil spoken of and not lifting up a hand in her defence And therefore I had best give such help as I can

Glaucon and the rest entreated me by all means not to let the question drop but to proceed in the investigation They wanted to arrive at the truth first, about the nature of justice and injustice and secondly about their relative advantages I told them what I really thought, that the enquiry would be of a serious nature and would require very good eyes Seeing then I said that we are no great wits I think that we had better adopt a method which I may illustrate thus suppose that a short sighted person had been asked by some one to read small letters from a distance and it occurred to some one else that they might be found in another place which was larger and in which the letters were larger—if they were the same and he could read the larger letters first and then proceed to the lesser—this would have been thought a rare piece of good fortune

Very true said Adeimantus but how does the illustration apply to our enquiry?

I will tell you I replied justice which is the subject of our enquiry is as you know sometimes spoken of as the virtue of an individual and sometimes as the virtue of a State

True he replied

And is not a State larger than an individual?

It is

Then in the larger the quantity of justice is likely to be larger and more easily discernible I propose therefore that we enquire into the nature of justice and injustice first as they appear in the State [369] and secondly in the individual proceeding from the greater to the lesser and comparing them

That he said is an excellent proposal

And if we imagine the State in process of creation we shall see the justice and injustice of the State in process of creation also

I dare say

When the State is completed there may be a hope that the object of our search will be more easily discovered

Yes far more easily

But ought we to attempt to construct one? I said for to do so as I am inclined to think will be a very serious task Reflect therefore

I have reflected said Adeimantus and am anxious that you should proceed

A State I said arises as I conceive, out of the needs of mankind no one is self sufficing but all of us have many wants Can any other origin of a State be imagined?

There can be no other

Then as we have many wants and many persons are needed to supply them one takes a helper for one purpose and another for another and when these partners and helpers are gathered together in one habitation the body of inhabitants is termed a State

True he said

And they exchange with one another and one gives and another receives under the idea that the exchange will be for their good

Very true

Then I said let us begin and create in idea a State and yet the true creator is necessity who is the mother of our invention

Of course he replied

Now the first and greatest of necessities is food which is the condition of life and existence

Certainly

The second is a dwelling and the third clothing and the like

True

And now let us see how our city will be able to supply this great demand We may suppose that one man is a husbandman another a builder some one else a weaver—shall we add to them a shoemaker or perhaps some other purveyor to our bodily wants?

Quite right

The barest notion of a State must include four or five men

Clearly

And how will they proceed? Will each bring the result of his labours into a common stock? —the individual husbandman for example producing for four and labouring four times as long and as much as he need in the provision of food with which he supplies others as well as himself or will he have nothing to do with others and not be at the trouble of producing for them but provide for himself alone a fourth of the food in a fourth of the time [370] and in the remaining three fourths of his time be employed in making a house or a coat or a pair of shoes having no partnership with others but supplying himself all his own wants?

Adeimantus thought that he should aim at producing food only and not at producing everything

Probably I replied that would be the better way and when I hear you say this I am myself reminded that we are not all alike there are diversities of natures among us which are adapted to different occupations.

Very true

And will you have a work better done when the workman has many occupations or when he has only one?

When he has only one

Further there can be no doubt that a work is spoilt when not done at the right time?

No doubt.

For business is not disposed to wait until the doer of the business is at leisure but the doer must follow up what he is doing and make the business his first object.

He must.

And if so we must infer that all things are produced more plentifully and easily and of a better quality when one man does one thing which is natural to him and does it at the right time, and leaves other things.

Undoubtedly

Then more than four citizens will be required for the husbandman will not make his own plough or mattock, or other implements of agriculture, if they are to be good for anything Neither will the builder make his tools—and he too needs many and in like manner the weaver and shoemaker

True.

Then carpenters and smiths, and many other artisans will be sharers in our little State, which is already beginning to grow?

True

Yet even if we add neatherds, shepherds and other herdsmen, in order that our husbandmen may have oxen to plough with and builders as well as husbandmen may have draught cattle, and curriers and weavers fleeces and hides—still our State will not be very large

That is true yet neither will it be a very small State which contains all these

Then, again there is the situation of the city—to find a place where nothing need be imported is wellnigh impossible.

Impossible

Then there must be another class of citizens who will bring the required supply from another city?

There must

[371] But if the trader goes empty handed, having nothing which they require who would supply his need, he will come back empty handed.

That is certain.

And therefore what they produce at home must be not only enough for themselves, but such both in quantity and quality as to accommodate those from whom their wants are supplied

Very true

Then more husbandmen and more artisans will be required?

They will

Not to mention the importers and exporters who are called merchants?

Yes

Then we shall want merchants?

We shall

And if merchandise is to be carried over the sea, skilful sailors will also be needed, and in considerable numbers?

Yes, in considerable numbers

Then again within the city how will they exchange their productions? To secure such an exchange was, as you will remember one of our principal objects when we formed them into a society and constituted a State.

Clearly they will buy and sell.

Then they will need a market place, and a money-token for purposes of exchange

Certainly

Suppose now that a husbandman, or an artisan, brings some production to market, and he comes at a time when there is no one to exchange with him—is he to leave his calling and sit idle in the market place?

Not at all he will find people there who seeing the want, undertake the office of salesmen In well-ordered states they are commonly those who are the weakest in bodily strength and therefore of little use for any other purpose their duty is to be in the market, and to give money in exchange for goods to those who desire to sell and to take money from those who desire to buy

This want, then creates a class of retail traders in our State Is not "retailer the term which is applied to those who sit in the market place engaged in buying and selling, while those who wander from one city to another are called merchants?

Yes he said

And there is another class of servants, who are intellectually hardly on the level of companionship still they have plenty of bodily strength for labour which accordingly they sell and are called if I do not mistake hirelings, hire being the name which is given to the price of their labour

True.

Then hirelings will help to make up our population?

Yes

And now Adeimantus, is our State matured and perfected?

I think so

Where then is justice and where is injustice and in what part of the State did they spring up?

[372] Probably in the dealings of these citizens with one another I cannot imagine that they are more likely to be found any where else

I dare say that you are right in your suggestion I said we had better think the matter out and not shrink from the enquiry

Let us then consider first of all, what will be their way of life now that we have thus established them Will they not produce corn and wine and clothes and shoes and build houses for themselves? And when they are housed, they will work in summer commonly stripped and barefoot but in winter substantially clothed and shod They will feed on barley meal and flour of wheat baking and kneading them making noble cakes and loaves these they will serve up on a mat of reeds or on clean leaves themselves reclining the while upon beds strewn with yew or myrtle And they and their children will feast drinking of the wine which they have made, wearing garlands on their heads and hymning the praises of the gods in happy converse with one another And they will take care that their families do not exceed their means having an eye to poverty or war

But said Glaucon interposing you have not given them a relish to their meal

True, I replied I had forgotten of course they must have a relish—salt and olives and cheese and they will boil roots and herbs such as country people prepare for a dessert we shall give them figs and peas and beans and they will roast myrtle berries and acorns at the fire drinking in moderation And with such a diet they may be expected to live in peace and health to a good old age and bequeath a similar life to their children after them

Yes Socrates he said and if you were providing for a city of pigs how else would you feed the beasts?

But what would you have Glaucon? I replied

Why, he said you should give them the ordinary conveniences of life People who are to be comfortable are accustomed to lie on sofas, and dine off tables and they should have sauces and sweets in the modern style

Yes I said now I understand the question which you would have me consider is not only how a State but how a luxurious State is created and possibly there is no harm in this, for in such a State we shall be more likely to see how justice and injustice originate In my opinion the true and healthy constitution of the State is the one which I have described But if you wish also to see a State at fever heat, I have no objection For I suspect that many will not be satisfied with the simpler way of life [373] They will be for adding sofas and tables and other furniture also dainties and perfumes, and incense and courtesans, and cakes, all these not of one sort only but in every variety we must go beyond the necessaries of which I was at first speaking such as houses and clothes and shoes the arts of the painter and the embroiderer will have to be set in motion, and gold and ivory and all sorts of materials must be procured

True he said

Then we must enlarge our borders for the original healthy State is no longer sufficient Now will the city have to fill and swell with a multitude of callings which are not required by any natural want such as the whole tribe of hunters and actors of whom one large class have to do with forms and colours another will be the votaries of music—poets and their attendant train of rhapsodists players dancers contractors also makers of divers kinds of articles including women s dresses And we shall want more servants Will not tutors be also in request and nurses wet and dry tirewomen and barbers as well as confectioners and cooks and swineherds, too who were not needed and therefore had no place in the former edition of our State but are needed now? They must not be forgotten and there will be animals of many other kinds if people eat them

Certainly

And living in this way we shall have much greater need of physicians than before?

Much greater

And the country which was enough to support the original inhabitants will be too small now and not enough?

Quite true

Then a slice of our neighbours land will be wanted by us for pasture and tillage and they will want a slice of ours if like ourselves they exceed the limit of necessity and give them selves up to the unlimited accumulation of wealth

That, Socrates, will be inevitable.

And so we shall go to war, Glaucon. Shall we not?

Most certainly, he replied.

Then, without determining as yet whether war does good or harm, thus much we may affirm, that now we have discovered war to be derived from causes which are also the causes of almost all the evils in States, private as well as public.

Undoubtedly

And our State must once more enlarge; and this time the enlargement will be nothing short of a whole army, [374] which will have to go out and fight with the invaders for all that we have, as well as for the things and persons whom we were describing above.

Why? he said; are they not capable of defending themselves?

No, I said; not if we were right in the principle which was acknowledged by all of us when we were framing the State: the principle, as you will remember, was that one man cannot practise many arts with success.

Very true, he said.

But is not war an art?

Certainly

And an art requiring as much attention as shoemaking?

Quite true.

And the shoemaker was not allowed by us to be husbandman, or a weaver, or a builder —in order that we might have our shoes well made; but to him and to every other worker was assigned one work for which he was by nature fitted, and at that he was to continue working all his life long and at no other; he was not to let opportunities slip, and then he would become a good workman. Now nothing can be more important than that the work of a soldier should be well done. But is war an art so easily acquired that a man may be a warrior who is also a husbandman, or shoemaker, or other artisan; although no one in the world would be a good dice or draught player who merely took up the game as a recreation, and had not from his earliest years devoted himself to this and nothing else? No tools will make a man a skilled workman, or master of defence, nor be of any use to him who has not learned how to handle them, and has never bestowed any attention upon them. How then will he who takes up a shield or other implement of war become a good fighter all in a day, whether with heavy-armed or any other kind of troops?

Yes, he said, the tools which would teach men their own use would be beyond price.

And the higher the duties of the guardian, I said, the more time, and skill, and art, and application will be needed by him?

No doubt, he replied.

Will he not also require natural aptitude for his calling?

Certainly

Then it will be our duty to select, if we can, natures which are fitted for the task of guarding the city?

It will.

And the selection will be no easy matter, I said; but we must be brave and do our best.

We must.

[375] Is not the noble youth very like a well-bred dog in respect of guarding and watching?

What do you mean?

I mean that both of them ought to be quick to see, and swift to overtake the enemy when they see him; and strong too if, when they have caught him, they have to fight with him.

All these qualities, he replied, will certainly be required by them.

Well, and your guardian must be brave if he is to fight well?

Certainly

And is he likely to be brave who has no spirit, whether horse or dog or any other animal? Have you never observed how invincible and unconquerable is spirit and how the presence of it makes the soul of any creature to be absolutely fearless and indomitable?

I have.

Then now we have a clear notion of the bodily qualities which are required in the guardian.

True.

And also of the mental ones; his soul is to be full of spirit.

Yes.

But are not these spirited natures apt to be savage with one another, and with everybody else?

A difficulty by no means easy to overcome, he replied.

Whereas, I said, they ought to be dangerous to their enemies, and gentle to their friends; if not, they will destroy themselves without waiting for their enemies to destroy them.

True, he said.

What is to be done then? I said; how shall we find a gentle nature which has also a great spirit for the one is the contradiction of the other?

True

He will not be a good guardian who is wanting in either of these two qualities and yet the combination of them appears to be impossible and hence we must infer that to be a good guardian is impossible

I am afraid that what you say is true he replied

Here feeling perplexed I began to think over what had preceded—My friend I said no wonder that we are in a perplexity for we have lost sight of the image which we had before us

What do you mean? he said

I mean to say that there do exist natures gifted with those opposite qualities

And where do you find them?

Many animals I replied furnish examples of them, our friend the dog is a very good one you know that well bred dogs are perfectly gentle to their familiars and acquaintances and the reverse to strangers

Yes I know

Then there is nothing impossible or out of the order of nature in our finding a guardian who has a similar combination of qualities?

Certainly not

Would not he who is fitted to be a guardian besides the spirited nature need to have the qualities of a philosopher?

I do not apprehend your meaning

[376] The trait of which I am speaking I replied may be also seen in the dog and is remarkable in the animal

What trait?

Why a dog whenever he sees a stranger is angry when an acquaintance he welcomes him although the one has never done him any harm nor the other any good Did this never strike you as curious?

The matter never struck me before but I quite recognise the truth of your remark

And surely this instinct of the dog is very charming—your dog is a true philosopher

Why?

Why because he distinguishes the face of a friend and of an enemy only by the criterion of knowing and not knowing And must not an animal be a lover of learning who determines what he likes and dislikes by the test of knowledge and ignorance?

Most assuredly

And is not the love of learning the love of wisdom, which is philosophy?

They are the same he replied

And may we not say confidently of man also that he who is likely to be gentle to his friends and acquaintances must by nature be a lover of wisdom and knowledge?

That we may safely affirm

Then he who is to be a really good and noble guardian of the State will require to unite in himself philosophy and spirit and swiftness and strength?

Undoubtedly

Then we have found the desired natures and now that we have found them how are they to be reared and educated? Is not this an enquiry which may be expected to throw light on the greater enquiry which is our final end—How do justice and injustice grow up in States? for we do not want either to omit what is to the point or to draw out the argument to an inconvenient length

Adeimantus thought that the enquiry would be of great service to us

Then I said my dear friend the task must not be given up even if somewhat long

Certainly not

Come then and let us pass a leisure hour in story telling and our story shall be the education of our heroes

By all means

And what shall be their education? Can we find a better than the traditional sort?—and this has two divisions gymnastic for the body and music for the soul

True

Shall we begin education with music and go on to gymnastic afterwards?

By all means

And when you speak of music do you include literature or not?

I do

And literature may be either true or false?

Yes

[377] And the young should be trained in both kinds and we begin with the false?

I do not understand your meaning he said

You know I said that we begin by telling children stories which though not wholly destitute of truth are in the main fictitious and these stories are told them when they are not of an age to learn gymnastics

Very true

That was my meaning when I said that we must teach music before gymnastics

Quite right he said

You know also that the beginning is the most important part of any work especially in the case of a young and tender thing for that is the time at which the character is being formed and the desired impression is more readily taken

Quite true.

And shal we just carelessly allow children to hear any casual tales which may be devised by casual persons, and to receive into their minds ideas for the most part the very opposite of those which we should wish them to have when they are grown up?

We cannot.

Then the first thing will be to establish a censorship of the writers of fiction, and let the censors receive any tale of fiction which is good, and reject the bad and we will desire mothers and nurses to tell their children the authorised ones only Let them fashion the mind with such tales, even more fondly than they mould the body with their hands but most of those which are now in use must be discarded.

Of what tales are you speaking? he said

You may find a model of the lesser in the greater I said for they are necessarily of the same type, and there is the same spirit in both of them.

Very likely he replied but I do not as yet know what you would term the greater

Those, I said, which are narrated by Homer and Hesiod, and the rest of the poets, who have ever been the great story-tellers of mankind

But which stories do you mean, he said and what fault do you find with them?

A fault which is most serious, I said the fault of telling a lie, and, what is more, a bad lie.

But when is this fault committed?

Whenever an erroneous representation is made of the nature of gods and heroes—as when a painter paints a portrait not having the shadow of a likeness to the original.

Yes, he said, that sort of thing is certainly very blameable but what are the stories which you mean?

First of all I said there was that greatest of all lies, in high places, which the poet told about Uranus, and which was a bad lie too [378]—I mean what Hesiod says that Uranus did, and how Cronus retaliated on him The doings of Cronus, and the sufferings which in turn his son inflicted upon him, even if they were true, ought certainly not to be lightly told to young and thoughtless persons if possible, they had better be buried in silence. But if there is an absolute necessity for their mention, a chosen few might hear them in a mystery and they should sacrifice not a common {Eleusinian} pig but some huge and unprocurable victim and then the number of the hearers will be very few indeed

Why yes, said he, those stories are extremely objectionable.

Yes, Adeimantus they are stories not to be repeated in our State the young man should not be told that in committing the worst of crimes he is far from doing anything outrageous and that even if he chastises his father when he does wrong in whatever manner he will only be following the example of the first and greatest among the gods

I entirely agree with you, he said in my opinion those stories are quite unfit to be repeated

Neither if we mean our future guardians to regard the habit of quarrelling among themselves as of all things the basest, should any word be said to them of the wars in heaven, and of the plots and fightings of the gods against one another for they are not true. No, we shall never mention the battles of the giants, or let them be embroidered on garments and we shall be silent about the innumerable other quarrels of gods and heroes with their friends and relatives. If they would only believe us we would tell them that quarrelling is unholy and that never up to this time has there been any quarrel between citizens this is what old men and old women should begin by telling children and when they grow up the poets also should be told to compose for them in a similar spirit But the narrative of Hephaestus binding Here his mother or how on another occasion Zeus sent him flying for taking her part when she was being beaten, and all the battles of the gods in Homer—these tales must not be admitted into our State, whether they are supposed to have an allegorical meaning or not. For a young person cannot judge what is allegorical and what is literal anything that he receives into his mind at that age is likely to be come indelible and unalterable and therefore it is most important that the tales which the young first hear should be models of virtuous thoughts

There you are right, he replied but if any one asks where are such models to be found and of what tales are you speaking—how shall we answer him?

[379] I said to him, You and I Adeimantus at this moment are not poets, but founders of a State now the founders of a State ought to know the general forms in which poets should cast their tales, and the limits which must be observed by them but to make the tales is not their business

Very true, he said but what are these forms of theology which you mean?

Something of this kind, I replied —God is always to be represented as he truly is what ever be the sort of poetry epic, lyric or tragic in which the representation is given

Right.

And is he not truly good? and must he not be represented as such?

Certainly

And no good thing is hurtful?

No indeed

And that which is not hurtful hurts not?

Certainly not

And that which hurts not does no evil?

No

And can that which does no evil be a cause of evil?

Impossible.

And the good is advantageous?

Yes

And therefore the cause of well being?

Yes

It follows therefore that the good is not the cause of all things but of the good only?

Assuredly

Then God if he be good is not the author of all things as the many assert but he is the cause of a few things only and not of most things that occur to men For few are the goods of human life and many are the evils and the good is to be attributed to God alone of the evils the causes are to be sought elsewhere and not in him

That appears to me to be most true he said

Then we must not listen to Homer or to any other poet who is guilty of the folly of saying that two casks

Lie at the threshold of Zeus full of lots one of good the other of evil lots

and that he to whom Zeus gives a mixture of the two

Sometimes meets with evil fortune at o her times with good

but that he to whom is given the cup of unmingled ill,

Him wild hunger drives o er the beauteous earth

And again—

Zeus who is the dispenser of good and evil to us

And if any one asserts that the violation of oaths and treaties which was really the work of Pandarus, was brought about by Athene and Zeus or that the strife and contention of the gods was instigated by Themis and Zeus, he shall not have our approval neither will we allow our young men to hear the words of Aeschylus that [380]

God plants guilt among men when he desires utterly to destroy a house

And if a poet writes of the sufferings of Niobe —the subject of the tragedy in which these iambic verses occur—or of the house of Pelops or of the Trojan War or on any similar theme, either we must not permit him to say that these are the works of God, or if they are of God he must devise some explanation of them such as we are seeking he must say that God did what was just and right, and they were the better for being punished but that those who are punished are miserable, and that God is the author of their misery—the poet is not to be permitted to say though he may say that the wicked are miserable because they require to be punished, and are benefited by receiving punishment from God but that God being good is the author of evil to any one is to be strenuously denied and not to be said or sung or heard in verse or prose by any one whether old or young in any well ordered commonwealth Such a fiction is suicidal ruinous impious

I agree with you he replied and am ready to give my assent to the law

Let this then be one of our rules and principles concerning the gods to which our poets and reciters will be expected to conform—that God is not the author of all things but of good only

That will do he said

And what do you think of a second principle? Shall I ask you whether God is a magician and of a nature to appear insidiously now in one shape and now in another—sometimes himself changing and passing into many forms, sometimes deceiving us with the semblance of such transformations or is he one and the same immutably fixed in his own proper image?

I cannot answer you he said without more thought

Well I said but if we suppose a change in anything that change must be effected either by the thing itself or by some other thing?

Most certainly

And things which are at their best are also least liable to be altered or discomposed for example, when healthiest and strongest, the human frame is least liable to be affected by meats and drinks, and the plant which is in the fullest vigour also suffers least from winds or the heat of the sun or any similar causes.

Of course.

[381] And will not the bravest and wisest soul be least confused or deranged by any external influence?

True.

And the same principle, as I should suppose, applies to all composite things—furniture houses, garments when good and well made, they are least altered by time and circumstances

Very true

Then everything which is good whether made by art or nature or both is least liable to suffer change from without?

True

But surely God and the things of God are in every way perfect?

Of course they are

Then he can hardly be compelled by external influence to take many shapes?

He cannot

But may he not change and transform himself?

Clearly he said that must be the case if he is changed at all

And will he then change himself for the better and fairer or for the worse and more unsightly?

If he change at all he can only change for the worse for we cannot suppose him to be deficient either in virtue or beauty

Very true, Adeimantus but then would any one, whether God or man, desire to make himself worse?

Impossible

Then it is impossible that God should ever be willing to change being as is supposed the fairest and best that is conceivable every God remains absolutely and for ever in his own form

That necessarily follows he said in my judgment

Then I said my dear friend let none of the poets tell us that

Th god tak g the d sguise of st gers f m other l ds walk p a d down cit s n all sorts of forms and let no one slander Proteus and Thetis neither let any one, either in tragedy or in any other kind of poetry introduce Here disguised in the likeness of a priestess asking an alms

For th lif g g d ghters f I chus the river of A g s

—let us have no more lies of that sort. Neither must we have mothers under the influence of the poets scaring their children with a bad version of these myths—telling how certain gods as they say Go about by night in the likeness of so many strangers and in divers forms but let them take heed lest they make cowards of their children and at the same time speak blasphemy against the gods

Heaven forbid he said

But although the gods are themselves unchangeable still by witchcraft and deception they may make us think that they appear in various forms?

Perhaps he replied

Well but can you imagine that God will be willing to lie whether in word or deed or to put forth a phantom of himself?

[382] I cannot say he replied

Do you not know I said that the true lie if such an expression may be allowed, is hated of gods and men?

What do you mean? he said

I mean that no one is willingly deceived in that which is the truest and highest part of himself or about the truest and highest matters there, above all he is most afraid of a lie having possession of him

Still he said I do not comprehend you

The reason is I replied that you attribute some profound meaning to my words but I am only saying that deception or being deceived or uninformed about the highest realities in the highest part of themselves which is the soul and in that part of them to have and to hold the lie is what mankind least like—that I say is what they utterly detest

There is nothing more hateful to them

And as I was just now remarking this ignorance in the soul of him who is deceived may be called the true lie for the lie in words is only a kind of imitation and shadowy image of a previous affection of the soul not pure unadulterated falsehood Am I not right?

Perfectly right

The true lie is hated not only by the gods but also by men?

Yes

Whereas the lie in words is in certain cases useful and not hateful in dealing with enemies—that would be an instance or again when those whom we call our friends in a fit of madness or illusion are going to do some harm then it is useful and is a sort of medicine or preventive also in the tales of mythology of which we were just now speaking—because

observed by them but to make the tales is not their business

Very true, he said but what are these forms of theology which you mean?

Something of this kind, I replied —God is always to be represented as he truly is what ever be the sort of poetry epic, lyric or tragic in which the representation is given

Right.

And is he not truly good? and must he not be represented as such?

Certainly

And no good thing is hurtful?

No, indeed

And that which is not hurtful hurts not?

Certainly not

And that which hurts not does no evil?

No

And can that which does no evil be a cause of evil?

Impossible.

And the good is advantageous?

Yes

And therefore the cause of well being?

Yes

It follows therefore that the good is not the cause of all things, but of the good only?

Assuredly

Then God if he be good is not the author of all things as the many assert but he is the cause of a few things only and not of most things that occur to men For few are the goods of human life and many are the evils and the good is to be attributed to God alone of the evils the causes are to be sought elsewhere and not in him

That appears to me to be most true he said

Then we must not listen to Homer or to any other poet who is guilty of the folly of saying that two casks

Lie at the threshold of Zeus full of lots one of good the other of evil lots

and that he to whom Zeus gives a mixture of the two

Sometimes meets with evil fortune at o her times with good

but that he to whom is given the cup of unmingled ill

Him wild hunger drives o er the beauteous earth

And again—

Zeus who is the dispenser of good and evil to us

And if any one asserts that the violation of oaths and treaties which was really the work of Pandarus, was brought about by Athene and Zeus or that the strife and contention of the gods was instigated by Themis and Zeus, he shall not have our approval, neither will we allow our young men to hear the words of Aeschylus, that [380]

God plants guilt among men when he desires utterly to destroy a house

And if a poet writes of the sufferings of Niobe —the subject of the tragedy in which these iambic verses occur—or of the house of Pelops or of the Trojan War or on any similar theme, either we must not permit him to say that these are the works of God or if they are of God he must devise some explanation of them such as we are seeking he must say that God did what was just and right and they were the better for being punished but that those who are punished are miserable, and that God is the author of their misery—the poet is not to be permitted to say though he may say that the wicked are miserable because they require to be punished and are benefited by receiving punishment from God but that God being good is the author of evil to any one is to be strenuously denied and not to be said or sung, or heard in verse or prose by any one whether old or young in any well ordered commonwealth Such a fiction is suicidal ruinous impious

I agree with you he replied and am ready to give my assent to the law

Let this then be one of our rules and principles concerning the gods to which our poets and reciters will be expected to conform—that God is not the author of all things but of good only

Shall I ask you whether God is a magician, and of a nature to appear insidiously now in one shape and now in another—sometimes him self changing and passing into many forms, sometimes deceiving us with the semblance of such transformations or is he one and the same immutably fixed in his own proper image?

I cannot answer you he said without mo e thought

Well I said but if we suppose a change in anything that change must be effected either by the thing itself or by some other thing?

Most certainly

And things whi h are at their best are also least liable to be altered or discomposed for example, when healthiest and strongest the human frame is least liable to be affected by

Again

The soul flying from the limbs had gone to Hades lamenting her fate leaving manhood and youth

Again

[387] And the soul with shrilling cry passed like smoke beneath the earth

And—

As bats in hollow of mystic cavern whenever any of them has dropped out of the string and falls from the rock fly shrilling and cling to one another so did they with shrilling cry hold together as they moved

And we must beg Homer and the other poets not to be angry if we strike out these and similar passages, not because they are unpoetical, or unattractive to the popular ear but because the greater the poetical charm of them, the less are they meet for the ears of boys and men who are meant to be free, and who should fear slavery more than death

Undoubtedly

Also we shall have to reject all the terrible and appalling names which describe the world below—Cocytus and Styx, ghosts under the earth, and sapless shades, and any similar words of which the very mention causes a shudder to pass through the inmost soul of him who hears them. I do not say that these horrible stories may not have a use of some kind but there is a danger that the nerves of our guardians may be rendered too excitable and effeminate by them

There is a real danger he said

Then we must have no more of them

True

Another and a nobler strain must be composed and sung by us

Clearly

And shall we proceed to get rid of the weepings and wailings of famous men?

They will go with the rest.

But shall we be right in getting rid of them? Reflect our principle is that the good man will not consider death terrible to any other good man who is his comrade

Yes that is our principle

And therefore he will not sorrow for his departed friend as though he had suffered anything terrible?

He will not

Such an one as we further maintain is sufficient for himself and his own happiness and therefore is least in need of other men

True he said

And for this reason the loss of a son or brother or the deprivation of fortune is to him of all men least terrible

Assuredly

And therefore he will be least likely to lament, and will bear with the greatest equanimity any misfortune of this sort which may befall him

Yes, he will feel such a misfortune far less than another

Then we shall be right in getting rid of the lamentations of famous men and making them over to women (and not even to women who are good for anything) [388] or to men of a baser sort that those who are being educated by us to be the defenders of their country may scorn to do the like

That will be very right.

Then we will once more entreat Homer and the other poets not to depict Achilles, who is the son of a goddess first lying on his side then on his back, and then on his face then starting up and sailing in a frenzy along the shores of the barren sea now taking the sooty ashes in both his hands and pouring them over his head, or weeping and wailing in the various modes which Homer has delineated Nor should he describe Priam the kinsman of the gods as praying and beseeching

Rolling in the dirt calling each man loudly by his name

Still more earnestly will we beg of him at all events not to introduce the gods lamenting and saying

Alas! my misery! Alas! that I bore the bravest to my sorrow

But if he must introduce the gods at any rate let him not dare so completely to misrepresent the greatest of the gods as to make him say—

O heavens! with my eyes verily I behold a dear friend of mine chased round and round the city and my heart is sorrowful

Or again

Woe is me that I am fated to have Sarpedon

we do not know the truth about ancient times we make falsehood as much like truth as we can and so turn it to account

Very true he said

But can any of these reasons apply to God? Can we suppose that he is ignorant of antiquity, and therefore has recourse to invention?

That would be ridiculous he said

Then the lying poet has no place in our idea of God?

I should say not

Or perhaps he may tell a lie because he is afraid of enemies?

That is inconceivable

But he may have friends who are senseless or mad?

But no mad or senseless person can be a friend of God

Then no motive can be imagined why God should lie?

None whatever

Then the superhuman and divine is absolutely incapable of falsehood?

Yes

Then is God perfectly simple and true both in word and deed he changes not he deceives not either by sign or word by dream or waking vision

[383] Your thoughts he said are the reflection of my own

You agree with me then I said that this is the second type or form in which we should write and speak about divine things The gods are not magicians who transform themselves neither do they deceive mankind in any way

I grant that

Then although we are admirers of Homer we do not admire the lying dream which Zeus sends to Agamemnon neither will we praise the verses of Aeschylus in which Thetis says that Apollo at her nuptials

Was celebrating in song her fair progeny whose days were to be long and to know no sickness And when he had spoken of my lot as in all things blessed of heaven he raised a note of triumph and cheered my soul And I thought that the word of Phoebus being divine and full of prophecy would not fail And now he himself who uttered the strain he who was present at the banquet and who said this—he it is who has slain my son

These are the kind of sentiments about the gods which will arouse our anger and he who utters them shall be refused a chorus neither shall we allow teachers to make use of them in the instruction of the young meaning as we do that our guardians as far as men can be should be true worshippers of the gods and lik them

I entirely agree he said in these principles and promise to make them my laws

BOOK III

[386] SUCH then I said are our principles of theology—some tales are to be told and others are not to be told to our disciples from their youth upwards if we mean them to honour the gods and their parents and to value friendship with one another

Yes and I think that our principles are right, he said

But if they are to be courageous must they not learn other lessons besides these and lessons of such a kind as will take away the fear of death? Can any man be courageous who has the fear of death in him?

Certainly not he said

And can he be fearless of death or will he choose death in battle rather than defeat and slavery who believes the world below to be real and terrible?

Impossible

Then we must assume a control over the narrators of this class of tales as well as over the others and beg them not simply to revile, but rather to commend the world below intimating to them that their descriptions are untrue, and will do harm to our future warriors

That will be our duty he said

Then I said we shall have to obliterate many obnoxious passages beginning with the verses,

I would rather be a serf on the land of a poor and portionless man than rule over all the dead who have come to nought

We must also expunge the verse which tells us how Pluto feared

Lest the mansions grim and squalid which the gods abhor should be seen both of mortals and immortals

And again

O heavens! verily in the house of Hades there is soul and ghostly form but no mind at all!

Again of Tiresias

[To him even after death did Persephone grant mind] that he alone should be wise but the other souls are flitting shades

And then, again, to make the wisest of men say that nothing in his opinion is more glorious than

When the tables are full of bread and meat, and the cup-bearer carries round wine which he draws from the bowl and pours into the cups is it fit or conducive to temperance for a young man to hear such words? Or the verse

The saddest of fates is to die and meet destiny from hunger

What would you say again to the tale of Zeus, who, while other gods and men were asleep and he the only person awake, lay devising plans, but forgot them all in a moment through his lust, and was so completely overcome at the sight of Here that he would not even go into the hut, but wanted to lie with her on the ground, declaring that he had never been in such a state of rapture before, even when they first met one another

Without the knowledge of their parents or that other tale of how Hephaestus, because of similar goings on, cast a chain around Ares and Aphrodite?

Indeed, he said, I am strongly of opinion that they ought not to hear that sort of thing

But any deeds of endurance which are done or told by famous men, these they ought to see and hear; as, for example, what is said in the verses,

He smote his breast, and thus reproached his heart,
Endure, my heart; far worse hast thou endured!

Certainly, he said

In the next place, we must not let them be receivers of gifts or lovers of money

Certainly not.

Neither must we sing to them of

Gifts persuading gods, and persuading reverend kings

Neither is Phoenix, the tutor of Achilles, to be approved or deemed to have given his pupil good counsel when he told him that he should take the gifts of the Greeks and assist them but that without a gift he should not lay aside his anger. Neither will we believe or acknowledge Achilles himself to have been such a lover of money that he took Agamemnon's gifts, or that when he had received payment he restored the dead body of Hector but that without payment he was unwilling to do so

[391] Undoubtedly, he said, these are not sentiments which can be approved

Loving Homer as I do, I hardly like to say that in attributing these feelings to Achilles, or in believing that they are truly attributed to him, he is guilty of downright impiety. As little can I believe the narrative of his insolence to Apollo, where he says,

Thou hast wronged me, O far-darter, most abominable of deities. Verily I would be even with thee, if I had only the power or his insubordination to the river-god, on whose divinity he is ready to lay hands; or his offering to the dead Patroclus of his own hair which had been previously dedicated to the other river god Spercheius, and that he actually performed this vow; or that he dragged Hector round the tomb of Patroclus, and slaughtered the captives at the pyre; of all this I cannot believe that he was guilty, any more than I can allow our citizens to believe that he, the wise Cheiron's pupil, the son of a goddess and of Peleus who was the gentlest of men and third in descent from Zeus, was so disordered in his wits as to be at one time the slave of two seemingly inconsistent passions, meanness, not untainted by avarice, combined with overweening contempt of gods and men.

You are quite right, he replied.

And let us equally refuse to believe, or allow to be repeated, the tale of Theseus son of Poseidon, or of Peirithous son of Zeus, going forth as they did to perpetrate a horrid rape; or of any other hero or son of a god daring to do such impious and dreadful things as they falsely ascribe to them in our day; and let us further compel the poets to declare either that these acts were not done by them, or that they were not the sons of gods—both in the same breath they shall not be permitted to affirm. We will not have them trying to persuade our youth that the gods are the authors of evil, and that heroes are no better than men—sentiments dearest of men to me subdued at the hands of Patroclus the son of Menoetius

For if my sweet Adeimantus our youth seriously listen to such unworthy representations of the gods instead of laughing at them as they ought hardly will any of them deem that he himself being but a man can be dishonoured by similar actions, neither will he rebuke any inclination which may arise in his mind to say and do the like And instead of having any shame or self control he will be always whining and lamenting on slight occasions

Yes he said that is most true

Yes I replied but that surely is what ought not to be as the argument has just proved to us and by that proof we must abide until it is disproved by a better

It ought not to be

Neither ought our guardians to be given to laughter For a fit of laughter which has been indulged to excess almost always produces a violent reaction

So I believe

Then persons of worth even if only mortal men must not be represented as overcome by laughter and still less must such a representation of the gods be allowed

[389] Still less of the gods as you say he replied

Then we shall not suffer such an expression to be used about the gods as that of Homer when he describes how

Inextinguishable laughter arose among the blessed gods when they saw Hephaestus bustling about the mansion

On your views, we must not admit them

On my views if you like to father them on me that we must not admit them is certain

Again truth should be highly valued if as we were saying a lie is useless to the gods and useful only as a medicine to men then the use of such medicines should be restricted to physicians private individuals have no business with them

Clearly not he said

Then if any one at all is to have the privilege of lying the rulers of the State should be the persons and they in their dealings either with enemies or with their own citizens may be allowed to lie for the public good But nobody else should meddle with anything of the kind and although the rulers have this privilege for a private man to lie to them in return is to be deemed a more heinous fault than for the patient or the pupil of a gymnasium not to speak the truth about his own bodily illnesses to the physician or to the trainer, or for a sailor not to tell the captain what is happening about the ship and the rest of the crew and how things are going with himself or his fellow sailors

Most true, he said

If then the ruler catches anybody beside himself lying in the State

Any of the craftsmen whether he be priest or physician or carpenter[a]

he will punish him for introducing a practice which is equally subversive and destructive of ship or State

Most certainly he said if our idea of the State is ever carried out

In the next place our youth must be temperate?

Certainly

Are not the chief elements of temperance, speaking generally obedience to commanders and self-control in sensual pleasures?

True

Then we shall approve such language as that of Diomede in Homer

Friend sit still and obey my word and the verses which follow

The Greeks marched breathing prowess[a] in silent awe of their leaders and other sentiments of the same kind

We shall

What of this line

O heavy with wine who hast the eyes of a dog and the heart of a stag and of the words which follow? [390] Would you say that these or any similar impertinences which private individuals are supposed to address to their rulers whether in verse or prose are well or ill spoken?

They are ill spoken

They may very possibly afford some amusement but they do not conduce to temperance And therefore they are likely to do harm to our young men—you would agree with me there?

Yes

Or if the poet everywhere appears and never conceals himself, then again the imitation is dropped, and his poetry becomes simple narration. However, in order that I may make my meaning quite clear, and that you may no more say, "I don't understand," I will show how the change might be effected. If Homer had said, "The priest came, having his daughter's ransom in his hands, supplicating the Achaeans, and above all the kings;" and then if, instead of speaking in the person of Chryses, he had continued in his own person, the words would have been, not imitation, but simple narration. The passage would have run as follows (I am no poet, and therefore I drop the metre): "The priest came and prayed the gods on behalf of the Greeks that they might capture Troy and return safely home, but begged that they would give him back his daughter, and take the ransom which he brought, and respect the God. Thus he spoke, and the other Greeks revered the priest and assented. But Agamemnon was wroth, and bade him depart and not come again, lest the staff and chaplets of the God should be of no avail to him—the daughter of Chryses should not be released, he said—she should grow old with him in Argos. And then he told him to go away and not to provoke him, if he intended to get home unscathed. [394] And the old man went away in fear and silence, and, when he had left the camp, he called upon Apollo by his many names, reminding him of everything which he had done pleasing to him, whether in building his temples, or in offering sacrifice, and praying that his good deeds might be returned to him, and that the Achaeans might expiate his tears by the arrows of the god,"—and so on. In this way the whole becomes simple narrative.

I understand, he said.

Or you may suppose the opposite case—that the intermediate passages are omitted, and the dialogue only left.

That also, he said, I understand; you mean, for example, as in tragedy.

You have conceived my meaning perfectly; and if I mistake not, what you failed to apprehend before is now made clear to you, that poetry and mythology are, in some cases, wholly imitative—instances of this are supplied by tragedy and comedy; there is likewise the opposite style, in which the poet is the only speaker—of this the dithyramb affords the best example; and the combination of both is found in epic, and in several other styles of poetry. Do I take you with me?

Yes, he said; I see now what you meant.

I will ask you to remember also what I began by saying, that we had done with the subject and might proceed to the style.

Yes, I remember.

In saying this, I intended to imply that we must come to an understanding about the mimetic art,—whether the poets, in narrating their stories, are to be allowed by us to imitate, and if so, whether in whole or in part, and if the latter, in what parts; or should all imitation be prohibited?

You mean, I suspect, to ask whether tragedy and comedy shall be admitted into our State?

Yes, I said; but there may be more than this in question: I really do not know as yet, but whither the argument may blow, thither we go.

And go we will, he said.

Then, Adeimantus, let me ask you whether our guardians ought to be imitators; or rather, has not this question been decided by the rule already laid down that one man can only do one thing well, and not many; and that if he attempt many, he will altogether fail of gaining much reputation in any?

Certainly.

And this is equally true of imitation; no one man can imitate many things as well as he would imitate a single one?

He cannot.

[395] Then the same person will hardly be able to play a serious part in life, and at the same time to be an imitator and imitate many other parts as well; for even when two species of imitation are nearly allied, the same persons cannot succeed in both, as, for example, the writers of tragedy and comedy—did you not just now call them imitations?

Yes, I did; and you are right in thinking that the same persons cannot succeed in both.

Any more than they can be rhapsodists and actors at once?

True.

Neither are comic and tragic actors the same; yet all these things are but imitations.

They are so.

And human nature, Adeimantus, appears to have been coined into yet smaller pieces, and to be as incapable of imitating many things well, as of performing well the actions of which the imitations are copies.

Quite true, he replied.

If then we adhere to our original notion and bear in mind that our guardians, setting aside every other business, are to dedicate themselves which as we were saying are neither pious nor true for we have already proved that evil cannot come from the gods

Assuredly not

And further they are likely to have a bad effect on those who hear them for everybody will begin to excuse his own vices when he is convinced that similar wickednesses are always being perpetrated by—

The kindred of the gods the relatives of Zeus whose ancestral altar the altar of Zeus is aloft in air on the peak of Ida and who have the blood of deities yet flowing in their veins

And therefore let us put an end to such tales lest they engender laxity of morals among the young [392]

By all means he replied

But now that we are determining what classes of subjects are or are not to be spoken of let us see whether any have been omitted by us The manner in which gods and demigods and heroes and the world below should be treated has been already laid down

Very true.

And what shall we say about men? That is clearly the remaining portion of our subject

Clearly so

But we are not in a condition to answer this question at present my friend

Why not?

Because if I am not mistaken we shall have to say that about men poets and story tellers are guilty of making the gravest misstatements when they tell us that wicked men are often happy and the good miserable and that injustice is profitable when undetected but that justice is a man s own loss and another s gain—these things we shall forbid them to utter and command them to sing and say the opposite

To be sure we shall he replied

But if you admit that I am right in this then I shall maintain that you have implied the principle for which we have been all along contending

I grant the truth of your inference

That such things are or are not to be said about men is a question which we cannot determine until we have discovered what justice is and how naturally advantageous to the possessor whether he seems to be just or not.

Most true he said

Enough of the subjects of poetry let us now speak of the style and when this has been considered both matter and manner will have been completely treated

I do not understand what you mean said Adeimantus

Then I must make you understand and perhaps I may be more intelligible if I put the matter in this way You are aware I suppose, that all mythology and poetry is a narration of events either past present or to come?

Certainly he replied

And narration may be either simple narration or imitation or a union of the two?

That again he said I do not quite understand

I fear that I must be a ridiculous teacher when I have so much difficulty in making myself apprehended Like a bad speaker therefore I will not take the whole of the subject, but will break a piece off in illustration of my meaning You know the first lines of the Iliad [393] in which the poet says that Chryses prayed Agamemnon to release his daughter and that Agamemnon flew into a passion with him whereupon Chryses failing of his object, invoked the anger of the God against the Achaeans Now as far as these lines

And he prayed all the Greeks but especially the two sons of Atreus the chiefs of the people the poet is speaking in his own person he never leads us to suppose that he is any one else But in what follows he takes the person of Chryses and then he does all that he can to make us believe that the speaker is not Homer but the aged priest himself And in this double form he has cast the entire narrative of the events which occurred at Troy and in Ithaca and throughout the Odyssey

Yes

And a narrative it remains both in the speeches which the poet recites from time to time and in the intermediate passages?

Quite true

But when the poet speaks in the person of another may we not say that he assimilates his style to that of the person who as he informs you is going to speak?

Certainly

And this assimilation of himself to another either by the use of voice or gesture is the imitation of the person whose character he assumes?

Of course

Then in this case the narrative of the poet may be said to proceed by way of imitation?

Very true

limits of a single harmony (for the changes are not great), and in like manner he will make use of nearly the same rhythm?

That is quite true, he said.

Whereas the other requires all sorts of harmonies and all sorts of rhythms, if the music and the style are to correspond, because the style has all sorts of changes.

That is also perfectly true, he replied.

And do not the two styles, or the mixture of the two, comprehend all poetry and every form of expression in words? No one can say anything except in one or other of them or in both together.

They include all, he said.

And shall we receive into our State all the three styles, or one only of the two unmixed styles? or would you include the mixed?

I should prefer only to admit the pure imitator of virtue.

Yes, I said, Adeimantus, but the mixed style is also very charming; and indeed the pantomimic, which is the opposite of the one chosen by you, is the most popular style with children and their attendants, and with the world in general.

I do not deny it.

But I suppose you would argue that such a style is unsuitable to our State, in which human nature is not twofold or manifold, for one man plays one part only?

Yes; quite unsuitable.

And this is the reason why in our State, and in our State only, we shall find a shoemaker to be a shoemaker and not a pilot also, and a husbandman to be a husbandman and not a dicast also, and a soldier a soldier and not a trader also, and the same throughout?

True, he said.

[398] And therefore when any one of these pantomimic gentlemen, who are so clever that they can imitate anything, comes to us, and makes a proposal to exhibit himself and his poetry, we will fall down and worship him as a sweet and holy and wonderful being; but we must also inform him that in our State such as he are not permitted to exist; the law will not allow them. And so when we have anointed him with myrrh, and set a garland of wool upon his head, we shall send him away to another city. For we mean to employ for our souls' health the rougher and severer poet or story-teller, who will imitate the style of the virtuous only, and will follow those models which we prescribed at first when we began the education of our soldiers.

We certainly will, he said, if we have the power.

Then now, my friend, I said, that part of music or literary education which relates to the story or myth may be considered to be finished; for the matter and manner have both been discussed.

I think so too, he said.

Next in order will follow melody and song.

That is obvious.

Every one can see already what we ought to say about them, if we are to be consistent with ourselves.

I fear, said Glaucon, laughing, that the word "every one" hardly includes me, for I cannot at the moment say what they should be; though I may guess.

At any rate you can tell that a song or ode has three parts—the words, the melody, and the rhythm; that degree of knowledge I may presuppose.

Yes, he said; so much as that you may.

And as for the words, there will surely be no difference between words which are and which are not set to music; both will conform to the same laws, and these have been already determined by us?

Yes.

And the melody and rhythm will depend upon the words.

Certainly.

We were saying, when we spoke of the subject-matter, that we had no need of lamentations and strains of sorrow?

True.

And which are the harmonies expressive of sorrow? You are musical, and can tell me.

The harmonies which you mean are the mixed or tenor Lydian, and the full-toned or bass Lydian, and such like.

These then, I said, must be banished; even to women who have a character to maintain they are of no use, and much less to men.

Certainly.

In the next place, drunkenness and softness and indolence are utterly unbecoming the character of our guardians.

Utterly unbecoming.

And which are the soft or drinking harmonies?

[399] The Ionian, he replied, and the Lydian; they are termed "relaxed."

Well, and are these of any military use?

Quite the reverse, he replied; and if so the Dorian and the Phrygian are the only ones which you have left.

wholly to the maintenance of freedom in the State making this their craft and engaging in no work which does not bear on this end they ought not to practise or imitate anything else if they imitate at all they should imitate from youth upward only those characters which are suitable to their profession—the courageous temperate holy free and the like but they should not depict or be skilful at imitating any kind of illiberality or baseness lest from imitation they should come to be what they imitate Did you never observe how imitations beginning in early youth and continuing far into life at length grow into habits and become a second nature affecting body voice and mind?

Yes certainly he said

Then I said we will not allow those for whom we profess a care and of whom we say that they ought to be good men to imitate a woman whether young or old quarrelling with her husband or striving and vaunting against the gods in conceit of her happiness or when she is in affliction or sorrow or weeping and certainly not one who is in sickness love or labour

Very right he said

Neither must they represent slaves male or female performing the offices of slaves?

They must not

And surely not bad men whether cowards or any others, who do the reverse of what we have just been prescribing who scold or mock or revile one another in drink or out of drink or who in any other manner sin against themselves and their neighbours in word or deed [396] as the manner of such is Neither should they be trained to imitate the action or speech of men or women who are mad or bad for madness like vice, is to be known but not to be practised or imitated

Very true he replied

Neither may they imitate smiths or other artificers or oarsmen or boatswains or the like?

How can they he said when they are not allowed to apply their minds to the callings of any of these?

Nor may they imitate the neighing of horses the bellowing of bulls the murmur of rivers and roll of the ocean thunder and all that sort of thing?

Nay he said if madness be forbidden neither may they copy the behaviour of madmen

You mean I said, if I understand you aright that there is one sort of narrative style which may be employed by a truly good man wh he has anything to say and that another s will be used by a man of an opposite charact and education

And which are these two sorts? he asked

Suppose I answered that a just and goo man in the course of a narration comes on so saying or action of another good man—should imagine that he will like to personat him and will not be ashamed of this sort o imitation he will be most ready to play th part of the good man when he is acting firml and wisely in a less degree when he is over taken by illness or love or drink or has met with any other disaster But when he comes to a character which is unworthy of him he will not make a study of that he will disdain such a person, and will assume his likeness if at all, for a moment only when he is performing some good action at other times he will be ashamed to play a part which he has never practised nor will he like to fashion and frame himself after the baser models he feels the employment of such an art unless in jest, to be beneath him, and his mind revolts at it

So I should expect he replied

Then he will adopt a mode of narration such as we have illustrated out of Homer that is to say his style will be both imitative and narrative but there will be very little of the former and a great deal of the latter Do you agree?

Certainly he said that is the model which such a speaker must necessarily take [397]

But there is another sort of character who will narrate anything and the worse he is the more unscrupulous he will be nothing will be too bad for him and he will be ready to imitate anything not as a joke but in right good earnest and before a large company As I was just now saying he will attempt to represent the roll of thunder the noise of wind and hail or the creaking of wheels and pulleys and the various sounds of flutes pipes trumpets and all sorts of instruments he will bark like a dog bleat like a sheep or crow like a cock his entire art will consist in imitation of voice and gesture and there will be very little narration

That he said will be his mode of speaking

These then are the two kinds of style?

Yes

And you would agree with me in saying that one of them is simple and has but slight changes and if the harmony and rhythm are also chosen for their simplicity the result is that the speaker if he speaks correctly is always pretty much the same in style, and he will keep within the

Just so, he said they should follow the words
And will not the words and the character of the style depend on the temper of the soul?
Yes.
And everything else on the style?
Yes.
Then beauty of style and harmony and grace and good rhythm depend on simplicity—I mean the true simplicity of a rightly and nobly ordered mind and character not that other simplicity which is only an euphemism for folly?
Very true, he replied
And if our youth are to do their work in life, must they not make these graces and harmonies their perpetual aim?
They must,
[401] And surely the art of the painter and every other creative and constructive art are full of them—weaving embroidery architecture, and every kind of manufacture also nature, animal and vegetable—in all of them there is grace or the absence of grace And ugliness and discord and inharmonious motion are nearly allied to ill words and ill nature, as grace and harmony are the twin sisters of goodness and virtue and bear their likeness
That is quite true, he said
But shall our superintendence go no further and are the poets only to be required by us to express the image of the good in their works on pain if they do anything else, of expulsion from our State? Or is the same control to be extended to other artists, and are they also to be prohibited from exhibiting the opposite forms of vice and intemperance and meanness and indecency in sculpture and building and the other creative arts and is he who cannot conform to this rule of ours to be prevented from practising his art in our State lest the taste of our citizens be corrupted by him? We would not have our guardians grow up amid images of moral deformity as in some noxious pasture, and there browse and feed upon many a baneful herb and flower day by day little by little, until they silently gather a festering mass of corruption in their own soul Let our artists rather be those who are gifted to discern the true nature of the beautiful and graceful then will our youth dwell in a land of health amid fair sights and sounds and receive the good in everything and beauty the effluence of fair works, shall flow into the eye and ear like a health giving breeze from a purer region and insensibly draw the soul from earliest years into likeness and sympathy with the beauty of reason.

There can be no nobler training than that he replied
And therefore, I said Glaucon musical training is a more potent instrument than any other because rhythm and harmony find their way into the inward places of the soul on which they mightily fasten imparting grace, and making the soul of him who is rightly educated graceful or of him who is ill-educated ungraceful and also because he who has received this true education of the inner being will most shrewdly perceive omissions or faults in art and nature, [402] and with a true taste while he praises and rejoices over and receives into his soul the good and becomes noble and good he will justly blame and hate the bad now in the days of his youth even before he is able to know the reason why and when reason comes he will recognise and salute the friend with whom his education has made him long familiar
Yes he said I quite agree with you in thinking that our youth should be trained in music and on the grounds which you mention
Just as in learning to read I said we were satisfied when we knew the letters of the alphabet, which are very few in all their recurring sizes and combinations not slighting them as unimportant whether they occupy a space large or small but everywhere eager to make them out and not thinking ourselves perfect in the art of reading until we recognise them wherever they are found
True—
Or as we recognise the reflection of letters in the water or in a mirror only when we know the letters themselves the same art and study giving us the knowledge of both
Exactly—
Even so as I maintain neither we nor our guardians whom we have to educate, can ever become musical until we and they know the essential forms, in all their combinations and can recognise them and their images wherever they are found, not slighting them either in small things or great but believing them all to be within the sphere of one art and study
Most assuredly
And when a beautiful soul harmonises with a beautiful form, and the two are cast in one mould that will be the fairest of sights to him who has an eye to see it?
The fairest indeed
And the fairest is also the loveliest?
That may be assumed

Cf. ii. 368

I answered Of the harmonies I know nothing but I want to have one warlike to sound the note or accent which a brave man utters in the hour of danger and stern resolve or when his cause is failing, and he is going to wounds or death or is overtaken by some other evil and at every such crisis meets the blows of fortune with firm step and a determination to endure and another to be used by him in times of peace and freedom of action when there is no pressure of necessity and he is seeking to persuade God by prayer or man by instruction and admonition or on the other hand when he is expressing his willingness to yield to persuasion or entreaty or admonition and which represents him when by prudent conduct he has attained his end not carried away by his success but acting moderately and wisely under the circumstances and acquiescing in the event These two harmonies I ask you to leave the strain of necessity and the strain of freedom the strain of the unfortunate and the strain of the fortunate the strain of courage and the strain of temperance these I say leave

And these he replied are the Dorian and Phrygian harmonies of which I was just now sp aking

Then I said if these and these only are to be used in our songs and melodies we shall not want multiplicity of notes or a panharmonic scale?

I suppose not

Then we shall not maintain the artificers of lyres with three corners and complex scales or the makers of any other many stringed curiously harmonised instruments?

Certainly not

But what do you say to flute makers and flute players? Would you admit them into our State when you reflect that in this composite use of harmony the flute is worse than all the stringed instruments put together even the panharmonic music is only an imitation of the flute?

Clearly not

There remain then only the lyre and the harp for use in the city and the shepherds may have a pipe in the country

That is surely the conclusion to be drawn from the argument

The preferring of Apollo and his instruments to Marsyas and his instruments is not at all strange I said

Not at all he replied

And so, by the dog of Egypt we have been unconsciously purging the State which not long ago we termed luxurious

And we have done wisely he replied

Then let us now finish the purgation I said Next in order to harmonies rhythms will naturally follow, and they should be subject to the same rules for we ought not to seek out complex systems of metre or metres of every kind but rather to discover what rhythms are the expressions of a courageous and harmonious life [400] and when we have found them, we shall adapt the foot and the melody to words having a like spirit not the words to the foot and melody To say what these rhythms are will be your duty—you must teach me them, as you have already taught me the harmonies.

But indeed, he replied I cannot tell you I only know that there are some three principles of rhythm out of which metrical systems are framed just as in sounds there are four notes out of which all the harmonies are composed that is an observation which I have made But of what sort of lives they are severally the imitations I am unable to say

Then I said we must take Damon into our counsels and he will tell us what rhythms are expressive of meanness or insolence or fury or other unworthiness and what are to be reserved for the expression of opposite feelings And I think that I have an indistinct recollection of his mentioning a complex Cretic rhythm also a dactylic or heroic and he arranged them in some manner which I do not quite understand making the rhythms equal in the rise and fall of the foot long and short alternating and unless I am mistaken he spoke of an iambic as well as of a trochaic rhythm and assigned to them short and long quantities Also in some cases he appeared to praise or censure the movement of the foot quite as much as the rhythm or perhaps a combination of the two for I am not certain what he meant These matters however as I was saying had better be referred to Damon himself for the analysis of the subject would be difficult you know?

Rather so I should say

But there is no difficulty in seeing that grace or the absence of grace is an effect of good or bad rhythm

None at all

And also that good and bad rhythm naturally assimilate to a good and bad style and that harmony and discord in like manner follow style for our principle is that rhythm and harmony are regulated by the words and not the words by them

The four notes of the tetrachord.

when they are campaigning on soldiers' fare they have no fish although they are on the shores of the Hellespont, and they are not allowed boiled meats but only roast, which is the food most convenient for soldiers, requiring only that they should light a fire and not involving the trouble of carrying about pots and pans.

True.

And I can hardly be mistaken in saying that sweet sauces are nowhere mentioned in Homer In proscribing them, however he is not singular all professional athletes are well aware that a man who is to be in good condition should take nothing of the kind.

Yes, he said and knowing this, they are quite right in not taking them.

Then you would not approve of Syracusan dinners, and the refinements of Sicilian cookery?

I think not.

Nor if a man is to be in condition would you allow him to have a Corinthian girl as his fair friend?

Certainly not.

Neither would you approve of the delicacies, as they are thought, of Athenian confectionary?

Certainly not.

All such feeding and living may be rightly compared by us to melody and song composed in the panharmonic style, and in all the rhythms.

Exactly

There complexity engendered licence, and here disease whereas simplicity in music was the parent of temperance in the soul and simplicity in gymnastic of health in the body

Most true, he said.

[405] But when intemperance and disease multiply in a State, halls of justice and medicine are always being opened and the arts of the doctor and the lawyer give themselves airs, finding how keen is the interest which not only the slaves but the freemen of a city take about them

Of course.

And yet what greater proof can there be of a bad and disgraceful state of education than this, that not only artisans and the meaner sort of people need the skill of first rate physicians and judges but also those who would profess to have had a liberal education? Is it not disgraceful, and a great sign of want of good breeding that a man should have to go abroad for his law and physic because he has none of his own at home, and must therefore surrender himself into the hands of other men whom he makes lords and judges over him?

Of all things, he said, the most disgraceful

Would you say "most," I replied when you consider that there is a further stage of the evil in which a man is not only a life-long litigant, passing all his days in the courts, either as plaintiff or defendant, but is actually led by his bad taste to pride himself on his litigiousness he imagines that he is a master in dishonesty able to take every crooked turn, and wriggle into and out of every hole, bending like a withy and getting out of the way of justice and all for what?—in order to gain small points not worth mentioning he not knowing that so to order his life as to be able to do without a napping judge is a far higher and nobler sort of thing Is not that still more disgraceful?

Yes, he said that is still more disgraceful

Well I said and to require the help of medicine not when a wound has to be cured, or on occasion of an epidemic, but just because by indolence and a habit of life such as we have been describing men fill themselves with waters and winds, as if their bodies were a marsh, compelling the ingenious sons of Asclepius to find more names for diseases, such as flatulence and catarrh is not this, too a disgrace?

Yes, he said, they do certainly give very strange and newfangled names to diseases.

Yes, I said, and I do not believe that there were any such diseases in the days of Asclepius and this I infer from the circumstance that the hero Eurypylus, after he has been wounded in Homer [406] drinks a posset of Pramnian wine well besprinkled with barley meal and grated cheese, which are certainly inflammatory and yet the sons of Asclepius who were at the Trojan War do not blame the damsel who gives him the drink, or rebuke Patroclus, who is treating his case.

Well, he said that was surely an extraordinary drink to be given to a person in his condition

Not so extraordinary I replied, if you bear in mind that in former days, as is commonly said, before the time of Herodicus, the guild of Asclepius did not practise our present system of medicine, which may be said to educate diseases. But Herodicus being a trainer and himself of a sickly constitution by a combination of training and doctoring found out a way of torturing first and chiefly himself and secondly the rest of the world

How was that? he said

By the invention of lingering death for he

And the man who has the spirit of harmony will be most in love with the loveliest but he will not love him who is of an inharmonious soul?

That is true he replied if the deficiency be in his soul but if there be any merely bodily defect in another he will be patient of it and will love all the same

I perceive, I said that you have or have had experiences of this sort and I agree But let me ask you another question Has excess of pleasure any affinity to temperance?

How can that be? he replied pleasure deprives a man of the use of his faculties quite as much as pain

Or any affinity to virtue in general?

[403] None whatever

Any affinity to wantonness and intemperance?

Yes the greatest

And is there any greater or keener pleasure than that of sensual love?

No nor a madder

Whereas true love is a love of beauty and order—temperate and harmonious?

Quite true he said

Then no intemperance or madness should be allowed to approach true love?

Certainly not

Then mad or intemperate pleasure must never be allowed to come near the lover and his beloved neither of them can have any part in it if their love is of the right sort?

No indeed Socrates it must never come near them

Then I suppose that in the city which we are founding you would make a law to the effect that a friend should use no other familiarity to his love than a father would use to his son and then only for a noble purpose and he must first have the other s consent and this rule is to limit him in all his intercourse and he is never to be seen going further or if he exceeds he is to be deemed guilty of coarseness and bad taste

I quite agree, he said

Thus much of music which makes a fair ending for what should be the end of music if not the love of beauty?

I agree he said

After music comes gymnastic in which our youth are next to be trained

Certainly

Gymnastic as well as music should begin in early years the training in it should be careful and should continue through life Now my belief is—and this is a matter upon which I should like to have your opinion in confirmation of my own but my own belief is—not that the good body by any bodily excellence improves the soul but on the contrary that the good soul by her own excellence improves the body as far as this may be possible. What do you say?

Yes I agree

Then to the mind when adequately trained, we shall be right in handing over the more particular care of the body and in order to avoid prolixity we will now only give the general outlines of the subject

Very good

That they must abstain from intoxication has been already remarked by us for of all persons a guardian should be the last to get drunk and not know where in the world he is

Yes he said that a guardian should require another guardian to take care of him is ridiculous indeed

But next what shall we say of their food for the men are in training for the great contest of all—are they not?

Yes he said

[404] And will the habit of body of our ordinary athletes be suited to them?

Why not?

I am afraid I said that a habit of body such as they have is but a sleepy sort of thing and rather perilous to health Do you not observe that these athletes sleep away their lives and are liable to most dangerous illnesses if they depart in ever so slight a degree from their customary regimen?

Yes, I do

Then I said a finer sort of training will be required for our warrior athletes who are to be like wakeful dogs and to see and hear with the utmost keenness amid the many changes of water and also of food of summer heat and winter cold which they will have to endure when on a campaign they must not be liable to break down in health

That is my view

The really excellent gymnastic is twin sister of that simple music which we were just now describing

How so?

Why I conceive that there is a gymnastic which like our music is simple and good and especially the military gymnastic

What do you mean?

My meaning may be learned from Homer he you know feeds his heroes at their feasts was afterwards to eat or drink in the case of Menelaus, any more than in the case of Eurypylus; the remedies, as they conceived, were enough to heal any man who before he was wounded was healthy and regular in his habits; and even though he did happen to drink a posset of Pramnian wine, he might get well all the same. But they would have nothing to do with unhealthy and intemperate subjects, whose lives were of no use either to themselves or others; the art of medicine was not designed for their good, and though they were as rich as Midas, the sons of Asclepius would have declined to attend them.

They were very acute persons, those sons of Asclepius.

Naturally so, I replied. Nevertheless, the tragedians and Pindar disobeying our behests, although they acknowledge that Asclepius was the son of Apollo, say also that he was bribed into healing a rich man who was at the point of death, and for this reason he was struck by lightning. But we, in accordance with the principle already affirmed by us, will not believe them when they tell us both;—if he was the son of a god, we maintain that he was not avaricious; or, if he was avaricious, he was not the son of a god.

All that, Socrates, is excellent; but I should like to put a question to you: Ought there not to be good physicians in a State, and are not the best those who have treated the greatest number of constitutions good and bad? and are not the best judges in like manner those who are acquainted with all sorts of moral natures?

Yes, I said, I too would have good judges and good physicians. But do you know whom I think good?

Will you tell me?

I will, if I can. Let me however note that in the same question you join two things which are not the same.

How so? he asked.

Why, I said, you join physicians and judges. Now the most skilful physicians are those who, from their youth upwards, have combined with the knowledge of their art the greatest experience of disease; they had better not be robust in health, and should have had all manner of diseases in their own persons. For the body, as I conceive, is not the instrument with which they cure the body; in that case we could not allow them ever to be or to have been sickly; but they cure the body with the mind, and the mind which has become and is sick can cure nothing.

That is very true, he said.

[409] But with the judge it is otherwise; since he governs mind by mind; he ought not therefore to have been trained among vicious minds, and to have associated with them from youth upwards, and to have gone through the whole calendar of crime, only in order that he may quickly infer the crimes of others as he might their bodily diseases from his own self-consciousness; the honourable mind which is to form a healthy judgment should have had no experience or contamination of evil habits when young. And this is the reason why in youth good men often appear to be simple, and are easily practised upon by the dishonest, because they have no examples of what evil is in their own souls.

Yes, he said, they are far too apt to be deceived.

Therefore, I said, the judge should not be young; he should have learned to know evil, not from his own soul, but from late and long observation of the nature of evil in others: knowledge should be his guide, not personal experience.

Yes, he said, that is the ideal of a judge.

Yes, I replied, and he will be a good man (which is my answer to your question); for he is good who has a good soul. But the cunning and suspicious nature of which we spoke,—he who has committed many crimes, and fancies himself to be a master in wickedness, when he is amongst his fellows, is wonderful in the precautions which he takes, because he judges of them by himself: but when he gets into the company of men of virtue, who have the experience of age, he appears to be a fool again, owing to his unseasonable suspicions; he cannot recognise an honest man, because he has no pattern of honesty in himself; at the same time, as the bad are more numerous than the good, and he meets with them oftener, he thinks himself, and is by others thought to be rather wise than foolish.

Most true, he said.

Then the good and wise judge whom we are seeking, is not this man, but the other; for vice cannot know virtue too, but a virtuous nature, educated by time, will acquire a knowledge both of virtue and vice: the virtuous, and not the vicious man has wisdom—in my opinion.

And in mine also.

This is the sort of medicine, and this is the sort of law, which you will sanction in your state. [410] They will minister to better natures, giving health both of soul and of body;

had a mortal disease which he perpetually tended and as recovery was out of the question he passed his entire life as a valetudinarian he could do nothing but attend upon himself and he was in constant torment whenever he departed in anything from his usual regimen and so dying hard by the help of science he struggled on to old age

A rare reward of his skill!

Yes I said a reward which a man might fairly expect who never understood that, if Asclepius did not instruct his descendants in valetudinarian arts the omission arose not from ignorance or inexperience of such a branch of medicine but because he knew that in all well-ordered states every individual has an occupation to which he must attend and has therefore no leisure to spend in continually being ill This we remark in the case of the artisan but ludicrously enough do not apply the same rule to people of the richer sort

How do you mean? he said

I mean this When a carpenter is ill he asks the physician for a rough and ready cure an emetic or a purge or a cautery or the knife—these are his remedies And if some one prescribes for him a course of dietetics and tells him that he must swathe and swaddle his head and all that sort of thing he replies at once that he has no time to be ill and that he sees no good in a life which is spent in nursing his disease to the neglect of his customary employment and therefore bidding good bye to this sort of physician he resumes his ordinary habits and either gets well and lives and does his business or if his constitution fails he dies and has no more trouble

Yes he said and a man in his condition of life ought to use the art of medicine thus far only

[407] Has he not I said an occupation and what profit would there be in his life if he were deprived of his occupation?

Quite true he said

But with the rich man this is otherwise of him we do not say that he has any specially appointed work which he must perform if he would live

He is generally supposed to have nothing to do

Then you never heard of the saying of Phocylides that as soon as a man has a livelihood he should practise virtue?

Nay he said I think that he had better begin somewhat sooner

Let us not have a dispute with him about this I said but rather ask ourselves Is the practice of virtue obligatory on the rich man, or can he live without it? And if obligatory on him, then let us raise a further question, whether this dieting of disorders which is an impediment to the application of the mind in carpentering and the mechanical arts does not equally stand in the way of the sentiment of Phocylides?

Of that he replied there can be no doubt such excessive care of the body when carried beyond the rules of gymnastic is most inimical to the practice of virtue

Yes indeed I replied and equally incompatible with the management of a house, an army or an office of state and what is most important of all irreconcileable with any kind of study or thought or self reflection—there is a constant suspicion that headache and giddiness are to be ascribed to philosophy and hence all practising or making trial of virtue in the higher sense is absolutely stopped for a man is always fancying that he is being made ill and is in constant anxiety about the state of his body

Yes likely enough

And therefore our politic Asclepius may be supposed to have exhibited the power of his art only to persons who being generally of healthy constitution and habits of life had a definite ailment such as these he cured by purges and operations and bade them live as usual herein consulting the interests of the State but bodies which disease had penetrated through and through he would not have attempted to cure by gradual processes of evacuation and infusion he did not want to lengthen out good for nothing lives or to have weak fathers begetting weaker sons—if a man was not able to live in the ordinary way he had no business to cure him for such a cure would have been of no use either to himself or to the State

Then he said you regard Asclepius as a statesman

Clearly and his character is further illustrated by his sons Note that they were heroes in the days of old and practised the medicines [408] of which I am speaking at the siege of Troy You will remember how when Pandarus wounded Menelaus they

Sucked the blood out of the wound and sprinkled soothing remedies

but they never prescribed what the patient

Iliad iv 218

was afterwards to eat or drink in the case of Menelaus, any more than in the case of Eurypylus the remedies as they conceived, were enough to heal any man who before he was wounded was healthy and regular in his habits and even thou h he did happen to drink a posset of Pramnian wine, he might get well all the same. But they would have nothing to do with unhealthy and intemperate subjects, whose lives were of no use either to themselves or others the art of medicine was not designed for their good, and though they were as rich as M das, the sons of Asclepius would have declined to attend them.

They were very acute persons, those sons of Asclepius.

Naturally so, I replied. Nevertheless the tragedians and Pindar disobeying our behests, although they acknowledge that Asclep us was the son of Apollo, say also that he was bribed into healing a rich man who was at the point of death, and for this reason he was struck by l ghtning But we, in accordance with the principle already affirmed by us, will not believe them when they tell us both—if he was the son of a god, we maintain that he was not avaricious or if he was a aricious, he was not the son of a god

All that, Socrates, is excellent but I should like to put a question to you Ought there not to be good physicians in a State, and are not the best those who have treated the greatest number of constitutions good and bad? and are not the best judges in like manner those who are acquainted with all sorts of moral natures?

Yes, I said, I too would have good judges and good physicians But do you know whom I think good?

Will you tell me?

I will, if I can Let me however note that in th same question you join t o things which are not the same.

How so? he asked

Why I said you join physicians and judges. Now the most skilful physicians are those who, from their youth upwards, have combined w th the knowled e of their art the greatest experience of disease they had better not be robust in health, and should ha e had all manner of diseases in their wn persons. For the body as I conce e is not the instrum nt with which they cure the body in that case we could not allow them ever to be or to have been sickly but they cure the body with the mind, and the mind which has become and is sick can cure nothing.

That is very true he said.

[409] But with the judge it is otherwise since he governs mind by mind he ought not therefore to have been trained among vicious minds, and to have associated with them from youth upwards and to have gone through the whole calendar of crime, only in order that he may quickly infer the crimes of others as he might their bodily diseases from his own self consciousness the honourable mind which is to form a healthy judgment should have had no experience or contamination of evil habits when young And this is the reason why in youth good men often appear to be simple, and are easily practised upon by the dishonest, because they have no examples of what evil is in their own souls

Yes, he said, they are far too apt to be deceived

Therefore, I said, the judge should not be young he should have learned to know evil not from his own soul but from late and long observation of the nature of evil in others knowledge should be his guide not personal experience

Yes, he said, that is the ideal of a judge.

Yes, I replied and he will be a good man (which is my answer to your question) for he is good who has a good soul But the cunning and suspicious nature of which we spoke —he who has committed many crimes, and fancies himself to be a master in wickedness, when he is amongst his fellows, is wonderful in the precautions which he takes, because he judges of them by himself but when he gets into the company of men of virtu, who have the experience of age, he appears to be a fool again, owing to his unseasonable suspicions he cannot recognise an honest man because he has no pattern of honesty in himself at the same time, as the bad are more numerous than the good, and he meets with them oftener he thinks himself and is by others thought to be rather wise than foolish

Most true, he sa d

Then the good and wise judge whom we are seeking, is not this man, but the other for vice cannot know virtue too but a virtuous nature, educated by time, will acquire a knowledge both of virtue and vice the virtuous, and not the vicious man has wisdom—in my opinion

And in mine also

This is the sort of medicine, and this is the sort of law which you will sanction in your state. [410] They will minister to better natures, g ving health both of soul and of body

but those who are diseased in their bodies they will leave to die and the corrupt and incurable souls they will put an end to themselves

That is clearly the best thing both for the patients and for the State

And thus our youth having been educated only in that simple music which as we said inspires temperance will be reluctant to go to law

Clearly

And the musician who keeping to the same track is content to practise the simple gymnastic will have nothing to do with medicine unless in some extreme case

That I quite believe

The very exercises and toils which he undergoes are intended to stimulate the spirited element of his nature and not to increase his strength he will not like common athletes use exercise and regimen to develop his muscles

Very right, he said

Neither are the two arts of music and gymnastic really designed as is often supposed the one for the training of the soul the other for the training of the body

What then is the real object of them?

I believe I said that the teachers of both have in view chiefly the improvement of the soul

How can that be? he asked

Did you never observe I said the effect on the mind itself of exclusive devotion to gymnastic or the opposite effect of an exclusive devotion to music?

In what way shown? he said

The one producing a temper of hardness and ferocity the other of softness and effeminacy I replied

Yes he said I am quite aware that the mere athlete becomes too much of a savage and that the mere musician is melted and softened beyond what is good for him

Yet surely I said this ferocity only comes from spirit, which if rightly educated would give courage but if too much intensified is liable to become hard and brutal

That I quite think

On the other hand the philosopher will have the quality of gentleness And this also when too much indulged will turn to softness but if educated rightly will be gentle and moderate

True

And in our opinion the guardians ought to have both these qualities?

Assuredly

And both should be in harmony?

Beyond question

[411] And the harmonious soul is both temperate and courageous?

Yes

And the inharmonious is cowardly and boorish?

Very true

And when a man allows music to play upon him and to pour into his soul through the funnel of his ears those sweet and soft and melancholy airs of which we were just now speaking and his whole life is passed in warbling and the delights of song in the first stage of the process the passion or spirit which is in him is tempered like iron and made useful instead of brittle and useless But if he carries on the softening and soothing process in the next stage he begins to melt and waste until he has wasted away his spirit and cut out the sinews of his soul and he becomes a feeble warrior

Very true

If the element of spirit is naturally weak in him the change is speedily accomplished but if he have a good deal then the power of music weakening the spirit renders him excitable—on the least provocation he flames up at once, and is speedily extinguished instead of having spirit he grows irritable and passionate and is quite impracticable

Exactly

And so in gymnastics if a man takes violent exercise and is a great feeder and the reverse of a great student of music and philosophy at first the high condition of his body fills him with pride and spirit and he becomes twice the man that he was

Certainly

And what happens? if he do nothing else, and holds no converse with the Muses does not even that intelligence which there may be in him having no taste of any sort of learning or enquiry or thought or culture grow feeble and dull and blind his mind never waking up or receiving nourishment and his senses not being purged of their mists?

True he said

And he ends by becoming a hater of philosophy uncivilized never using the weapon of persuasion—he is like a wild beast all violence and fierceness and knows no other way of dealing and he lives in all ignorance and evil conditions and has no sense of propriety and grace

That is quite true he said

And as there are two principles of human na ture, one the spirited and the other the phil osophical, some God as I should say has given mankind two arts answering to them (and only indirectly to the soul and body) [412] in order that these two principles (like the strings of an instrument) may be relaxed or drawn tighter until they are duly harmonized

That appears to be the intention

And he who mingles music with gymnastic in the fairest proportions and best attempers them to the soul may be rightly called the true musician and harmonist in a far higher sense than the tuner of the strings

You are quite right, Socrates

And such a presiding genius will be always required in our State if the government is to last.

Yes, he will be absolutely necessary

Such, then, are our principles of nurture and education Where would be the use of going into further details about the dances of our citizens, or about their hunting and coursing their gymnastic and equestrian contests? For these all follow the general principle, and hav ing found that, we shall have no difficulty in discovering them

I dare say that there will be no difficulty

Very good I said then what is the next question? Must we not ask who are to be rulers and who subjects?

Certainly

There can be no doubt that the elder must rule the younger

Clearly

And that the best of these must rule.

That is also clear

Now are not the best husbandmen those who are most devoted to husbandry?

Yes.

And as we are to have the best of guardians for our city must they not be those who have most the character of guardians?

Yes.

And to this end they ought to be wise and efficient, and to have a special care of the State?

True.

And a man will be most likely to care about that which he loves?

To be sure

And he will be most likely to love that which he regards as having the same interests with himself, and that of which the good or evil for tune is supposed by him at any time most to affect his own?

Very true, he replied.

Then there must be a selection. Let us note among the guardians those who in their whole life show the greatest eagerness to do what is for the good of their country and the greatest repugnance to do what is against her interests.

Those are the right men.

And they will have to be watched at every age in order that we may see whether they preserve their resolution, and never under the influence either of force or enchantment, for get or cast off their sense of duty to the State.

How cast off? he said

I will explain to you, I replied A resolution may go out of a man s mind either with his will or against his will [413] with his will when he gets rid of a falsehood and learns better against his will whenever he is deprived of a truth

I understand, he said the willing loss of a resolution the meaning of the unwilling I have yet to learn

Why I said, do you not see that men are un willingly deprived of good, and willingly of evil? Is not to have lost the truth an evil and to possess the truth a good? and you would agree that to conceive things as they are is to possess the truth?

Yes, he replied I agree with you in thinking that mankind are deprived of truth against their will

And is not this involuntary deprivation caused either by theft, or force, or enchant ment?

Still he replied I do not understand you

I fear that I must have been talking darkly like the tragedians I only mean that some men are changed by persuasion and that others for get argument steals away the hearts of one class, and time of the other and this I call theft. Now you understand me?

Yes

Those again who are forced are those whom the violence of some pain or grief compels to change their opinion.

I understand he said, and you are quite right.

And you would also acknowledge that the enchanted are those who change their minds either under the softer influence of pleasure, or the sterner influence of fear?

Yes he said everything that deceives may be said to enchant.

Therefore, as I was just now saying we must enquire who are the best guardians of their own conviction that what they think the in terest of the State is to be the rule of their lives

We must watch them from their youth upwards and make them perform actions in which they are most likely to forget or to be deceived and he who remembers and is not deceived is to be selected and he who fails in the trial is to be rejected That will be the way?

Yes

And there should also be toils and pains and conflicts prescribed for them in which they will be made to give further proof of the same qualities

Very right he replied

And then I said we must try them with enchantments—that is the third sort of test—and see what will be their behaviour like those who take colts amid noise and tumult to see if they are of a timid nature so must we take our youth amid terrors of some kind and again pass them into pleasures and prove them more thoroughly than gold is proved in the furnace that we may discover whether they are armed against all enchantments and of a noble bearing always good guardians of themselves and of the music which they have learned and retaining under all circumstances a rhythmical and harmonious nature such as will be most serviceable to the individual and to the State And he who at every age as boy and youth and in mature life, has come out of the trial victorious and pure [414] shall be appointed a ruler and guardian of the State he shall be honoured in life and death and shall receive sepulture and other memorials of honour the greatest that we have to give But him who fails we must reject I am inclined to think that this is the ort of way in which our rulers and guardians should be chosen and appointed I speak generally and not with any pretension to exactness

And speaking generally I agree with you he said

And perhaps the word guardian in the fullest sense ought to be applied to this higher class only who preserve us against foreign enemies and maintain peace among our citizens at home that the one may not have the will or the others the power to harm us The young men whom we before called guardians may be more properly designated auxiliaries and supporters of the principles of the rulers

I agree with you he said

How then may we devise one of those needful falsehoods of which we lately spoke—just one royal lie which may deceive the rulers if that be possible and at any rate the rest of the

What sort of lie? he said

Nothing new I replied only an old Phoenician tale of what has often occurred before now in other places (as the poets say, and have made the world believe) though not in our time and I do not know whether such an event could ever happen again or could now even be made probable if it did

How your words seem to hesitate on your lips!

You will not wonder I replied at my hesitation when you have heard

Speak he said and fear not

Well then I will speak although I really know not how to look you in the face or in what words to utter the audacious fiction which I propose to communicate gradually first to the rulers then to the soldiers and lastly to the people They are to be told that their youth was a dream, and the education and training which they received from us an appearance only in reality during all that time they were being formed and fed in the womb of the earth where they themselves and their arms and appurtenances were manufactured when they were completed the earth their mother sent them up and so their country being their mother and also their nurse they are bound to advise for her good and to defend her against attacks and her citizens they are to regard as children of the earth and their own brothers

You had good reason he said to be ashamed of the lie which you were going to tell

[415] True I replied but there is more coming I have only told you half Citizens we shall say to them in our tale you are brothers, yet God has framed you differently Some of you have the power of command and in the composition of these he has mingled gold wherefore also they have the greatest honour others he has made of silver to be auxiliaries others again who are to be husbandmen and craftsmen he has composed of brass and iron and the species will generally be preserved in the children But as all are of the same original stock a golden parent will sometimes have a silver son or a silver parent a golden son And God proclaims as a first principle to the rulers and above all else that there is nothing which they should so anxiously guard or of which they are to be such good guardians as of the purity of the race They should observe what elements mingle in their offspring for if the son of a golden or silver parent has an admixture of brass and iron then nature orders a transposition of ranks, and the eye of the ruler must not be pitiful towards the child because he has to descend in the scale and become a husbandman or artisan, just as there may be sons of artisans who having an admixture of gold or silver in them are raised to honour and become guardians or auxiliaries. For an oracle says that when a man of brass or iron guards the State, it will be destroyed. Such is the tale is there any possibility of making our citizens believe in it?

Not in the present generation, he replied there is no way of accomplishing this but their sons may be made to believe in the tale, and their sons sons, and posterity after them

I see the difficulty I replied yet the fostering of such a belief will make them care more for the city and for one another Enough, however of the fiction, which may now fly abroad upon the wings of rumour while we arm our earth-born heroes, and lead them forth under the command of their rulers. Let them look round and select a spot whence they can best suppress insurrection, if any prove refractory within, and also defend themselves against enemies, who like wolves may come down on the fold from without there let them encamp and when they have encamped, let them sacrifice to the proper Gods and prepare their dwellings.

Just so, he said

And their dwellings must be such as will shield them against the cold of winter and the heat of summer

I suppose that you mean houses, he replied.

Yes, I said but they must be the houses of soldiers, and not of shopkeepers

What is the difference? he said

[416] That I will endeavour to explain, I replied To keep watch-dogs, who, from want of discipline or hunger or some evil habit or other would turn upon the sheep and worry them and behave not like dogs but wolves, would be a foul and monstrous thing in a shepherd?

Truly monstrous, he said.

And therefore every care must be taken that our auxiliaries, being stronger than our citizens, may not grow to be too much for them and become savage tyrants instead of friends and allies?

Yes, great care should be taken.

And would not a really good education furnish the best safeguard?

But they are well-educated already he replied.

I cannot be so confident, my dear Glaucon I said I am much more certain that they ought to be, and that true education, whatever that may be, will have the greatest tendency to civilize and humanize them in their relations to one another and to those who are under their protection

Very true, he replied

And not only their education, but their habitations, and all that belongs to them, should be such as will neither impair their virtue as guardians, nor tempt them to prey upon the other citizens. Any man of sense must acknowledge that.

He must.

Then let us consider what will be their way of life, if they are to realize our idea of them In the first place, none of them should have any property of his own beyond what is absolutely necessary neither should they have a private house or store closed against any one who has a mind to enter their provisions should be only such as are required by trained warriors, who are men of temperance and courage they should agree to receive from the citizens a fixed rate of pay enough to meet the expenses of the year and no more and they will go to mess and live together like soldiers in a camp Gold and silver we will tell them that they have from God the diviner metal is within them, and they have therefore no need of the dross which is current among men, and ought not to pollute the divine by any such earthly admixture [417] for that commoner metal has been the source of many unholy deeds, but their own is undefiled. And they alone of all the citizens may not touch or handle silver or gold, or be under the same roof with them, or wear them, or drink from them. And this will be their salvation, and they will be the saviours of the State. But should they ever acquire homes or lands or moneys of their own, they will become housekeepers and husbandmen instead of guardians, enemies and tyrants instead of allies of the other citizens hating and being hated, plotting and being plotted against, they will pass their whole life in much greater terror of internal than of external enemies, and the hour of ruin, both to themselves and to the rest of the State, will be at hand For all which reasons may we not say that thus shall our State be ordered, and that these shall be the regulations appointed by us for our guardians concerning their houses and all other matters?

Yes, said Glaucon.

We must watch them from their youth upwards and make them perform actions in which they are most likely to forget or to be deceived and he who remembers and is not deceived is to be selected and he who fails in the trial is to be rejected That will be the way?

[1] Cf Laws ii 663.

The process is as follows When a potter becomes rich, will he, think you any longer take the same pains with his art?

Certainly not.

He will grow more and more indolent and careless?

Very true

And the result will be that he becomes a worse potter?

Yes he greatly deteriorates.

But, on the other hand if he has no money and cannot provide himself with tools or instruments, he will not work equally well himself nor will he teach his sons or apprentices to work equally well

Certainly not.

Then, under the influence either of poverty or of wealth, workmen and their work are equally liable to degenerate?

That is evident.

Here, then, is a discovery of new evils, I said against which the guardians will have to watch, or they will creep into the city unobserved.

What evils?

[422] Wealth I said, and poverty the one is the parent of luxury and indolence, and the other of meanness and viciousness, and both of discontent.

That is very true he replied but still I should like to know Socrates how our city will be able to go to war especially against an enemy who is rich and powerful, if deprived of the sinews of war

There would certainly be a difficulty I replied in going to war with one such enemy but there is no difficulty where there are two of them.

How so? he asked

In the first place, I said if we have to fight, our side will be trained warriors fighting against an army of rich men.

That is true he said

And do you not suppose, Adeimantus, that a single boxer who was perfect in his art would easily be a match for two stout and well-to-do gentlemen who were not boxers?

Hardly if they came upon him at once

What, not I said if he were able to run away and then turn and strike at the one who first came up? And supposing he were to do this several times under the heat of a scorching sun, might he not, being an expert, overturn more than one stout personage?

Certainly he said, there would be nothing wonderful in that

And yet rich men probably have a greater superiority in the science and practise of boxing than they have in military qualities.

Likely enough

Then we may assume that our athletes will be able to fight with two or three times their own number?

I agree with you for I think you right.

And suppose that before engaging, our citizens send an embassy to one of the two cities, telling them what is the truth Silver and gold we neither have nor are permitted to have but you may do you therefore come and help us in war and take the spoils of the other city Who on hearing these words, would choose to fight against lean wiry dogs, rather than with the dogs on their side, against fat and tender sheep?

That is not likely and yet there might be a danger to the poor State if the wealth of many States were to be gathered into one

But how simple of you to use the term State at all of any but our own!

Why so?

You ought to speak of other States in the plural number not one of them is a city but many cities, as they say in the game For indeed any city however small is in fact divided into two one the city of the poor [423] the other of the rich these are at war with one another and in either there are many smaller divisions, and you would be altogether beside the mark, if you treated them all as a single State But if you deal with them as many and give the wealth or power or persons of the one to the others, you will always have a great many friends and not many enemies. And your State while the wise order which has now been prescribed continues to prevail in her will be the greatest of States I do not mean to say in reputation or appearance but in deed and truth though she number not more than a thousand defenders A single State which is her equal you will hardly find either among Hellenes or barbarians, though many that appear to be as great and many times greater

That is most true he said

And what I said will be the best limit for our rulers to fix when they are considering the size of the State and the amount of territory which they are to include and beyond which they will not go?

What limit would you propose?

I would allow the State to increase so far as is consistent with unity that, I think, is the proper limit.

BOOK IV

[419] Here Adeimantus interposed a question How would you answer, Socrates said he if a person were to say that you are making these people miserable and that they are the cause of their own unhappiness the city in fact belongs to them but they are none the better for it whereas other men acquire lands and build large and handsome houses and have everything handsome about them offer ing sacrifices to the gods on their own account and practising hospitality moreover as you were saying just now they have gold and sil ver and all that is usual among the favourites of fortune but our poor citizens are no better than mercenaries who are quartered in the city and are always mounting guard?

[420] Yes I said and you may add that they are only fed and not paid in addition to their food like other men and therefore they can not if they would take a journey of pleasure they have no money to spend on a mistress or any other luxurious fancy which as the world goes is thought to be happiness and many other similar accusations might be added

But said he let us suppose all this to be in cluded in the charge

You mean to ask I said what will be our answer?

Yes

If we proceed along the old path my belief I said is that we shall find the answer And our answer will be that even as they are our guardians may very likely be the happiest of men but that our aim in founding the State was not the disproportionate happiness of any one class but the greatest happiness of the whole we thought that in a State which is ordered with a view to the good of the whole we should be most likely to find justice and in the ill-ordered State injustice and having found them we might then decide which of the two is the happier At present I take it we are fashioning the happy State not piecemeal, or with a view of making a few happy citizens but as a whole and by and by we will proceed to view the opposite kind of State Suppose that we were painting a statue and some one came up to us and said Why do you not put the most beautiful colours on the most beauti ful parts of the body—the eyes ought to be pur ple but you have made them black—to him we might fairly answer Sir you would not surely have us beautify the eyes to such a degree that they are no longer eyes consider rather wheth er by giving this and the other features their due proportion we make the whole beautiful. And so I say to you do not compel us to assign to the guardians a sort of happiness which will make them anything but guardians for we too can clothe our husbandmen in royal apparel, and set crowns of gold on their heads and bid them till the ground as much as they like and no more Our potters also might be allowed to repose on couches and feast by the fireside, passing round the winecup while their wheel is conveniently at hand and working at pottery only as much as they like in this way we might make every class happy—and then as you im agine the whole State would be happy But do not put this idea into our heads [421] for if we listen to you the husbandman will be no longer a husbandman the potter will cease to be a potter and no one will have the character of any distinct class in the State Now this is not of much consequence where the corruption of society and pretension to be what you are not, is confined to cobblers but when the guardians of the laws and of the government are only seemingly and not real guardians then see how they turn the State upside down and on the other hand they alone have the power of giving order and happiness to the State. We mean our guardians to be true saviours and not the destroyers of the State whereas our oppo nent is thinking of peasants at a festival who are enjoying a life of revelry not of citizens who are doing their duty to the State But, if so, we mean different things and he is speaking of something which is not a State And there fore we must consider whether in appointing our guardians we would look to their greatest happiness individually or whether this princi ple of happiness does not rather reside in the State as a whole But if the latter be the truth then the guardians and auxiliaries and all oth ers equally with them must be compelled or induced to do their own work in the best way And thus the whole State will grow up in a noble order, and the several classes will re ceive the proportion of happiness which nature assigns to them

I think that you are quite right

I wonder whether you will agree with an other remark which occurs to me

What may that be?

There seem to be two causes of the deterio ration of the arts

What are they?

Wealth I said and poverty

How do they act?

Yes.

But there is, I think, small wisdom in legislating about such matters—I doubt if it is ever done nor are any precise written enactments about them likely to be lasting.

Impossible.

It would seem, Adeimantus, that the direction in which education starts a man, will determine his future life. Does not like always attract like?

To be sure.

Until some one rare and grand result is reached which may be good, and may be the reverse of good?

That is not to be denied.

And for this reason, I said, I shall not attempt to legislate further about them.

Naturally enough, he replied.

Well, and about the business of the agora, and the ordinary dealings between man and man, or again about agreements with artisans about insult and injury or the commencement of actions, and the appointment of juries, what would you say? there may also arise questions about any impositions and extractions of market and harbour dues which may be required, and in general about the regulations of markets, police, harbours, and the like. But, oh heavens! shall we condescend to legislate on any of these particulars?

I think, he said, that there is no need to impose laws about them on good men what regulations are necessary they will find out soon enough for themselves.

Yes, I said, my friend, if God will only preserve to them the laws which we have given them.

And without divine help, said Adeimantus, they will go on for ever making and mending their laws and their lives in the hope of attaining perfection.

You would compare them, I said, to those invalids who, having no self-restraint, will not leave off their habits of intemperance

Exactly

[426] Yes, I said and what a delightful life they lead! they are always doctoring and increasing and complicating their disorders, and always fancying that they will be cured by any nostrum which anybody advises them to try

Such cases are very common, he said, with invalids of this sort.

Yes, I replied and the charming thing is that they deem him their worst enemy who tells them the truth, which is simply that, unless they give up eating and drinking and wenching and idling neither drug nor cautery nor spell nor amulet nor any other remedy will avail.

Charming! he replied. I see nothing charming in going into a passion with a man who tells you what is right

These gentlemen, I said do not seem to be in your good graces.

Assuredly not.

Nor would you praise the behaviour of States which act like the men whom I was just now describing For are there not ill-ordered States in which the citizens are forbidden under pain of death to alter the constitution and yet he who most sweetly courts those who live under this regime and indulges them and fawns upon them and is skilful in anticipating and gratifying their humours is held to be a great and good statesman—do not these States resemble the persons whom I was describing?

Yes, he said the States are as bad as the men and I am very far from praising them.

But do you not admire, I said, the coolness and dexterity of these ready ministers of political corruption?

Yes, he said, I do but not of all of them, for there are some whom the applause of the multitude has deluded into the belief that they are really statesmen, and these are not much to be admired.

What do you mean? I said you should have more feeling for them. When a man cannot measure, and a great many others who cannot measure declare that he is four cubits high, can he help believing what they say?

Nay he said, certainly not in that case.

Well, then, do not be angry with them for are they not as good as a play trying their hand at paltry reforms such as I was describing they are always fancying that by legislation they will make an end of frauds in contracts, and the other rascalities which I was mentioning not knowing that they are in reality cutting off the heads of a hydra?

[427] Yes, he said that is just what they are doing

I conceive, I said, that the true legislator will not trouble himself with this class of enactments whether concerning laws or the constitution either in an ill-ordered or in a well-ordered State for in the former they are quite useless, and in the latter there will be no difficulty in devising them and many of them will naturally flow out of our previous regulations.

What, then, he said, is still remaining to us of the work of legislation?

Very good, he said

Here then I said is another order which will have to be conveyed to our guardians Let our city be accounted neither large nor small but one and self sufficing

And surely said he this is not a very severe order which we impose upon them

And the other said I of which we were speaking before is lighter still—I mean the duty of degrading the offspring of the guardians when inferior and of elevating into the rank of guardians the offspring of the lower classes when naturally superior The intention was that in the case of the citizens generally each individual should be put to the use for which nature intended him one to one work and then every man would do his own business and be one and not many and so the whole city would be one and not many

Yes he said that is not so difficult

The regulations which we are prescribing my good Adeimantus are not as might be supposed a number of great principles but trifles all if care be taken as the saying is of the one great thing—a thing however which I would rather call not great, but sufficient for our purpose

What may that be? he asked

Education I said and nurture If our citizens are well educated and grow into sensible men they will easily see their way through all these as well as other matters which I omit such, for example as marriage [424] the possession of women and the procreation of children which will all follow the general principle that friends have all things in common as the proverb says

That will be the best way of settling them

Also I said the State if once started well moves with accumulating force like a wheel For good nurture and education implant good constitutions and these good constitutions taking root in a good education improve more and more and this improvement affects the breed in man as in other animals

Very possibly he said

Then to sum up This is the point to which above all the attention of our rulers should be directed—that music and gymnastic be preserved in their original form and no innovation made They must do their utmost to maintain them intact And when any one says that mankind most regard

The newest song which the singers have[1]

they will be afraid that he may be praising not new songs but a new kind of song and this ought not to be praised or conceived to be the meaning of the poet for any musical innovation is full of danger to the whole State and ought to be prohibited So Damon tells me, and I can quite believe him—he says that when modes of music change the fundamental laws of the State always change with them

Yes said Adeimantus and you may add my suffrage to Damon s and your own

Then I said our guardians must lay the foundations of their fortress in music?

Yes he said the lawlessness of which you speak too easily steals in

Yes I replied in the form of amusement and at first sight it appears harmless

Why yes he said and there is no harm were it not that little by little this spirit of licence finding a home imperceptibly penetrates into manners and customs whence, issuing with greater force it invades contracts between man and man and from contracts goes on to laws and constitutions in utter recklessness ending at last Socrates by an overthrow of all rights, private as well as public

Is that true? I said

That is my belief he replied

Then as I was saying our youth should be trained from the first in a stricter system for if amusements become lawless and the youths themselves become lawless [425] they can never grow up into well conducted and virtuous citizens

Very true he said

And when they have made a good beginning in play and by the help of music have gained the habit of good order then this habit of order in a manner how unlike the lawless play of the others! will accompany them in all their actions and be a principle of growth to them and if there be any fallen places in the State will raise them up again

Very true he said

Thus educated they will invent for themselves any lesser rules which their predecessors have altogether neglected

What do you mean?

I mean such things as these —when the young are to be silent before their elders how they are to show respect to them by standing and making them sit what honour is due to parents what garments or shoes are to be worn the mode of dressing the hair deportment and manners in general You would agree with me?

[1] Odyssey I 352

Yes.

But there is, I think, small wisdom in legislating about such matters—I doubt if it is ever done; nor are any precise written enactments about them likely to be lasting.

Impossible.

It would seem, Adeimantus, that the direction in which education starts a man, will determine his future life. Does not like always attract like?

What, then, he said, is still remaining to us of the work of legislation?

Nothing to us I replied but to Apollo the god of Delphi, there remains the ordering of the greatest and noblest and chiefest things of all

Which are they? he said

The institution of temples and sacrifices and the entire service of gods, demigods and heroes also the ordering of the repositories of the dead and the rites which have to be observed by him who would propitiate the inhabitants of the world below These are matters of which we are ignorant ourselves and as founders of a city we should be unwise in trusting them to any interpreter but our ancestral deity He is the god who sits in the centre on the navel of the earth and he is the interpreter of religion to all mankind

You are right and we will do as you propose

But where, amid all this is justice? son of Ariston tell me where Now that our city has been made habitable light a candle and search and get your brother and Polemarchus and the rest of our friends to help and let us see where in it we can discover justice and where injustice, and in what they differ from one another and which of them the man who would be happy should have for his portion whether seen or unseen by gods and men

Nonsense said Glaucon did you not promise to search yourself saying that for you not to help justice in her need would be an impiety?

I do not deny that I said so and as you remind me I will be as good as my word but you must join

We will he replied

Well then I hope to make the discovery in this way I mean to begin with the assumption that our State if rightly ordered is perfect

That is most certain

And being perfect is therefore wise and valiant and temperate and just

That is likewise clear

And whichever of these qualities we find in the State, the one which is not found will be the residue?

[428] Very good

If there were four things and we were searching for one of them wherever it might be the one sought for might be known to us from the first and there would be no further trouble or we might know the other three first and then the fourth would clearly be the one left

Very true he said

And is not a similar method to be pursued about the virtues which are also four in number?

Clearly

First among the virtues found in the State, wisdom comes into view and in this I detect a certain peculiarity

What is that?

The State which we have been describing is said to be wise as being good in counsel?

Very true

And good counsel is clearly a kind of knowledge for not by ignorance but by knowledge do men counsel well?

Clearly

And the kinds of knowledge in a State are many and diverse?

Of course

There is the knowledge of the carpenter but is that the sort of knowledge which gives a city the title of wise and good in counsel?

Certainly not that would only give a city the reputation of skill in carpentering

Then a city is not to be called wise because possessing a knowledge which counsels for the best about wooden implements?

Certainly not

Nor by reason of a knowledge which advises about brazen pots I said nor as possessing any other similar knowledge?

Not by reason of any of them he said

Nor yet by reason of a knowledge which cultivates the earth that would give the city the name of agricultural?

Yes

Well I said and is there any knowledge in our recently founded State among any of the citizens which advises not about any particular thing in the State but about the whole and considers how a State can best deal with itself and with other States?

There certainly is

And what is this knowledge and among whom is it found? I asked

It is the knowledge of the guardians he replied and is found among those whom we were just now describing as perfect guardians

And what is the name which the city derives from the possession of this sort of knowledge?

The name of good in counsel and truly wise

And will there be in our city more of these true guardians or more smiths?

The smiths he replied will be far more numerous

Will not the guardians be the smallest of all the classes who receive a name from the profession of some kind of knowledge?

Much the smallest

And so by reason of the smallest part or class, and of the knowledge which resides in this presiding and ruling part of itself the whole State, [429] being thus constituted according to nature, will be wise and this, which has the only knowledge worthy to be called wisdom, has been ordained by nature to be of all classes the least

Most true

Thus, then I said, the nature and place in the State of one of the four virtues has some how or other been discovered

And in my humble opinion very satisfac torily discovered he replied.

Again I said there is no difficulty in seeing the nature of courage and in what part that quality resides which gives the name of cou rag ous to the State

How do you mean?

Why I said, every one who calls any State courageous or cowardly will be thinking of the part which fights and goes out to war on the State s behalf.

No one, he replied, would ever think of any other

The rest of the citizens may be courageous or may be cowardly but their courage or cow ardice will not, as I conceive, have the effect of making the city either the one or the other

Certainly not.

The city will be courageous in virtue of a portion of herself which preserves under all circumstances that opinion about the nature of things to be feared and not to be feared in which our legislator educated them and this is what y u term courage

I should like to hear what you are saying once more for I do not think that I perfectly understand you

I mean that courage is a kind of salv tion.

Salvation of what?

Of the opinion respecting things to be feared, what they are and of what nature, wh ch the law implants through education and I mean by th e words under all circumstances to in timate that in pleasure or in pain, or under the influence of desire or fear a man preserves and does not lose this opinion Shall I give you an illustr tion?

If you please

You know I said, that dyers when they want to dye wool for making the true sea purpl begin by selecting their wh te colour first this they prepare and dress with much care and pains, in order that the white ground may take the purple hue in full perfection The dyeing then proceeds and whatever is dyed in this manner becomes a fast colour and no washing either with lyes or without them can take away the bloom But, when the ground has not been duly prepared you will have noticed how poor is the look either of purple or of any other colour

Yes, he said I know that they have a washed-out and ridiculous appearance.

Then now I said you will understand what our object was in selecting our soldiers [430] and educating them in music and gymnastic we were contriving influences which would prepare them to take the dye of the laws in per fection and the colour of their opinion about dangers and of every other opinion was to be indelibly fixed by their nurture and training not to be washed away by such potent lyes as pleasure—mightier agent far in washing the soul than any soda or lye or by sorrow fear and desire, the mightiest of all other solvents. And this sort of universal saving power of true opinion in conformity with law about real and false dangers I call and maintain to be courage, unless you disagree.

But I agree he replied for I suppose that you mean to exclude mere uninstructed cour age, such as that of a wild beast or of a slave—this in your opinion, is not the courage which the law ordains and ought to have another name

Then I may infer courage to be such as you describe?

Why yes, said I you may and if you add the w rds of a citizen you will not be far wrong—hereafter if you like, we will carry the ex amination further but at present we are seek ing not for courage but justice and for the pur pose of our enquiry we have said enough

You are right, he replied

Two virtues remain to be discovered in the State—first temperance and then justice which is the end of our search.

Very true,

Now can we find justice without troubling ourselves about temperance?

I do not know ho v that can be accomplished he sa d nor do I desire that justice should be brought to light and temperance lost sight of and therefore I wish that you would do me the favour of considering temperance first

Certainly I replied I should not be justified in refusing your request

Then consider he said

Nothing to us I replied but to Apollo the god of Delphi, there remains the ordering of the greatest and noblest and chiefest things of all

Which are they? he said

The institution of temples and sacrifices and the entire service of gods, demigods and heroes also the ordering of the repositories of the dead and the rites which have to be observed by him who would propitiate the inhabitants of the world below These are matters of which we are ignorant ourselves and as founders of a city we should be unwise in trusting them to any interpreter but our ancestral deity He is the god who sits in the centre on the navel of the earth and he is the interpreter of religion to all mankind

The smiths he replied will be far more numerous

Will not the guardians be the smallest of all the classes who receive a name from the profession of some kind of knowledge?

quarry will not escape

Good news he said

Truly I sa d we are stupid fellows

Why so?

Why my good sir at the beginning of our enquiry ages ago there was justice tumbling out at our feet, and we never saw her noth ing could be more ridiculous Like people who go about looking for what they have in their hands—that was the way with us—we looked not at what we were seeking but at what was far ff in the distance and therefore I suppose we missed her

What do you mean?

I mean to say that in reality for a long time past we have been talking of justice, and have failed to recognise her

I grow impatient at the length of your exordium

[433] Well then, tell me I said whether I am right or not You remember the original principle which we were al vays laying down at the foundation of the State that one man should practise one thing only the thing to which his nature was best adapted—now jus t ce is this principle or a part of it

Yes we often said that one man should do ne thing only

F rther we affirmed that justice was doing one s o n business, and not being a busybody we said so again and again and many others h e said the same to us

Yes we sa d so

Then to do one own busin ss in a certa n way may be assumed to be justice Can you tell me whence I deri e th s inference?

I cannot, but I should like to be told

Because I th nk that this is the only virtue which remains in the State wh n the other vir tues f temperan e and courage and wisdom are ab tracted a d that th s is the ultimate cause and condition of the existence of all of them, and while remaining n them is also th ir preservat ve and we were saying that if the three were discovered by us justice would be the fourth or rema ning one

That follo s f necessity

If we are asked to determine v h ch of these fou qualities by its presence contributes most to the excellence of the State whether the agreement of rulers and subjects, or the preser ation n the soldiers f the opinion which the law ordains bout the true nature of da gers, o wisd m d watchfuln ss in the rulers or heth thisothe v h ch I am n entioning and which is f und in children and women slave and freeman artisan ruler subject—the qual ity I mean of every one doing his own work and not being a busybody would claim the palm—the question is not so easily answered

Certainly he replied there would be a diffi culty in saying which

Then the power of each individual in the State to do his own work appears to compete with the other political virtues wisdom tem perance courage

Yes he said

And the virtue which enters into this com petition is justice?

Exactly

Let us look at the question from another point of view Are not the rulers in a State those to whom you would entrust the office of determining suits at law?

Certainly

And are suits decided on any other ground but that a man may neither take what is an other s, nor be deprived of what is his own?

Yes that is their principle

Which is a just principle?

Yes.

Then on this view also justice will be ad mitted to be the having and doing what is a man s own and belongs to him?

[434] Very true

Think, now and say whether you agree with me or not Suppose a carpenter to be doing the bus ness of a cobbler or a cobbler of a carpenter and suppose them to exchange the r imple ments or their duties or the same person to be doing the work of both or whatever be the change do you think that any great harm would result to the State?

Not much

But when the cobbler or any other man whom nature des gned to be a trader having his heart lifted up by wealth or strength or the number of his followers, or any like advantage, at tempts to force his way into the class of war riors, or a warrior into that of legislators and guardians for which he is unfitted and e ther to take the implements or the dut es of the other or when one man is trader legislator and warrior all in one then I think you will agree w th me in saying that th s inter hange and this meddling of one with another is the ruin of the State

Most true

Seeing then I said that there are three dis tinct classes, any meddling of one with an other or the change of one into another is the greatest harm to the State, and may be

Yes I replied I will and as far as I can at present see the virtue of temperance has more of the nature of harmony and symphony than the preceding

How so? he asked

Temperance I replied is the ordering or controlling of certain pleasures and desires this is curiously enough implied in the saying of a man being his own master and other traces of the same notion may be found in language

No doubt he said

There is something ridiculous in the expression master of himself [431] for the master is also the servant and the servant the master and in all these modes of speaking the same person is denoted

Certainly

The meaning is I believe that in the human soul there is a better and also a worse principle and when the better has the worse under control then a man is said to be master of himself and this is a term of praise but when owing to evil education or association the better principle which is also the smaller is overwhelmed by the greater mass of the worse—in this case he is blamed and is called the slave of self and unprincipled

Yes there is reason in that

And now I said look at our newly-created State and there you will find one of these two conditions realized for the State as you will acknowledge may be justly called master of itself if the words temperance and self mastery truly express the rule of the better part over the worse

Yes he said I see that what you say is true

Let me further note that the manifold and complex pleasures and desires and pains are generally found in children and women and servants and in the freemen so called who are of the lowest and more numerous class

Certainly he said

Whereas the simple and moderate desires which follow reason and are under the guidance of mind and true opinion are to be found only in a few and those the best born and best educated

Very true

These two as you may perceive have a place in our State and the meaner desires of the many are held down by the virtuous desires and wisdom of the few

That I perceive he said

Then if there be any city which may be described as master of its own pleasures and desires and master of itself ours may claim such a designation?

Certainly he replied

It may also be called temperate and for the same reasons?

Yes

And if there be any State in which rulers and subjects will be agreed as to the question who are to rule that again will be our State?

Undoubtedly

And the citizens being thus agreed among themselves in which class will temperance be found—in the rulers or in the subjects?

In both as I should imagine he replied

Do you observe that we were not far wrong in our guess that temperance was a sort of harmony?

Why so?

Why, because temperance is unlike courage and wisdom each of which resides in a part only [432] the one making the State wise and the other valiant not so temperance, which extends to the whole and runs through all the notes of the scale and produces a harmony of the weaker and the stronger and the middle class whether you suppose them to be stronger or weaker in wisdom or power or numbers or wealth or anything else Most truly then may we deem temperance to be the agreement of the naturally superior and inferior as to the right to rule of either both in states and individuals

I entirely agree with you

And so I said we may consider three out of the four virtues to have been discovered in our State The last of those qualities which make a state virtuous must be justice if we only knew what that was

The inference is obvious

The time then has arrived Glaucon when like huntsmen we should surround the cover and look sharp that justice does not steal away and pass out of sight and escape us for beyond a doubt she is somewhere in this country watch therefore and strive to catch a sight of her and if you see her first let me know

Would that I could! but you should regard me rather as a follower who has just eyes enough to see what you show him—that is about as much as I am good for

Offer up a prayer with me and follow

I will but you must show me the way

Here is no path I said and the wood is dark and perplexing still we must push on

Let us push on

Here I saw something Halloo! I said I begin to perceive a track and I believe that the at rest and in motion at the same time in the same part?

Impossible.

Still, I said, let us have a more precise statement of terms, lest we should hereafter fall out by the way Imagine the case of a man who is standing and also moving his hands and his head, and suppose a person to say that one and the same person is in motion and at rest at the same moment—to such a mode of speech we should object, and should rather say that one part of him is in motion while another is at rest.

Very true

And suppose the objector to refine still further and to draw the nice distinction that not only parts of tops, but whole tops, when they spin round with their pegs fixed on the spot, are at rest and in motion at the same time (and he may say the same of anything which revolves in the same spot) his objection would not be admitted by us, because in such cases things are not at rest and in motion in the same parts of themselves we should rather say that they have both an axis and a circumference and that the axis stands still, for there is no deviation from the perpendicular and that the circumference goes round But if, while revolving, the axis inclines either to the right or left, forwards or backwards, then in no point of view can they be at rest.

That is the correct mode of describing them, he replied

Then none of these objections will confuse us, or incline us to believe that the same thing at the same time, [437] in the same part or in relation to the same thing can act or be acted upon in contrary ways.

Certainly not, according to my way of thinking.

Yet, I said, that we may not be compelled to examine all such objections, and prove at length that they are untrue, let us assume their absurdity and go forward on the understanding that hereafter if this assumption turn out to be untrue, all the consequences which follow shall be withdrawn

Yes, he said, that will be the best way

Well, I said, would you not allow that assent and dissent, desire and aversion, attraction and repulsion, are all of them opposites, whether they are regarded as active or passive (for that makes no difference in the fact of their opposition)?

Yes he said, they are opposites

Well, I said, and hunger and thirst, and the desires in general and again willing and wishing—all these you would refer to the classes already mentioned You would say—would you not?—that the soul of him who desires is seeking after the object of his desires or that he is drawing to himself the thing which he wishes to possess or again, when a person wants anything to be given him, his mind, longing for the realization of his desires, intimates his wish to have it by a nod of assent as if he had been asked a question?

Very true

And what would you say of unwillingness and dislike and the absence of desire should not these be referred to the opposite class of repulsion and rejection?

Certainly

Admitting this to be true of desire generally let us suppose a particular class of desires, and out of these we will select hunger and thirst, as they are termed, which are the most obvious of them?

Let us take that class, he said.

The object of one is food, and of the other drink?

Yes

And here comes the point is not thirst the desire which the soul has of drink, and of drink only not of drink qualified by anything else for example, warm or cold, or much or little, or in a word, drink of any particular sort but if the thirst be accompanied by heat, then the desire is of cold drink or if accompanied by cold, then of warm drink or if the thirst be excessive, then the drink which is desired will be excessive or if not great, the quantity of drink will also be small but thirst pure and simple will desire drink pure and simple, which is the natural satisfaction of thirst, as food is of hunger?

Yes, he said the simple desire is, as you say in every case of the simple object, and the qualified desire of the qualified object.

[438] But here a confusion may arise and I should wish to guard against an opponent starting up and saying that no man desires drink only but good drink, or food only but good food for good is the universal object of desire, and thirst being a desire, will necessarily be thirst after good drink and the same is true of every other desire.

Yes, he replied, the opponent might have something to say

Nevertheless I should still maintain, that of relatives some have a quality attached to either term of the relation, others are simple and have most justly termed evil doing?

Precisely

And the greatest degree of evil-doing to one s own city would be termed by you injustice?

Certainly

This then is injustice and on the other hand when the trader the auxiliary and the guardian each do their own business that is justice and will make the city just

I agree with you

We will not I said be overpositive as yet but if on trial this conception of justice be verified in the individual as well as in the State there will be no longer any room for doubt if it be not verified we must have a fresh enquiry First let us complete the old investigation which we began as you remember under the impression that if we could previously examine justice on the larger scale there would be less difficulty in discerning her in the individual That larger example appeared to be the State and accordingly we constructed as good a one as we could knowing well that in the good State justice would be found Let the discovery which we made be now applied to the individual—if they agree we shall be satisfied or if there be a difference in the individual we will come back to the State and have another trial of the theory [435] The friction of the two when rubbed together may possibly strike a light in which justice will shine forth and the vision which is then revealed we will fix in our souls

That will be in regular course let us do as you say

I proceeded to ask When two things a greater and less are called by the same name are they like or unlike in so far as they are called the same?

Like he replied

The just man then if we regard the idea of justice only will be like the just State?

He will

And a State was thought by us to be just when the three classes in the State severally did their own business and also thought to be temperate and valiant and wise by reason of certain other affections and qualities of these same classes?

True he said

And so of the individual we may assume that he has the same three principles in his own soul which are found in the State and he may be rightly described in the same terms because he is affected in the same manner?

Certainly he said

Once more then, O my friend, we have alighted upon an easy question—whether the soul has these three principles or not?

An easy question! Nay, rather Socrates, the proverb holds that hard is the good

Very true I said, and I do not think that the method which we are employing is at all adequate to the accurate solution of this question the true method is another and a longer one. Still we may arrive at a solution not below the level of the previous enquiry

May we not be satisfied with that? he said —under the circumstances I am quite content

I too I replied shall be extremely well satisfied

Then faint not in pursuing the speculation, he said

Must we not acknowledge I said that in each of us there are the same principles and habits which there are in the State and that from the individual they pass into the State?—how else can they come there? Take the quality of passion or spirit—it would be ridiculous to imagine that this quality when found in States, is not derived from the individuals who are supposed to possess it, e g the Thracians, Scythians and in general the northern nations and the same may be said of the love of knowledge which is the special characteristic of our part of the world [436] or of the love of money which may with equal truth be attributed to the Phoenicians and Egyptians

Exactly so he said

There is no difficulty in understanding this.

None whatever

But the question is not quite so easy when we proceed to ask whether these principles are three or one whether that is to say we learn with one part of our nature are angry with another and with a third part desire the satisfaction of our natural appetites or whether the whole soul comes into play in each sort of action—to determine that is the difficulty

Yes he said there lies the difficulty

Then let us now try and determine whether they are the same or different

How can we? he asked

I replied as follows The same thing clearly cannot act or be acted upon in the same part or in relation to the same thing at the same time in contrary ways and therefore whenever this contradiction occurs in things apparently the same we know that they are really not the same but different

Good

For example I said can the same thing be also a dread and abhorrence of them [440] for a time he struggled and covered his eyes, but at length the desire got the better of him and forcing them open, he ran up to the dead bodies, saying Look, ye wretches, take your fill of the fair sight.

I have heard the story myself, he said

The moral of the tale is that anger at times goes to war with desire, as though they were two distinct things.

Yes that is the meaning he said.

And are there not many other cases in which we observe that when a man s desires violently prevail over his reason, he reviles himself and is angry at the violence within him, and that in this struggle, which is like the struggle of factions in a State, his spirit is on the side of his reason—but for the passionate or spirited element to take part with the desires when reason decides that she should not be opposed, is a sort of thing which I believe that you never observed occurring in yourself, nor as I should imagine, in any one else?

Certainly not.

Suppose that a man thinks he has done a wrong to another the nobler he is the less able is he to feel ind gnant at any suffering such as hunger or cold, or any other pain which the injured person may inflict upon him—these he deems to be just, and, as I say his anger refuses to be excited by them.

True, he said

But when he thinks that he is the sufferer of the wrong, then he boils and chafes, and is on the side of what he believes to be justice and because he suffers hunger or cold or other pain he is only the more determined to persevere and conquer His noble spirit will not be quelled until he either slays or is slain or until he hears the voice of the shepherd, that is, reason, bidding his dog bark no more.

The illustration is perfect, he replied and in our State, as we were saying the auxiliaries were to be dogs, and to hear the voice of the rulers, who are their shepherds

I perceive, I said, that you quite understand me there is, however a further point which I wish you to consider

What point?

You remember that passion or spirit appeared at first sight to be a kind of desire, but now we should say quite the contrary for in the conflict of the soul spirit is arrayed on the side of the rational principle.

Most assuredly

But a further question arises Is passion different from reason also or only a kind of reason in which latter case instead of three principles in the soul [441] there will only be two the rational and the concupiscent or rather as the State was composed of three classes, traders, auxiliaries, counsellors, so may there not be in the individual soul a third element which is passion or spirit, and when not corrupted by bad education is the natural auxiliary of reason?

Yes, he said, there must be a third

Yes, I replied, if passion which has already been shown to be different from desire, turn out also to be different from reason.

But that is easily proved —We may observe even in young children that they are full of spirit almost as soon as they are born, whereas some of them never seem to attain to the use of reason and most of them late enough.

Excellent, I said, and you may see passion equally in brute animals, which is a further proof of the truth of what you are saying And we may once more appeal to the words of Homer which have been already quoted by us,

He smote his breast and thus rebuked his heart for in this verse Homer has clearly supposed the power which reasons about the better and worse to be different from the unreasoning anger which is rebuked by it.

Very true, he said.

And so, after much tossing we have reached land, and are fairly agreed that the same principles which exist in the State exist also in the individual and that they are three in number

Exactly

Must we not then infer that the individual is wise in the same way and in virtue of the same quality which makes the State wise?

Certainly

Also that the same quality which constitutes courage in the State constitutes courage in the individual and that both the State and the individual bear the same relation to all the other virtues?

Assuredly

And the individual will be acknowledged by us to be just in the same way in which the State is just?

That follows of course.

We cannot but remember that the justice of the State consisted in each of the three classes doing the work of its own class?

We are not very likely to have forgotten, he said

We must recollect that the individual in

Odyssey xx. 17 quoted supra iii. 390

their correlatives simple

I do not know what you mean

Well you know of course that the greater is relative to the less?

Certainly

And the much greater to the much less?

Yes

And the sometime greater to the sometime less and the greater that is to be to the less that is to be?

Certainly he said

And so of more and less, and of other correlative terms such as the double and the half or again the heavier and the lighter the swifter and the slower and of hot and cold and of any other relatives—is not this true of all of them?

Yes

And does not the same principle hold in the sciences? The object of science is knowledge (assuming that to be the true definition) but the object of a particular science is a particular kind of knowledge I mean for example that the science of house building is a kind of knowledge which is defined and distinguished from other kinds and is therefore termed architecture

Certainly

Because it has a particular quality which no other has?

Yes

And it has this particular quality because it has an object of a particular kind and this is true of the other arts and sciences?

Yes

Now then if I have made myself clear you will understand my original meaning in what I said about relatives My meaning was that if one term of a relation is taken alone the other is taken alone if one term is qualified the other is also qualified I do not mean to say that relatives may not be disparate, or that the science of health is healthy or of disease necessarily diseased or that the sciences of good and evil are therefore good and evil but only that when the term science is no longer used absolutely, but has a qualified object which in this case is the nature of health and disease it becomes defined and is hence called not merely science but the science of medicine

I quite understand, and I think as you do

[439] Would you not say that thirst is one of these essentially relative terms having clearly a relation—

Yes thirst is relative to drink

And a certain kind of thirst is relative to a certain kind of drink but thirst taken alone is neither of much nor little nor of good nor bad, nor of any particular kind of drink, but of drink only?

Certainly

Then the soul of the thirsty one, in so far as he is thirsty desires only drink for this he yearns and tries to obtain it?

That is plain

And if you suppose something which pulls a thirsty soul away from drink that must be different from the thirsty principle which draws him like a beast to drink for as we were saying the same thing cannot at the same time with the same part of itself act in contrary ways about the same

Impossible

No more than you can say that the hands of the archer push and pull the bow at the same time but what you say is that one hand pushes and the other pulls

Exactly so he replied

And might a man be thirsty and yet unwilling to drink?

Yes he said it constantly happens

And in such a case what is one to say? Would you not say that there was something in the soul bidding a man to drink and something else forbidding him which is other and stronger than the principle which bids him?

I should say so

And the forbidding principle is derived from reason and that which bids and attracts proceeds from passion and disease?

Clearly

Then we may fairly assume that they are two and that they differ from one another the one with which a man reasons we may call the rational principle of the soul the other with which he loves and hungers and thirsts and feels the flutterings of any other desire may be termed the irrational or appetitive the ally of sundry pleasures and satisfactions?

Yes he said we may fairly assume them to be different

Then let us finally determine that there are two principles existing in the soul And what of passion or spirit? Is it a third or akin to one of the preceding?

I should be inclined to say—akin to desire

Well I said there is a story which I remember to have heard and in which I put faith The story is that Leontius the son of Aglaion coming up one day from the Piraeus under the north wall on the outside observed some dead bodies lying on the ground at the place of execution He felt a desire to see them and he just man does not permit the several elements within him to interfere with one another or any of them to do the work of others—he sets in order his own inner life and is his own master and his own law and at peace with himself and when he has bound together the three principles within him, which may be compared to the higher lower and middle notes of the scale, and the intermediate intervals—when he has bound all these together and is no longer many but has become one entirely temperate and perfectly adjusted nature, then he proceeds to act, if he has to act, whether in a matter of property or in the treatment of the body or in some affair of politics or private business always thinking and calling that which preserves and co-operates with this harmonious condition, just and good action, and the knowledge which presides over it, wisdom, and that which at any time impairs this condition [444] he will call unjust action, and the opinion which presides over it ignorance.

You have said the exact truth Socrates.

Very good and if we were to affirm that we had discovered the just man and the just State, and the nature of justice in each of them we should not be telling a falsehood?

Most certainly not

May we say so then?

Let us say so

And now I said injustice has to be considered

Clearly

Must not injustice be a strife which arises among the three principles—a meddlesomeness, and interference and rising up of a part of the soul against the whole, an assertion of unlawful authority which is made by a rebellious subject against a true prince, of whom he is the natural vassal—what is all this confusion and delusion but injustice, and intemperance and cowardice and ignorance, and every form of vice?

Exactly so

And if the nature of justice and injustice be known then the meaning of acting unjustly and being unjust, or again, of acting justly will also be perfectly clear?

What do you mean? he said

Why I said they are like disease and health being in the soul just what disease and health are in the body

How so? he said.

Why I said that which is healthy causes health and that which is unhealthy causes disease.

Yes

And just actions cause justice, and unjust actions cause injustice?

That is certain.

And the creation of health is the institution of a natural order and government of one by another in the parts of the body and the creation of disease is the production of a state of things at variance with this natural order?

True

And is not the creation of justice the institution of a natural order and government of one by another in the parts of the soul and the creation of injustice the production of a state of things at variance with the natural order?

Exactly so, he said

Then virtue is the health and beauty and well being of the soul and vice the disease and weakness and deformity of the same?

True.

And do not good practices lead to virtue, and evil practices to vice?

Assuredly

[445] Still our old question of the comparative advantage of justice and injustice has not been answered Which is the more profitable, to be just and act justly and practise virtue, whether seen or unseen of gods and men, or to be unjust and act unjustly if only unpunished and unreformed?

In my judgment, Socrates the question has now become ridiculous. We know that, when the bodily constitution is gone, life is no longer endurable, though pampered with all kinds of meats and drinks, and having all wealth and all power and shall we be told that when the very essence of the vital principle is undermined and corrupted, life is still worth having to a man, if only he be allowed to do whatever he likes with the single exception that he is not to acquire justice and virtue or to escape from injustice and vice assuming them both to be such as we have described?

Yes, I said the question is as you say ridiculous Still as we are near the spot at which we may see the truth in the clearest manner with our own eyes, let us not faint by the way

Certainly not, he replied

Come up hither I said and behold the various forms of vice those of them, I mean, which are worth looking at.

I am following you he replied proceed

I said, The argument seems to have reached a height from which, as from some tower of speculation a man may look down and see that virtue is one, but that the forms of vice are in whom the several qualities of his nature do their own work will be just, and will do his own work?

Yes he said we must remember that too

And ought not the rational principle, which is wise and has the care of the whole soul to rule and the passionate or spirited principle to be the subject and ally?

Certainly

And as we were saying the united influence of music and gymnastic will bring them into accord nerving and sustaining the reason with noble words and lessons [442] and moderating and soothing and civilizing the wildness of passion by harmony and rhythm?

Quite true he said

And these two thus nurtured and educated and having learned truly to know their own functions will rule over the concupiscent which in each of us is the largest part of the soul and by nature most insatiable of gain over this they will keep guard lest waxing great and strong with the fulness of bodily pleasures as they are termed the concupiscent soul no longer confined to her own sphere should attempt to enslave and rule those who are not her natural born subjects and overturn the whole life of man?

Very true he said

Both together will they not be the best defenders of the whole soul and the whole body against attacks from without the one counselling and the other fighting under his leader and courageously executing his commands and counsels?

True

And he is to be deemed courageous whose spirit retains in pleasure and in pain the commands of reason about what he ought or ought not to fear?

Right he replied

And him we call wise who has in him that little part which rules and which proclaims these commands that part too being supposed to have a knowledge of what is for the interest of each of the three parts and of the whole?

Assuredly

And would you not say that he is temperate who has these same elements in friendly harmony in whom the one ruling principle of reason and the two subject ones of spirit and desire are equally agreed that reason ought to rule and do not rebel?

Certainly he said that is the true account of temperance whether in the State or individual

And surely I said we have explained again and again how and by virtue of what quality a man will be just

That is very certain

And is justice dimmer in the individual and is her form different or is she the same which we found her to be in the State?

There is no difference in my opinion he said

Because if any doubt is still lingering in our minds a few commonplace instances will satisfy us of the truth of what I am saying

What sort of instances do you mean?

[443] If the case is put to us must we not admit that the just State or the man who is trained in the principles of such a State will be less likely than the unjust to make away with a deposit of gold or silver? Would any one deny this?

No one, he replied

Will the just man or citizen ever be guilty of sacrilege or theft or treachery either to his friends or to his country?

Never

Neither will he ever break faith where there have been oaths or agreements?

Impossible

No one will be less likely to commit adultery or to dishonour his father and mother or to fail in his religious duties?

No one

And the reason is that each part of him is doing its own business whether in ruling or being ruled?

Exactly so

Are you satisfied then that the quality which makes such men and such states is justice, or do you hope to discover some other?

Not I indeed

Then our dream has been realized and the suspicion which we entertained at the beginning of our work of construction that some divine power must have conducted us to a primary form of justice has now been verified?

Yes certainly

And the division of labour which required the carpenter and the shoemaker and the rest of the citizens to be doing each his own business and not another's was a shadow of justice and for that reason it was of use?

Clearly

But in reality justice was such as we were describing being concerned however not with the outward man but with the inward which is the true self and concernment of man for the just man does not permit the several elements within him to interfere with one another or any of them to do the work of others —he sets in order his own inner life, and is his own master and his own law and at peace with himself and when he has bound together the three principles within him, which may be compared to the higher lower and middle notes of the scale, and the intermediate intervals—when he has bound all these together and is no longer many but has become one entirely temperate and perfectly adjusted nature, then he proceeds to act, if he has to act, whether in a matter of property or in the treatment of the body or in some affair of politics or private business always thinking and calling that which preserves and co-operates with this harmonious condition, just and good action, and the knowledge wh ch presides over it, wisdom, and that which at any time impairs this condition, [444] he will call unjust action and the opinion which presides over it ignorance.

You have said the exact truth, Socrates.

Very good and if we were to affirm that we had discovered the just man and the just State, and the nature of justice in ea h of them, we should not be telling a falsehood?

Most certainly not.

May we say so then?

Let us say so

And now I said, injustice has to be considered

Clearly

Must not injustice be a strife which arises among the three principles—a meddlesomeness, and interference and rising up of a part of the soul against the whole, an assertion of unlawful authority which is made by a rebellious subject against a true prince, of whom he is the natural vassal—what is all this confusion and delusion but injustice, and intemperance and coward ce and ignorance, and every form of vice?

And these two thus nurtured and educated and having learned truly to know their own functions will rule over the concupiscent which in each of us is the largest part of the soul and by nature most insatiable of gain over this they will keep guard lest waxing great and strong with the fulness of bodily pleasures as they are termed the concupiscent soul, no longer confined to her own sphere should attempt to enslave and rule those who are not her natural born subjects and overturn the whole life of man?

Very true he said

Both together will they not be the best defenders of the whole soul and the whole body against attacks from without the one counselling and the other fighting under his leader, and courageously executing his commands and counsels?

True

And he is to be deemed courageous whose spirit retains in pleasure and in pain the commands of reason about what he ought or ought not to fear?

Right, he replied

And him we call wise who has in him that little part which rules and which proclaims these commands that part too being supposed to have a knowledge of what is for the interest of each of the three parts and of the whole?

Assuredly

And would you not say that he is temperate who has these same elements in friendly harmony in whom the one ruling principle of reason and the two subject ones of spirit and desire are equally agreed that reason ought to rule and do not rebel?

Certainly he said that is the true account of temperance whether in the State or individual

And surely I said we have explained again and again how and by virtue of what quality a man will be just

That is very certain

And is justice dimmer in the individual and is her form different or is she the same which we found her to be in the State?

There is no difference in my opinion, he said

Because, if any doubt is still lingering in our minds a few commonplace instances will satisfy us of the truth of what I am saying

What sort of instances do you mean?

[443] If the case is put to us must we not admit that the just State, or the man who is trained in the principles of such a State, will be less likely than the unjust to make away with a deposit of gold or silver? Would any one deny this?

No one he replied

Will the just man or citizen ever be guilty of sacrilege or theft or treachery either to his friends or to his country?

Never

Neither will he ever break faith where there have been oaths or agreements?

Impossible

No one will be less likely to commit adultery or to dishonour his father and mother or to fail in his religious duties?

No one

And the reason is that each part of him is doing its own business whether in ruling or being ruled?

Exactly so

Are you satisfied then that the quality which makes such men and such states is justice, or do you hope to discover some other?

Not I indeed

Then our dream has been realized and the suspicion which we entertained at the beginning of our work of construction that some divine power must have conducted us to a primary form of justice has now been verified?

Yes certainly

And the division of labour which required the carpenter and the shoemaker and the rest of the citizens to be doing each his own business and not another's was a shadow of justice and for that reason it was of use?

Clearly

But in reality justice was such as we were describing being concerned however not with the outward man but with the inward which is the true self and concernment of man for would be for the best, is also doubtful Hence I feel a reluctance to approach the subject lest our aspiration, my dear friend, should turn out to be a dream only

Fear not, he replied, for your audience will not be hard upon you they are not sceptical or hostile.

I said My good friend I suppose that you mean to encourage me by these words.

Yes, he said.

Then let me tell you that you are doing just the reverse, the encouragement which you offer would have been all very well had I myself believed that I knew what I was talking about to declare the truth about matters of high interest which a man honours and loves among wise men who love him need occasion no fear or faltering in his mind but to carry on an argument when you are yourself only a hesitating enquirer [451] which is my condition, is a dangerous and slippery thing and the danger is not that I shall be laughed at (of which the fear would be childish) but that I shall miss the truth where I have most need to be sure of my footing and drag my friends after me in my fall And I pray Nemesis not to visit upon me the words which I am going to utter For I do indeed believe that to be an involuntary homicide is a less crime than to be a deceiver about beauty or goodness or justice in the matter of laws And that is a risk which I would rather run among enemies than among friends, and therefore you do well to encourage me.

Glaucon laughed and said Well then Socrates, in case you and your argument do us any serious injury you shall be acquitted beforehand of the homicide, and shall not be held to be a deceiver take courage then and speak.

Well I said, the law says that when a man is acquitted he is free from guilt, and what holds at law may hold in argument.

Then why should you mind?

Well I replied, I suppose that I must retrace my steps and say what I perhaps ought to have said before in the proper place. The part of the men has been played out, and now properly enough comes the turn of the women. Of them I will proceed to speak, and the more readily since I am invited by you.

For men born and educated like our citizens, the only way in my opinion of arriving at a right conclusion about the possession and use of women and children is to follow the path on which we originally started, when we said that the men were to be the guardians and watchdogs of the herd

True.

Let us further suppose the birth and education of our women to be subject to similar or nearly similar regulations then we shall see whether the result accords with our design.

What do you mean?

What I mean may be put into the form of a question, I said Are dogs divided into hes and shes, or do they both share equally in hunting and in keeping watch and in the other duties of dogs? or do we entrust to the males the entire and exclusive care of the flocks, while we leave the females at home, under the idea that the bearing and suckling their puppies is labour enough for them?

No, he said, they share alike the only difference between them is that the males are stronger and the females weaker

But can you use different animals for the same purpose, unless they are bred and fed in the same way?

You cannot.

Then, if women are to have the same duties as men, they must have the same nurture and education? [452]

Yes.

The education which was assigned to the men was music and gymnastic.

Yes.

Then women must be taught music and gymnastic and also the art of war which they must practise like the men?

That is the inference, I suppose.

I should rather expect, I said that several of our proposals, if they are carried out, being unusual may appear ridiculous.

No doubt of it.

Yes, and the most ridiculous thing of all will be the sight of women naked in the palaestra, exercising with the men, especially when they are no longer young they certainly will not be a vision of beauty any more than the enthusiastic old men who in spite of wrinkles and ugliness continue to frequent the gymnasia.

Yes indeed, he said according to present notions the proposal would be thought ridiculous.

But then I said, as we have determined to speak our minds, we must not fear the jests of the wits which will be directed against this sort of innovation how they will talk of women's attainments both in music and gymnastic, and above all about their wearing armour and riding upon horseback!

numerable there being four special ones which are deserving of note

What do you mean? he said

I mean, I replied that there appear to be as many forms of the soul as there are distinct forms of the State

How many?

There are five of the State and five of the soul I said

What are they?

The first, I said is that which we have been describing and which may be said to have two names monarchy and aristocracy accordingly as rule is exercised by one distinguished man or by many

True he replied

But I regard the two names as describing one form only, for whether the government is in the hands of one or many if the governors have been trained in the manner which we have supposed the fundamental laws of the State will be maintained

That is true he replied

BOOK V

[449] SUCH is the good and true City or State and the good and true man is of the same pattern and if this is right every other is wrong and the evil is one which affects not only the ordering of the State but also the regulation of the individual soul and is exhibited in four forms

What are they? he said

I was proceeding to tell the order in which the four evil forms appeared to me to succeed one another when Polemarchus who was sitting a little way off just beyond Adeimantus began to whisper to him stretching forth his hand he took hold of the upper part of his coat by the shoulder and drew him towards him leaning forward himself so as to be quite close and saying something in his ear of which I only caught the words Shall we let him off or what shall we do?

Certainly not said Adeimantus raising his voice

Who is it I said whom you are refusing to let off?

You he said

I repeated Why am I especially not to be let off?

Why he said we think that you are lazy and mean to cheat us out of a whole chapter which is a very important part of the story and you fancy that we shall not notice your airy way of proceeding as if it were self-evident to everybody that in the matter of women and children friends have all things in common

And was I not right, Adeimantus?

Yes he said but what is right in this particular case like everything else, requires to be explained for community may be of many kinds Please, therefore to say what sort of community you mean We have been long expecting that you would tell us something about the family life of your citizens—how they will bring children into the world and rear them when they have arrived, and in general what is the nature of this community of women and children—for we are of opinion that the right or wrong management of such matters will have a great and paramount influence on the State for good or for evil And now since the question is still undetermined and you are taking in hand another State we have resolved as you heard [450] not to let you go until you give an account of all this

To that resolution, said Glaucon you may regard me as saying Agreed

And without more ado said Thrasymachus, you may consider us all to be equally agreed

I said You know not what you are doing in thus assailing me What an argument are you raising about the State! Just as I thought that I had finished and was only too glad that I had laid this question to sleep and was reflecting how fortunate I was in your acceptance of what I then said you ask me to begin again at the very foundation ignorant of what a hornet s nest of words you are stirring Now I foresaw this gathering trouble, and avoided it

For what purpose do you conceive that we have come here said Thrasymachus—to look for gold or to hear discourse?

Yes but discourse should have a limit

Yes Socrates said Glaucon and the whole of life is the only limit which wise men assign to the hearing of such discourses. But never mind about us take heart yourself and answer the question in your own way What sort of community of women and children is this which is to prevail among our guardians? and how shall we manage the period between birth and education which seems to require the greatest care? Tell us how these things will be

Yes my simple friend but the answer is the reverse of easy many more doubts arise about this than about our previous conclusions For the practicability of what is said may be doubted and looked at in another point of view whether the scheme if ever so practicable

Why no, he said that was never considered by us

I said Suppose that by way of illustration we were to ask the question whether there is not an opposition in nature between bald men and hairy men and if this is admitted by us, then if bald men are cobblers, we should for bid the hairy men to be cobblers and converse ly?

That would be a jest, he sa d

Yes, I said, a jest and why? because we never meant when we constructed the State, that the opposition of natures should extend to every difference, but only to those differences which affected the pursuit in which the individual is engaged we should have argued, for example that a physician and one who is in mind a physician may be said to have the same nature.

True

Whereas the physician and the carpenter have different natures?

Certainly

And if I said the male and female sex appear to differ in their fitness for any art or pursuit we should say that such pursuit or art ought to be assigned to one or the other of them but if the difference consists only in women bearing and men begetting children, this does not amount to a proof that a woman differs from a man in respect of the sort of education she should receive and we shall there fore continue to maintain that our guardians and their wives ought to have the same pur suits

Very true he said

Next, we shall ask our opponent how in ref erence to any of the pursuits or arts of civic life [455] the nature of a woman differs from th t of a man?

That will be quite fair

And perhaps he, like yourself, will reply that to gi e a sufficient answer on the instant is not easy but after a little reflection there is no dif ficulty

Yes, perhaps

S ppose then that we invite him to accom pany us in the argument and then we may hope to show him that there is nothing peculiar in the constitution of women which would af fect them in the administration of the State.

By all means

Let us say to him Come now and we will a k you a question —when y u spoke of a na tu e gifted or not gifted in any respect, did you mean to say that one man will acquire a thing easily another with difficulty a little learning will lead the one to discover a great deal whereas the other after much study and application no sooner learns than he forgets or again did you mean that the one has a body which is a good servant to his mind while the body of the other is a hindrance to him?—would not these be the sort of differences which distinguish the man gifted by nature from the one who is ungifted?

No one will deny that

And can you mention any pursuit of man kind in which the male sex has not all these gifts and qualities in a higher degree than the female? Need I waste time in speaking of the art of weaving and the management of pan cakes and preserves in which womankind does really appear to be great, and in which for her to be beaten by a man is of all things the most absurd?

You are quite right he replied in maintain ing the general inferiority of the female sex although many women are in many things su perior to many men yet on the whole what you say is true

And if so my friend I said there is no special faculty of administration in a state which a woman has because she is a woman, or which a man has by virtue of his sex, but the g fts of nature are alike diffused in both all the pursuits of men are the pursuits of women also but in all of them a woman is inferior to a man

Very true

Then are we to impose all our enactments on men and none of them on women?

That will never do

[456] One woman has a gift of healing an other not one is a musician and another has no music in her nature?

Very true

And one woman has a turn for gymnastic and military exercises and another is unwar like and hates gymnastics?

Certainly

And one woman is a philosopher and an other is an enemy of philosophy one has spirit and another is without spirit?

That is also true.

Then one woman will have the temper of a guardian and another not. Was not the selec tion of the male guardians determined by dif ferences of th s sort?

Yes

Men and women alike possess the qualities wh ch make a guardian they differ only in their comparative strength or weakness

Very true he replied

Yet having begun we must go forward to the rough places of the law at the same time begging of these gentlemen for once in their life to be serious Not long ago as we shall remind them the Hellenes were of the opinion which is still generally received among the barbarians that the sight of a naked man was ridiculous and improper and when first the Cretans and then the Lacedaemonians introduced the custom the wits of that day might equally have ridiculed the innovation

No doubt

But when experience showed that to let all things be uncovered was far better than to cover them up and the ludicrous effect to the outward eye vanished before the better principle which reason asserted then the man was perceived to be a fool who directs the shafts of his ridicule at any other sight but that of folly and vice or seriously inclines to weigh the beautiful by any other standard but that of the good

Very true he replied

First then whether the question is to be put in jest or in earnest let us come to an understanding about the nature of woman [453] Is she capable of sharing either wholly or partially in the actions of men or not at all? And is the art of war one of those arts in which she can or can not share? That will be the best way of commencing the enquiry and will probably lead to the fairest conclusion

That will be much the best way

Shall we take the other side first and begin by arguing against ourselves in this manner the adversary s position will not be undefended

Why not? he said

Then let us put a speech into the mouths of our opponents They will say Socrates and Glaucon no adversary need convict you for you yourselves at the first foundation of the State admitted the principle that everybody was to do the one work suited to his own nature And certainly if I am not mistaken such an admission was made by us And do not the natures of men and women differ very much indeed? And we shall reply Of course they do Then we shall be asked Whether the tasks assigned to men and to women should not be different and such as are agreeable to their different natures? Certainly they should But if so have you not fallen into a serious inconsistency in saying that men and women whose natures are so entirely different ought to perform the same actions? —What defence will you make for us my good Sir, against any one who offers these objections?

That is not an easy question to answer when asked suddenly and I shall and I do beg of you to draw out the case on our side

These are the objections Glaucon and there are many others of a like kind which I foresaw long ago, they made me afraid and reluctant to take in hand any law about the possession and nurture of women and children

By Zeus he said the problem to be solved is anything but easy

Why yes I said but the fact is that when a man is out of his depth whether he has fallen into a little swimming bath or into mid-ocean he has to swim all the same

Very true

And must not we swim and try to reach the shore we will hope that Arion s dolphin or some other miraculous help may save us?

I suppose so he said

Well then let us see if any way of escape can be found We acknowledged—did we not? that different natures ought to have different pursuits and that men s and women s natures are different And now what are we saying?—that different natures ought to have the same pursuits—this is the inconsistency which is charged upon us [454] Verily Glaucon I said glorious is the power of the art of contradiction!

Precisely

Why do you say so?

Because I think that many a man falls into the practice against his will When he thinks that he is reasoning he is really disputing just because he cannot define and divide and so know that of which he is speaking and he will pursue a merely verbal opposition in the spirit of contention and not of fair discussion

Yes he replied such is very often the case but what has that to do with us and our argument?

A great deal for there is certainly a danger of our getting unintentionally into a verbal opposition

In what way?

Why we valiantly and pugnaciously insist upon the verbal truth that different natures ought to have different pursuits but we never considered at all what was the meaning of sameness or difference of nature or why we distinguished them when we assigned different pursuits to different natures and the same to the same natures

combined, I replied Now I meant that you should admit the utility and in this way as I thought I should escape from one of them, and then there would remain only the possibility

But that little attempt is detected and there fore you will please to give a defence of both

Well I said I submit to my fate Yet grant me a little favour let me feast my mind with the dream as day dreamers are in the [458] habit of feasting themselves when they are walking alone for before they have discovered any means of effecting their wishes—that is a matter which never troubles them—they would rather not tire themselves by thinking about possibilities but assuming that what they de sire is already granted to them they proceed with their plan and delight in detailing what they mean to do when their wish has come true —that s a way which they have of not doing much good to a capacity wh ch was never good for much Now I myself am beginning to lose heart and I should like, with your permission to pass over the question of poss bil ty at present. Assuming therefore the poss bility of the proposal I shall now proceed to enquire how the rulers will carry out these arrangements, and I shall demonstrate that our plan, if exe cuted will be of the greatest benefit to the State and to the guardians First of all then if you have no objection I will endeavour with your help to consider the advantages of the measure and he eafter the question of possibility

I have no objection proceed

F rst, I think that if our rulers and their auxiliaries are to be worthy of the name which they bear there must be willingness to obey in the one and the power f command in the other the guardians must themsel es obey the laws and they must also imitate the spirit of them in any details which are entrusted to their care

That s right he said

You I said who are their legislator having selected the men, will now select the women and gi e them to them—they must be as far as possible of l ke natures with them and they must li e in common houses and meet at com mon meals. None of them will have anyth ng specially h s or her own they will be together and will be brought up together and will as sociate at gymnastic exercises And so they will be drawn by a necessity of their natures to have intercourse w th each other—necessity is not too strong a word I think?

Yes, he sa d—necessity not geometrical, but another sort of necessity which lovers know and which is far more convincing and con straining to the mass of mankind

True I said and this, Glaucon like all the rest must proceed after an orderly fashion in a city of the blessed licentiousness is an unholy thing which the rulers will forbid

Yes he said and it ought not to be permitted

Then clearly the next thing will be to make matrimony sacred in the highest degree, and what is most beneficial will be deemed sacred?

[459] Exactly

And how can marriages be made most beneficial?—that is a question which I put to you because I see in your house dogs for hunting and of the nobler sort of birds not a few Now I beseech you, do tell me have you ever attended to their pairing and breeding?

In what particulars?

Why in the first place although they are all of a good sort, are not some better than others?

True

And do you breed from them all indifferently or do you take care to breed from the best only?

From the best

And do you take the oldest or the youngest, or only those of ripe age?

I choose only those of ripe age

And if care was not taken in the breeding your dogs and birds would greatly deteriorate?

Certainly

And the same of horses and animals in general?

Undoubtedly

Good hea ens! my dear friend, I said what consummate skill will our rulers need if the same principle holds of the human species!

Certainly the same principle holds but why does this involve any particular skill?

Because, I said our rulers will often have to practise upon the body corporate with medicines Now you know that when patients do not require medicines, but have only to be put under a regimen the inferior sort of practi t oner is deemed to be good enough but when medicine has to be given then the doctor should be more of a man

That is qu te true he said but to what are you alluding?

I mean I replied, that our rulers will find a consid rable dose of falsehood and deceit necessary for the good of their subjects we were saying that the use of all these things regarded as medicines might be of advantage.

And we were very right.

Obviously

And those women who have such qualities are to be selected as the companions and colleagues of men who have similar qualities and whom they resemble in capacity and in character?

Very true

And ought not the same natures to have the same pursuits?

They ought

Then as we were saying before there is nothing unnatural in assigning music and gymnastic to the wives of the guardians—to that point we come round again

Certainly not

The law which we then enacted was agreeable to nature and therefore not an impossibility or mere aspiration and the contrary practice which prevails at present is in reality a violation of nature

That appears to be true

We had to consider first whether our proposals were possible and secondly whether they were the most beneficial?

Yes

And the possibility has been acknowledged?

Yes

The very great benefit has next to be established?

Quite so

You will admit that the same education which makes a man a good guardian will make a woman a good guardian for their original nature is the same?

Yes

I should like to ask you a question

What is it?

Would you say that all men are equal in excellence or is one man better than another?

The latter

And in the commonwealth which we were founding do you conceive the guardians who have been brought up on our model system to be more perfect men or the cobblers whose education has been cobbling?

What a ridiculous question!

You have answered me I replied Well and may we not further say that our guardians are the best of our citizens?

By far the best

And will not their wives be the best women?

Yes by far the best

And can there be anything better for the interests of the State than that the men and women of a State should be as good as possible?

There can be nothing better

[457] And this is what the arts of music and gymnastic when present in such manner as we have described will accomplish?

Certainly

Then we have made an enactment not only possible but in the highest degree beneficial to the State?

True

Then let the wives of our guardians strip, for their virtue will be their robe, and let them share in the toils of war and the defence of their country only in the distribution of labours the lighter are to be assigned to the women who are the weaker natures but in other respects their duties are to be the same And as for the man who laughs at naked women exercising their bodies from the best of motives, in his laughter he is plucking

A fruit of unripe wisdom and he himself is ignorant of what he is laughing at or what he is about—for that is, and ever will be the best of sayings That the useful is the noble and the hurtful is the base

Very true

Here then is one difficulty in our law about women which we may say that we have now escaped the wave has not swallowed us up alive for enacting that the guardians of either sex should have all their pursuits in common to the utility and also to the possibility of this arrangement the consistency of the argument with itself bears witness

Yes that was a mighty wave which you have escaped

Yes I said but a greater is coming you will not think much of this when you see the next.

Go on let me see

The law I said which is the sequel of this and of all that has preceded is to the following effect— that the wives of our guardians are to be common and their children are to be common and no parent is to know his own child nor any child his parent

Yes he said that is a much greater wave than the other and the possibility as well as the utility of such a law are far more questionable

I do not think I said that there can be any dispute about the very great utility of having wives and children in common the possibility is quite another matter and will be very much disputed

I think that a good many doubts may be raised about both

You imply that the two questions must be combined, I replied. Now I meant that you should admit the utility; and in this way, as I thought, I should escape from one of them, and then there would remain only the possibility.

But that little attempt is detected, and therefore you will please to give a defence of both.

Well, I said, I submit to my fate. Yet grant me a little favour: let me feast my mind with the dream as day dreamers are in the [458] habit of feasting themselves when they are walking alone; for before they have discovered any means of effecting their wishes—that is a matter which never troubles them—they would rather not tire themselves by thinking about possibilities; but assuming that what they desire is already granted to them, they proceed with their plan, and delight in detailing what they mean to do when their wish has come true—that is a way which they have of not doing much good to a capacity which was never good for much. Now I myself am beginning to lose heart, and I should like, with your permission, to pass over the question of possibility at present. Assuming therefore the possibility of the proposal, I shall now proceed to enquire how the rulers will carry out these arrangements, and I shall demonstrate that our plan, if executed, will be of the greatest benefit to the State and to the guardians. First of all, then, if you have no objection, I will endeavour with your help to consider the advantages of the measure; and hereafter the question of possibility.

I have no objection; proceed.

First, I think that if our rulers and their auxiliaries are to be worthy of the name which they bear, there must be willingness to obey in the one and the power of command in the other; the guardians must themselves obey the laws, and they must also imitate the spirit of them in any details which are entrusted to their care.

That is right, he said.

You, I said, who are their legislator, having selected the men, will now select the women and give them to them;—they must be as far as possible of like natures with them; and they must live in common houses and meet at common meals. None of them will have anything specially his or her own; they will be together, and will be brought up together, and will associate at gymnastic exercises. And so they will be drawn by a necessity of their natures to have intercourse with each other—necessity is not too strong a word, I think?

Yes, he said;—necessity, not geometrical, but another sort of necessity which lovers know, and which is far more convincing and constraining to the mass of mankind.

True, I said; and this, Glaucon, like all the rest, must proceed after an orderly fashion; in a city of the blessed, licentiousness is an unholy thing which the rulers will forbid.

Yes, he said, and it ought not to be permitted.

Then clearly the next thing will be to make matrimony sacred in the highest degree, and what is most beneficial will be deemed sacred?

[459] Exactly.

And how can marriages be made most beneficial?—that is a question which I put to you, because I see in your house dogs for hunting, and of the nobler sort of birds not a few. Now, I beseech you, do tell me, have you ever attended to their pairing and breeding?

In what particulars?

Why, in the first place, although they are all of a good sort, are not some better than others?

True.

And do you breed from them all indifferently, or do you take care to breed from the best only?

From the best.

And do you take the oldest or the youngest, or only those of ripe age?

I choose only those of ripe age.

And if care was not taken in the breeding, your dogs and birds would greatly deteriorate?

Certainly.

And the same of horses and animals in general?

Undoubtedly.

Good heavens! my dear friend, I said, what consummate skill will our rulers need if the same principle holds of the human species!

Certainly, the same principle holds; but why does this involve any particular skill?

Because, I said, our rulers will often have to practise upon the body corporate with medicines. Now you know that when patients do not require medicines, but have only to be put under a regimen, the inferior sort of practitioner is deemed to be good enough; but when medicine has to be given, then the doctor should be more of a man.

That is quite true, he said; but to what are you alluding?

I mean, I replied, that our rulers will find a considerable dose of falsehood and deceit necessary for the good of their subjects: we were saying that the use of all these things regarded as medicines might be of advantage.

And we were very right.

And this lawful use of them seems likely to be often needed in the regulations of marriages and births

How so?

Why I said, the principle has been already laid down that the best of either sex should be united with the best as often and the inferior with the inferior as seldom as possible and that they should rear the offspring of the one sort of union, but not of the other if the flock is to be maintained in first rate condition Now these goings on must be a secret which the rulers only know, or there will be a further danger of our herd as the guardians may be termed breaking out into rebellion

Very true

Had we not better appoint certain festivals at which we will bring together the brides and bridegrooms [460] and sacrifices will be offered and suitable hymeneal songs composed by our poets the number of weddings is a matter which must be left to the discretion of the rulers whose aim will be to preserve the average of population? There are many other things which they will have to consider such as the effects of wars and diseases and any similar agencies in order as far as this is possible to prevent the State from becoming either too large or too small

Certainly he replied

We shall have to invent some ingenious kind of lots which the less worthy may draw on each occasion of our bringing them together and then they will accuse their own ill luck and not the rulers

To be sure he said

And I think that our braver and better youth besides their other honours and rewards might have greater facilities of intercourse with women given them their bravery will be a reason, and such fathers ought to have as many sons as possible

True

And the proper officers whether male or female or both for offices are to be held by women as well as by men—

Yes—

The proper officers will take the offspring of the good parents to the pen or fold and there they will deposit them with certain nurses who dwell in a separate quarter but the offspring of the inferior or of the better when they chance to be deformed will be put away in some mysterious, unknown place as they should be

Yes he said that must be done if the breed of the guardians is to be kept pure.

They will provide for their nurture, and will bring the mothers to the fold when they are full of milk taking the greatest possible care that no mother recognises her own child and other wet nurses may be engaged if more are required Care will also be taken that the process of suckling shall not be protracted too long and the mothers will have no getting up at night or other trouble, but will hand over all this sort of thing to the nurses and attendants

You suppose the wives of our guardians to have a fine easy time of it when they are having children

Why said I, and so they ought. Let us however proceed with our scheme We were saying that the parents should be in the prime of life?

Very true

And what is the prime of life? May it not be defined as a period of about twenty years in a woman s life and thirty in a man s?

Which years do you mean to include?

A woman I said at twenty years of age may begin to bear children to the State and continue to bear them until forty a man may begin at five and twenty when he has passed the point at which the pulse of life beats quickest, and continue to beget children until he be fifty five

[461] Certainly he said both in men and women those years are the prime of physical as well as of intellectual vigour

Any one above or below the prescribed ages who takes part in the public hymeneals shall be said to have done an unholy and unrighteous thing the child of which he is the father, if it steals into life will have been conceived under auspices very unlike the sacrifices and prayers which at each hymeneal priestesses and priests and the whole city will offer that the new generation may be better and more useful than their good and useful parents whereas his child will be the offspring of darkness and strange lust

Very true he replied

And the same law will apply to any one of those within the prescribed age who forms a connection with any woman in the prime of life without the sanction of the rulers for we shall say that he is raising up a bastard to the State uncertified and unconsecrated

Very true he replied

This applies however only to those who are within the specified age after that we allow them to range at will except that a man may not marry his daughter or his daughter s daughter or his mother or his mother s mother and women, on the other hand are prohib ted from marrying their sons or fathers or son s son or father s father and so on in either direction And we grant all this, accompanying the permission with strict orders to prevent any embryo which may come into being from seeing the light and if any force a way to the birth, the parents must understand that the offspring of such an union cannot be maintained, and arrange accordingly

That also he said is a reasonable proposition But h w will they know who are fathers and daughters and so on?

They will never know The way will be this —dating from the day of the hymeneal the bridegroom who was then married will call all the male children who are born in the se enth and ten month afterwards his sons and the female children his daughters, and they will call him father and he will call their children his grandchildren and they will call the elder generation grandfathers and grandmothers. All who were begotten at the time when their fathers and mothers came together ill be called their brothers and sisters, and these, as I was saying will be forbidden to intermarry This, howe er is not to be understood as an absolute pr hibition of the marria e of brothers and sisters if the lot favours them, and they receive the sanction of the Pythian oracle, the law will allow them

Qu te right, he repl ed

Such is the scheme, Glaucon, according to which th guardians of our State are to have their wi es and families in common. And now you would have the argument show that this community is consistent w th the rest of our pol ty and also that nothing can be better—would y u not?

[462] Yes, certainly

Shall we try to find a common basis by asking of oursel es what ought to be the chief aim f the legislator in making laws and in the rganization of a State—what is the greatest good, and what is the greatest evil and then consider whether our previous description has th stamp of the good or of the e il?

By all means.

Can there be any greater evil than discord and distraction and plurality where unity ought to reign? or any greater good than the bo d of unity?

There cannot.

And there is unity where there is community of pleasures and pains—where all the citizens are glad or grieved on the same occasions of joy and sorrow?

No doubt.

Yes and where there is no common but only private feeling a State is disorganized—when you have one half of the world triumphing and the other plunged in grief at the same events happening to the city or the citizens?

Certainly

Such differences commonly originate in a disagreement about the use of the terms mine" and not mine," his" and "not his.

Exactly so

And is not that the best-ordered State in which the greatest number of persons apply the terms mine" and not mine" in the same way to the same thing?

Quite true.

Or that again which most nearly approaches to the condition of the individual—as in the body when but a finger of one of us is hurt the whole frame drawn towards the soul as a centre and forming one kingdom under the ruling power therein, feels the hurt and sympathizes all together with the part affected and we say that the man has a pain in his finger and the same expression is used about any other part of the body which has a sensation of pain at suffering or of pleasure at the alleviation of suffering

Very true he replied and I agree with you that in the best-ordered State there is the nearest approach to this common feeling which you describe

Then when any one of the citizens experiences any good or evil the whole State will make his case their own, and will either rejoice or sorrow with him?

Yes, he said, that is what will happen in a well-ordered State

It will now be time, I said for us to return to our State and see whether this or some other form is most in accordance with these fundamental principles.

Very good

[463] Our State like every other has rulers and subjects?

True.

All of whom will call one another citizens?

Of course.

But is there not another name which people give to their rulers in other States?

Generally they call them masters, but in democratic States they simply call them rulers.

And in our State what other name besides that of citizens do the people give the rulers?

They are called saviours and helpers, he replied

And what do the rulers call the people?

Their maintainers and foster fathers

And what do they call them in other States?

Slaves

And what do the rulers call one another in other States?

Fellow rulers

And what in ours?

Fellow guardians

Did you ever know an example in any other State of a ruler who would speak of one of his colleagues as his friend and of another as not being his friend?

Yes very often

And the friend he regards and describes as one in whom he has an interest and the other as a stranger in whom he has no interest?

Exactly

But would any of your guardians think or speak of any other guardian as a stranger?

Certainly he would not for every one whom they meet will be regarded by them either as a brother or sister or father or mother or son or daughter or as the child of parent of those who are thus connected with him

Capital I said but let me ask you once more Shall they be a family in name only or shall they in all their actions be true to the name? For example in the use of the word father would the care of a father be implied and the filial reverence and duty and obedience to him which the law commands and is the violator of these duties to be regarded as an impious and unrighteous person who is not likely to receive much good either at the hands of God or of man? Are these to be or not to be the strains which the children will hear repeated in their ears by all the citizens about those who are intimated to them to be their parents and the rest of their kinsfolk?

These he said and none other for what can be more ridiculous than for them to utter the names of family ties with the lips only and not to act in the spirit of them?

Then in our city the language of harmony and concord will be more often heard than in any other As I was describing before when any one is well or ill, the universal word will be with me it is well or it is ill

[464] Most true

And agreeably to this mode of thinking and speaking were we not saying that they will have their pleasures and pains in common?

Yes and so they will

And they will have a common interest in the same thing which they will alike call my own, and having this common interest they will have a common feeling of pleasure and pain?

Yes far more so than in other States.

And the reason of this over and above the general constitution of the State will be that the guardians will have a community of women and children?

That will be the chief reason

And this unity of feeling we admitted to be the greatest good as was implied in our own comparison of a well ordered State to the relation of the body and the members when affected by pleasure or pain?

That we acknowledged and very rightly

Then the community of wives and children among our citizens is clearly the source of the greatest good to the State?

Certainly

And this agrees with the other principle which we were affirming—that the guardians were not to have houses or lands or any other property their pay was to be their food which they were to receive from the other citizens, and they were to have no private expenses for we intended them to preserve their true character of guardians

Right he replied

Both the community of property and the community of families as I am saying tend to make them more truly guardians they will not tear the city in pieces by differing about mine and not mine each man dragging any acquisition which he has made into a separate house of his own where he has a separate wife and children and private pleasures and pains but all will be affected as far as may be by the same pleasures and pains because they are all of one opinion about what is near and dear to them and therefore they all tend towards a common end

Certainly he replied

And as they have nothing but their persons which they can call their own suits and complaints will have no existence among them they will be delivered from all those quarrels of which money or children or relations are the occasion

Of course they will

Neither will trials for assault or insult ever be likely to occur among them For that equals should defend themselves against equals we hall maintain to be honourable and right [465] we shall make the protection of the person a matter of necessity

That is good he said

Yes and there is a further good in the law viz., that if a man has a quarrel with another he will satisfy his resentment then and there, and not proceed to more dangerous lengths

Certainly

To the elder shall be assigned the duty of ruling and chastising the younger

Clearly

Nor can there be a doubt that the younger will not strike or do any other violence to an elder unless the magistrates command him nor will he slight him in any way For there are two guardians, shame and fear mighty to prevent him shame which makes men refrain from laying hands on those who are to them in the relation of parents fear that the injured one will be succoured by the others who are his brothers sons, fathers

That is true he replied

Then in every way the laws will help the citizens to keep the peace with one another?

Yes, there will be no want of peace.

And as the guardians will never quarrel among themselves there will be no danger of the rest of the city being divided either against them or against one another

None whatever

I hardly like even to mention the little meannesses of which they will be rid, for they are beneath notice such for example, as the flattery of the rich by the poor and all the pains and pangs which men experience in bringing up a family and in finding money to buy necessaries for their household, borrowing and then repudiating getting how they can, and giving the money into the hands of women and slaves to keep—the many evils of so many kinds which people suffer in this way are mean enough and obvious enough, and not worth speaking of

Yes, he said, a man has no need of eyes in order to perceive that.

And from all these evils they will be delivered and their life will be blessed as the life of Olympic victors and yet more blessed.

How so?

The Olympic victor I said, is deemed happy in receiving a part only of the blessedness which is secured to our citizens who have won a more glorious victory and have a more complete maintenance at the public cost. For the victory which they have won is the salvation of the whole State and the crown with which they and their children are crowned is the fulness of all that life needs they receive rewards from the hands of their country while living and after death have an honourable burial

Yes, he said, and glorious rewards they are.

Do you remember I said, how in the course of the previous discussion some one who shall be nameless accused us of making our [466] guardians unhappy—they had nothing and might have possessed all things—to whom we replied that, if an occasion offered we might perhaps hereafter consider this question, but that, as at present advised, we would make our guardians truly guardians, and that we were fashioning the State with a view to the greatest happiness, not of any particular class, but of the whole?

Yes, I remember

And what do you say now that the life of our protectors is made out to be far better and nobler than that of Olympic victors—is the life of shoemakers, or any other artisans or of husbandmen, to be compared with it?

Certainly not.

At the same time I ought here to repeat what I have said elsewhere, that if any of our guardians shall try to be happy in such a manner that he will cease to be a guardian, and is not content with this safe and harmonious life, which, in our judgment, is of all lives the best, but infatuated by some youthful conceit of happiness which gets up into his head shall seek to appropriate the whole state to himself then he will have to learn how wisely Hesiod spoke, when he said half is more than the whole"

If he were to consult me, I should say to him Stay where you are, when you have the offer of such a life

You agree then, I said, that men and women are to have a common way of life such as we have described—common education, common children and they are to watch over the citizens in common whether abiding in the city or going out to war they are to keep watch together and to hunt together like dogs and always and in all things as far as they are able, women are to share with the men? And in so doing they will do what is best, and will not violate, but preserve the natural relation of the sexes.

I agree with you, he replied.

The enquiry I said has yet to be made, whether such a community will be found possible—as among other animals, so also among

Sections 1 419, 420 ff

men—and if possible in what way possible?

You have anticipated the question which I was about to suggest

There is no difficulty, I said, in seeing how war will be carried on by them

How?

Why of course they will go on expeditions together and will take with them any of their children who are strong enough that, after the manner of the artisan s child they may look on at the work which they will have to do when they are grown up [467] and besides looking on they will have to help and be of use in war and to wait upon their fathers and mothers Did you never observe in the arts how the potters boys look on and help long before they touch the wheel?

Yes I have

And shall potters be more careful in educating their children and in giving them the opportunity of seeing and practising their duties than our guardians will be?

The idea is ridiculous he said

There is also the effect on the parents with whom as with other animals the presence of their young ones will be the greatest incentive to valour

That is quite true Socrates and yet if they are defeated which may often happen in war how great the danger is! the children will be lost as well as their parents and the State will never recover

True I said but would you never allow them to run any risk?

I am far from saying that

Well but if they are ever to run a risk should they not do so on some occasion when if they escape disaster they will be the better for it?

Clearly

Whether the future soldiers do or do not see war in the days of their youth is a very important matter for the sake of which some risk may fairly be incurred

Yes very important

This then must be our first step—to make our children spectators of war but we must also contrive that they shall be secured against danger then all will be well

True

Their parents may be supposed not to be blind to the risks of war but to know as far as human foresight can what expeditions are safe and what dangerous?

That may be assumed

And they will take them on the safe expeditions and be cautious about the dangerous ones?

True

And they will place them under the command of experienced veterans who will be their leaders and teachers?

Very properly

Still the dangers of war cannot be always foreseen there is a good deal of chance about them?

True

Then against such chances the children must be at once furnished with wings, in order that in the hour of need they may fly away and escape

What do you mean? he said

I mean that we must mount them on horses in their earliest youth and when they have learnt to ride, take them on horseback to see war the horses must not be spirited and warlike but the most tractable and yet the swiftest that can be had In this way they will get an excellent view of what is hereafter to be their own [468] business and if there is danger they have only to follow their elder leaders and escape

I believe that you are right he said

Next as to war what are to be the relations of your soldiers to one another and to their enemies? I should be inclined to propose that the soldier who leaves his rank or throws away his arms or is guilty of any other act of cowardice should be degraded into the rank of a husbandman or artisan What do you think?

By all means I should say

And he who allows himself to be taken prisoner may as well be made a present of to his enemies he is their lawful prey and let them do what they like with him

Certainly

But the hero who has distinguished himself, what shall be done to him? In the first place, he shall receive honour in the army from his youthful comrades every one of them in succession shall crown him What do you say?

I approve.

And what do you say to his receiving the right hand of fellowship?

To that too I agree.

But you will hardly agree to my next proposal

What is your proposal?

That he should kiss and be kissed by them.

Most certainly and I should be disposed to go further and say Let no one whom he has a mind to kiss refuse to be kissed by him while the expedition lasts So that if there be a lover in the army whether his love be youth or maiden, he may be more eager to win the prize of valour

Capital I said. That the brave man is to have more wives than others has been already determined and he is to have first choices in such matters more than others, in order that he may have as many children as possible?

Agreed.

Again there is another manner in which ac cordin to Homer brave youths should be honoured for he tells how Ajax, after he had distinguished himself in battle, was re varded with long chines, which seems to be a compli ment appropriate to a hero in the flower of his age, being not only a tribute of honour but also a very strengthening thing

Most true, he said

Then in this, I said Homer shall be our teacher and we too at sacrifices and on the like occasions will honour the brave according to the measure of their valour whether men or women, with hymns and those other distinc tions which we were mentioning also with seats of prec dence nd m ats a d full cups and in honouring them, we shall be at the same time training them

That, he replied is excellent

Yes, I said and when a man d es gloriously in war shall we not say in the first place that he is of the golden race?

To be sure.

Nay have we not the authority of Hes od for affirming that when they are dead

[469] They are holy a gel upon the earth au tho s of good verters f ev l the guard s of sp ch gifted men?

Yes and we accept his authority

We must learn of the god how we are to order the sepulture of di ine and heroic per sonages and what is to be their special distinc tion and we must do as he bids?

By all means

And in ages to come we will reverence them and kneel before their sepulchres as at the gra es of heroes And not only they but any who are deemed pre-eminently good, whether they d e from age or in any other way shall be admitted to the same honours.

That is very r ght, he said

Next how shall our soldiers treat their ene mies? What about this?

In what respect do you mean?

Iliad ii. 321
Iliad viii. 162.

First of all in regard to slavery? Do you think it right that Hellenes should enslave Hellenic States or allow others to enslave them if they can help? Should not their custom be to spare them, considering the danger which there is that the whole race may one day fall under the yoke of the barbarians?

To spare them is infinitely better

Then no Hellene should be owned by them as a slave that is a rule which they will observe and advise the other Hellenes to observe

Certainly he said they will in this way be united against the barbarians and will keep their hands off one another

Next as to the slain ought the conquerors, I said, to take anything but their armour? Does not the practice of despoiling an enemy afford an excuse for not facing the battle? Cowards skulk about the dead pretending that they are fulfilling a duty and many an army before now has been lost from this love of plunder

Very true.

And is there not illiberality and avarice in robbing a corpse, and also a degree of meanness and womanishness in making an enemy of the dead body when the real enemy has flown away and left only his fighting gear behind him—is not this rather like a dog who cannot get at his assailant, quarrelling with the stones which strike him instead?

Very like a dog he said

Then we must abstain from spoiling the dead or hindering their burial?

Yes, he replied, we most certainly must

Neither shall we offer up arms at the tem ples of the gods least of all the arms of Hellenes, [470] if we care to maintain good feeling with other Hellenes and, indeed we have reason to fear that the offering of spoils taken from kins men may be a pollution unless commanded by the god himself?

Very true.

Again as to the devastation of Hellenic terri tory or the burning of houses what is to be the practice?

May I have the pleasure he said of hearing your opinion?

Both should be forb dden in my judgment I would take the annual produce and no more Shall I tell you why?

Pray do

Why you see, there is a difference in the names discord and war and I imagine that there is also a difference in their natures the one is expressive of what is internal and domestic, the other of what is external and foreign and the first of the two is termed discord and only the second war

That is a very proper distinction he replied

And may I not observe with equal propriety that the Hellenic race is all united together by ties of blood and friendship, and alien and strange to the barbarians?

Very good he said

And therefore when Hellenes fight with barbarians and barbarians with Hellenes they will be described by us as being at war when they fight, and by nature enemies and this kind of antagonism should be called war but when Hellenes fight with one another we shall say that Hellas is then in a state of disorder and discord they being by nature friends and such enmity is to be called discord

Consider then I said when that which we have acknowledged to be discord occurs and a city is divided if both parties destroy the lands and burn the houses of one another how wicked does the strife appear! No true lover of his country would bring himself to tear in pieces his own nurse and mother There might be reason in the conqueror depriving the conquered of their harvest but still they would have the idea of peace in their hearts and would not mean to go on fighting for ever

Yes he said that is a better temper than the other

And will not the city which you are founding be an Hellenic city?

It ought to be he replied

Then will not the citizens be good and civilised?

Yes very civilised

And will they not be lovers of Hellas and think of Hellas as their own land and share in the common temples?

Most certainly

And any difference which arises among them will be regarded by them as discord only—a quarrel among friends [471] which is not to be called a war?

Certainly not

Then they will quarrel as those who intend some day to be reconciled?

Certainly

They will use friendly correction but will not enslave or destroy their opponents they will be correctors not enemies?

Just so

And as they [illegible] es they will not deva[illegible]ll they burn houses nor [illegible] whole population of a city—men women and children—are equally their enemies for they know that the guilt of war is always confined to a few persons and that the many are their friends. And for all these reasons they will be unwilling to waste their lands and rase their houses their enmity to them will only last until the many innocent sufferers have compelled the guilty few to give satisfaction?

I agree he said that our citizens should thus deal with their Hellenic enemies and with barbarians as the Hellenes now deal with one another

*Then let us enact this law also for our guard*ians —that they are neither to devastate the lands of Hellenes nor to burn their houses.

Agreed and we may agree also in thinking that these like all our previous enactments, are very good

But still I must say Socrates, that if you are allowed to go on in this way you will entirely forget the other question which at the commencement of this discussion you thrust aside —Is such an order of things possible, and how if at all? For I am quite ready to acknowledge that the plan which you propose, if only feasible would do all sorts of good to the State I will add what you have omitted that your citizens will be the bravest of warriors and will never leave their ranks for they will all know one another and each will call the other father brother son and if you suppose the women to join their armies whether in the same rank or in the rear either as a terror to the enemy or as auxiliaries in case of need I know that they will then be absolutely invincible and there are many domestic advantages which might also be mentioned and which I also fully acknowledge but as I admit all these advantages and as many more as you please if only this State of yours were to come into existence, we need say no more about them assuming then the existence of the State let us now turn to the question of possibility and ways and means—the rest may be left

[472] If I loiter for a moment you instantly make a raid upon me I said and have no mercy I have hardly escaped the first and second waves and you seem not to be aware that you are now bringing upon me the third which is the greatest and heaviest When you have seen and heard the third wave I think you will be more considerate and will acknowledge that some fear and hesitation was natural respecting a proposal so extraordinary as that which I have now to state and investigate

The more appeals of this sort which you make, he said, the more determined are we that you shall tell us how such a State is possible speak out and at once.

Let me begin by reminding you that we found our way hither in the search after justice and injustice.

True, he replied but what of that?

I was only going to ask whether if we have discovered them, we are to require that the just man should in nothing fail of absolute justice or may we be satisfied with an approximation, and the attainment in him of a higher degree of justice than is to be found in other men?

The approximation will be enough.

We are enquiring into the nature of absolute justice and into the character of the perfectly just, and into injustice and the perfectly unjust, that we might have an ideal We were to look at these in order that we might judge of our own happiness and unhappiness according to the standard which they exhibited and the degree in which we resembled them, but not with any view of showing that they could exist in fact.

True, he said

Would a painter be any the worse because, after having delineated with consummate art an ideal of a perfectly beautiful man he was unable to show that any such man could ever have existed?

He would be none the worse

Well and were we not creating an ideal of a perfect State?

To be sure

And is our theory a worse theory because we are unable to prove the possibility of a city being ordered in the manner described?

Surely not, he replied

That is the truth I said But if at your request, I am to try and show how and under what conditions the possibility is highest, I must ask you, having this in view to repeat your former admissions.

What admissions

[473] I want to know whether ideals are ever fully realised in language? Does not the word express more than the fact, and must not the actual whatever a man may think always in the nature of things, fall short of the truth?

What do you say

I agree

Then you must not insist on my proving that the actual State will in every respect coincide with the ideal if we are only able to discover how a city may be governed nearly as we proposed you will admit that we have discovered the possibility which you demand and will be contented I am sure that I should be contented—will not you?

Yes, I will

Let me next endeavour to show what is that fault in States which is the cause of their present maladministration and what is the least change which will enable a State to pass into the truer form and let the change, if possible be of one thing only or if not, of two at any rate let the changes be as few and slight as possible

Certainly he replied

I think I said that there might be a reform of the State if only one change were made which is not a slight or easy though still a possible one

What is it? he said

Now then, I said I go to meet that which I liken to the greatest of the waves yet shall the word be spoken even though the wave break and drown me in laughter and dishonour and do you mark my words

Proceed

I said Until philosophers are kings or the kings and princes of this world have the spirit and power of philosophy and political greatness and wisdom meet in one and those commoner natures who pursue either to the exclusion of the other are compelled to stand aside cities will never have rest from their evils—no nor the human race as I believe—and then only will this our State have a possibility of life and behold the light of day Such was the thought my dear Glaucon, which I would fain have uttered if it had not seemed too extravagant for to be convinced that in no other State can there be happiness private or public is indeed a hard thing

Socrates, what do you mean? I would have you consider that the word which you have uttered is one at which numerous persons, and very respectable persons too [474] in a figure pulling off their coats all in a moment, and seizing any weapon that comes to hand will run at you might and main, before you know where you are, intending to do heaven knows what and if you don't prepare an answer and put yourself in motion, you will be pared by their fine wits, and no mistake.

You got me into the scrape, I said

And I was quite right however I will do all I can to get you out of it but I can only give you good will and good advice, and, perhaps, I may be able to fit answers to your questions better than another—that is all And now hav

foreign and the first of the two is termed discord and only the second war

That is a very proper distinction he replied

And may I not observe with equal propriety that the Hellenic race is all united together by ties of blood and friendship and alien and strange to the barbarians?

Very good, he said

And therefore when Hellenes fight with barbarians and barbarians with Hellenes they will be described by us as being at war when they fight and by nature enemies and this kind of antagonism should be called war but when Hellenes fight with one another we shall say that Hellas is then in a state of disorder and discord, they being by nature friends and such enmity is to be called discord

And for all these reasons they will be unwilling to waste their lands and rase their houses their enmity to them will only last until the many innocent sufferers have compelled the guilty few to give satisfaction?

When you have seen and heard the third wave I think you will be more considerate and will acknowledge that some fear and hesitation was natural respecting a proposal so extraordinary as that which I have now to state and investigate.

True again.

And of just and unjust, good and evil and of every other class, the same remark holds taken singly each of them is one but from the various combinations of them with actions and things and with one another they are seen in all sorts of lights and appear many?

Very true.

And this is the distinction which I draw between the sight-loving, art-loving practical class and those of whom I am speaking and who are alone worthy of the name of philosophers.

How do you distinguish them? he said.

The lovers of sounds and sights, I replied, are, as I conceive, fond of fine tones and colours and forms and all the artificial products that are made out of them, but their mind is incapable of seeing or loving absolute beauty

True, he replied.

Few are they who are able to attain to the sight of this.

Very true.

And he who, having a sense of beautiful things has no sense of absolute beauty or who, if another lead him to a knowledge of that beauty is unable to follow—of such an one I ask, Is he awake or in a dream only? Reflect is not the dreamer sleeping or waking, one who likens dissimilar things, who puts the copy in the place of the real object?

I should certainly say that such an one was dreaming

But take the case of the other who recognises the existence of absolute beauty and is able to distinguish the idea from the objects which participate in the idea, neither putting the objects in the place of the idea nor the idea in the place of the objects—is he a dreamer or is he awake?

He is wide awake.

And may we not say that the mind of the one who knows has knowledge, and that the mind of the other who opines only has opinion?

Certainly

But suppose that the latter should quarrel with us and dispute our statement, can we administer any soothing cordial or advice to him, without revealing to him that there is sad disorder in his wits?

We must certainly offer him some good advice, he replied.

Come, then, and let us think of something to say to him. Shall we begin by assuring him that he is welcome to any knowledge which he may have, and that we are rejoiced at his having it? But we should like to ask him a question Does he who has knowledge know something or nothing? (You must answer for him.)

I answer that he knows something

Something that is or is not?

Something that is for how can that which is not ever be known?

[477] And are we assured after looking at the matter from many points of view that absolute being is or may be absolutely known, but that the utterly non-existent is utterly unknown?

Nothing can be more certain.

Good. But if there be anything which is of such a nature as to be and not to be, that will have a place intermediate between pure being and the absolute negation of being?

Yes, between them

And, as knowledge corresponded to being and ignorance of necessity to not-being for that intermediate between being and not-being there has to be discovered a corresponding intermediate between ignorance and knowledge, if there be such?

Certainly

Do we admit the existence of opinion?

Undoubtedly

As being the same with knowledge, or an other faculty?

Another faculty

Then opinion and knowledge have to do with different kinds of matter corresponding to this difference of faculties?

Yes.

And knowledge is relative to being and knows being. But before I proceed further I will make a division.

What division?

I will begin by placing faculties in a class by themselves they are powers in us, and in all other things, by which we do as we do Sight and hearing for example, I should call faculties. Have I clearly explained the class which I mean?

Yes, I quite understand.

Then let me tell you my view about them I do not see them, and therefore the distinctions of figure, colour and the like, which enable me to discern the differences of some things, do not apply to them. In speaking of a faculty I think only of its sphere and its result and that which has the same sphere and the same result I call the same faculty but that which has another sphere and another result I call different. Would that be your way of speaking?

ing such an auxiliary you must do your best to show the unbelievers that you are right

I ought to try I said since you offer me such invaluable assistance And I think that if there is to be a chance of our escaping we must explain to them whom we mean when we say that philosophers are to rule in the State then we shall be able to defend ourselves There will be discovered to be some natures who ought to study philosophy and to be leaders in the State and others who are not born to be philosophers and are meant to be followers rather than leaders

Then now for a definition he said

Follow me I said and I hope that I may in some way or other be able to give you a satisfactory explanation

Proceed

I dare say that you remember and therefore I need not remind you that a lover if he is worthy of the name ought to show his love not to some one part of that which he loves but to the whole

I really do not understand and therefore beg of you to assist my memory

Another person, I said might fairly reply as you do but a man of pleasure like yourself ought to know that all who are in the flower of youth do somehow or other raise a pang or emotion in a lover s breast and are thought by him to be worthy of his affectionate regards Is not this a way which you have with the fair one has a snub nose and you praise his charming face the hook nose of another has you say a royal look while he who is neither snub nor hooked has the grace of regularity the dark visage is manly the fair are children of the gods and as to the sweet honey pale as they are called what is the very name but the invention of a lover who talks in diminutives and is not adverse to paleness if appearing on the cheek of youth? [475] In a word there is no excuse which you will not make, and nothing which you will not say in order not to lose a single flower that blooms in the spring time of youth

If you make me an authority in matters of love for the sake of the argument I assent.

And what do you say of lovers of wine? Do you not see them doing the same? They are glad of any pretext of drinking any wine

Very good

And the same is true of ambitious men if they cannot command an army they are willing to command a file and if they cannot be honoured by really great and important persons they are glad to be honoured by lesser and meaner people—but honour of some kind they must have.

Exactly

Once more let me ask Does he who desires any class of goods, desire the whole class or a part only?

The whole

And may we not say of the philosopher that he is a lover not of a part of wisdom only but of the whole?

Yes of the whole

And he who dislikes learning especially in youth when he has no power of judging what is good and what is not such an one we maintain not to be a philosopher or a lover of knowledge just as he who refuses his food is not hungry and may be said to have a bad appetite and not a good one?

Very true he said

Whereas he who has a taste for every sort of knowledge and who is curious to learn and is never satisfied may be justly termed a philosopher? Am I not right?

Glaucon said If curiosity makes a philosopher you will find many a strange being will *have a title to the name All the lovers of si*ghts have a delight in learning and must therefore be included Musical amateurs too are a folk strangely out of place among philosophers, for they are the last persons in the world who would come to anything like a philosophical discussion if they could help while they run about at the Dionysiac festivals as if they had let out their ears to hear every chorus whether the performance is in town or country—that makes no difference—they are there Now are we to maintain that all these and any who have similar tastes as well as the professors of quite minor arts are philosophers?

Certainly not I replied they are only an imitation

He said Who then are the true philosophers?

Those I said who are lovers of the vision of truth

That is also good he said but I should like to know what you mean?

To another I replied I might have a difficulty in explaining but I am sure that you will admit a proposition which I am about to make.

What is the proposition?

That since beauty is the opposite of ugliness, they are two?

Certainly

[476] And inasmuch as they are two each of them is one?

True again.

And of just and unjust, good and evil, and of every other class, the same remark holds: taken singly, each of them is one; but from the various combinations of them with actions and things and with one another, they are seen in all sorts of lights and appear many?

Very true.

And this is the distinction which I draw between the sight-loving, art-loving, practical class and those of whom I am speaking, and who are alone worthy of the name of philosophers.

How do you distinguish them? he said.

The lovers of sounds and sights, I replied, are, as I conceive, fond of fine tones and colours and forms and all the artificial products that are made out of them, but their mind is incapable of seeing or loving absolute beauty.

True, he replied.

Few are they who are able to attain to the sight of this.

Another faculty.

Would that be your way of speaking?

Yes

And will you be so very good as to answer one more question? Would you say that knowledge is a faculty or in what class would you place it?

Certainly knowledge is a faculty and the mightiest of all faculties

And is opinion also a faculty?

Certainly he said for opinion is that with which we are able to form an opinion

And yet you were acknowledging a little while ago that knowledge is not the same as opinion?

[478] Why yes he said how can any reasonable being ever identify that which is infallible with that which errs?

An excellent answer proving I said that we are quite conscious of a distinction between them

Yes

Then knowledge and opinion having distinct powers have also distinct spheres or subject matters?

That is certain

Being is the sphere or subject matter of knowledge and knowledge is to know the nature of being?

Yes

And opinion is to have an opinion?

Yes

And do we know what we opine? or is the subject matter of opinion the same as the subject matter of knowledge?

Nay he replied that has been already disproven if difference in faculty implies difference in the sphere or subject matter and if as we were saying opinion and knowledge are distinct faculties then the sphere of knowledge and of opinion cannot be the same

Then if being is the subject matter of knowledge something else must be the subject matter of opinion?

Yes something else

Well then is not being the subject matter of opinion? or, rather how can there be an opinion at all about not being? Reflect when a man has an opinion has he not an opinion about something? Can he have an opinion which is an opinion about nothing?

Impossible

He who has an opinion has an opinion about some one thing?

Yes

And not being is not one thing but properly speaking nothing?

True

Of not being ignorance was assumed to be the necessary correlative of being knowledge?

True he said

Then opinion is not concerned either with being or with not being?

Not with either

And can therefore neither be ignorance nor knowledge?

That seems to be true

But is opinion to be sought without and beyond either of them in a greater clearness than knowledge or in a greater darkness than ignorance?

In neither

Then I suppose that opinion appears to you to be darker than knowledge but lighter than ignorance?

Both and in no small degree

And also to be within and between them?

Yes

Then you would infer that opinion is intermediate?

No question

But were we not saying before that if anything appeared to be of a sort which is and is not at the same time, that sort of thing would appear also to lie in the interval between pure being and absolute not being and that the corresponding faculty is neither knowledge nor ignorance but will be found in the interval between them?

True

And in that interval there has now been discovered something which we call opinion?

There has

Then what remains to be discovered is the object which partakes equally of the nature of being and not being and cannot rightly be termed either pure and simple this unknown term when discovered we may truly call the subject of opinion and assign each to their proper faculty—the extremes to the faculties of the extremes and the mean to the faculty of the mean

True

[479] This being premised I would ask the gentleman who is of opinion that there is no absolute or unchangeable idea of beauty—in whose opinion the beautiful is the manifold —he I say your lover of beautiful sights who cannot bear to be told that the beautiful is one and the just is one or that anything is one—to him I would appeal saying Will you be so very kind sir as to tell us whether of all these beautiful things there is one which will not be found ugly or of the just which will not be found unjust, or of the holy, which will not also be unholy?

No, he replied; the beautiful will in some point of view be found ugly; and the same is true of the rest.

And may not the many which are doubles be also halves?—doubles, that is, of one thing, and halves of another?

Quite true.

And things great and small, heavy and light, as they are termed, will not be denoted by these any more than by the opposite names?

True; both these and the opposite names will always attach to all of them.

And can any one of those many things which are called by particular names be said to be this rather than not to be this?

He replied: They are like the punning riddles which are asked at feasts or the children's puzzle about the eunuch aiming at the bat, with what he hit him, as they say in the puzzle, and upon what the bat was sitting. The individual objects of which I am speaking are also a riddle, and have a double sense: nor can you fix them in your mind, either as being or not-being, or both, or neither.

Then what will you do with them? I said. Can they have a better place than between being and not-being? For they are clearly not in greater darkness or negation than not-being, or more full of light and existence than being.

That is quite true, he said.

Thus then we seem to have discovered that the many ideas which the multitude entertain about the beautiful and about all other things are tossing about in some region which is halfway between pure being and pure not-being?

We have.

Yes; and we had before agreed that anything of this kind which we might find was to be described as matter of opinion, and not as matter of knowledge; being the intermediate flux which is caught and detained by the intermediate faculty.

Quite true.

Then those who see the many beautiful, and who yet neither see absolute beauty, nor can follow any guide who points the way thither; who see the many just, and not absolute justice, and the like—such persons may be said to have opinion but not knowledge?

That is certain.

But those who see the absolute and eternal and immutable may be said to know, and not to have opinion only?

Neither can that be denied.

The one love and embrace the subjects of knowledge, the other those of opinion? The latter are the same, as I dare say you will remember [480] who listened to sweet sounds and gazed upon fair colours, but would not tolerate the existence of absolute beauty.

Yes, I remember.

Shall we then be guilty of any impropriety in calling them lovers of opinion rather than lovers of wisdom, and will they be very angry with us for thus describing them?

I shall tell them not to be angry; no man should be angry at what is true.

But those who love the truth in each thing are to be called lovers of wisdom and not lovers of opinion.

Assuredly.

BOOK VI

[484] And thus, Glaucon, after the argument has gone a weary way, the true and the false philosophers have at length appeared in view.

I do not think, he said, that the way could have been shortened.

I suppose not, I said; and yet I believe that we might have had a better view of both of them if the discussion could have been confined to this one subject and if there were not many other questions awaiting us, which he who desires to see in what respect the life of the just differs from that of the unjust must consider.

And what is the next question? he asked.

Surely, I said, the one which follows next in order. Inasmuch as philosophers only are able to grasp the eternal and unchangeable, and those who wander in the region of the many and variable are not philosophers, I must ask you which of the two classes should be the rulers of our State?

And how can we rightly answer that question?

Whichever of the two are best able to guard the laws and institutions of our State—let them be our guardians.

Very good.

Neither, I said, can there be any question that the guardian who is to keep anything should have eyes rather than no eyes?

There can be no question of that.

And are not those who are verily and indeed wanting in the knowledge of the true being of each thing, and who have in their souls no clear pattern, and are unable as with a painter's eye to look at the absolute truth and to that original to repair, and having perfect vision of the other world to order the laws about beauty, goodness justice in this if not already ordered and to guard and preserve the order of them—are not such persons I ask, simply blind?

Truly he replied, they are much in that condition

And shall they be our guardians when there are others who besides being their equals in experience and falling short of them in no particular of virtue, also know the very truth of each thing?

There can be no reason he said for rejecting those who have this greatest of all great qualities [485] they must always have the first place unless they fail in some other respect

Suppose then I said that we determine how far they can unite this and the other excellences

By all means

In the first place as we began by observing the nature of the philosopher has to be ascertained We must come to an understanding about him and when we have done so then if I am not mistaken we shall also acknowledge that such an union of qualities is possible and that those in whom they are united and those only should be rulers in the State

What do you mean?

Let us suppose that philosophical minds always love knowledge of a sort which shows them the eternal nature not varying from generation and corruption

Agreed

And further I said let us agree that they are lovers of all true being there is no part whether greater or less or more or less honourable which they are willing to renounce as we said before of the lover and the man of ambition

True

And if they are to be what we were describing is there not another quality which they should also possess?

What quality?

Truthfulness they will never intentionally receive into their mind falsehood which is their detestation and they will love the truth

Yes that may be safely affirmed of them

May be my friend I replied is not the word say rather must be affirmed for he whose nature is amorous of anything cannot help loving all that belongs or is akin to the object of his affections

Right he said

And is there anything more akin to wisdom than truth?

How can there be?

Can the same nature be a lover of wisdom and a lover of falsehood?

Never

The true lover of learning then must from his earliest youth, as far as in him lies, desire all truth?

Assuredly

But then again, as we know by experience, he whose desires are strong in one direction will have them weaker in others they will be like a stream which has been drawn off into another channel

True

He whose desires are drawn towards knowledge in every form will be absorbed in the pleasures of the soul and will hardly feel bodily pleasure—I mean if he be a true philosopher and not a sham one

That is most certain

Such an one is sure to be temperate and the reverse of covetous for the motives which make another man desirous of having and spending, have no place in his character

Very true

[486] Another criterion of the philosophical nature has also to be considered

What is that?

There should be no secret corner of illiberality nothing can be more antagonistic than meanness to a soul which is ever longing after the whole of things both divine and human

Most true he replied

Then how can he who has magnificence of mind and is the spectator of all time and all existence think much of human life?

He cannot

Or can such an one account death fearful?

No indeed

Then the cowardly and mean nature has n[o] part in true philosophy?

Certainly not

Or again can he who is harmoniously con[-] stituted who is not covetous or mean or boaster or a coward—can he I say ever be un[-] just or hard in his dealings?

Impossible

Then you will soon observe whether a ma[n] is just and gentle or rude and unsociable thes[e] are the signs which distinguish even in youth the philosophical nature from the unphilosoph[-] ical

True

There is another point which should be re[-] marked

What point?

Whether he has or has not a pleasure in learn[-] ing for no one will love that which gives him pain, and in which after much toil he makes little progress.

Certainly not.

And again, if he is forgetful and retains nothing of what he learns, will he not be an empty vessel?

That is certain

Labouring in vain, he must end in hating himself and his fruitless occupation?

Yes.

Then a soul which forgets cannot be ranked among genuine philosophic natures we must insist that the philosopher should have a good memory?

Certainly

And once more the inharmonious and unseemly nature can only tend to disproportion?

Undoubtedly

And do you consider truth to be akin to proportion or to disproportion?

To proportion.

Then, besides other qualities, we must try to find a naturally well proportioned and gracious mind, which will move spontaneously towards the true being of everything

Certainly

Well, and do not all these qualities which we have been enumerating go together and are they not, in a manner necessary to a soul which is to have a full and perfect participation of being?

[487] They are absolutely necessary he replied.

And must not that be a blameless study which he only can pursue who has the gift of a good memory and is quick to learn—noble, gracious, the friend of truth, justice, courage, temperance, who are his kindred?

The god of jealousy himself, he said could find no fault with such a study

And to men like him, I said, when perfected by years and education, and to these only you will entrust the State

Here Adeimantus interposed and said To these statements Socrates, no one can offer a reply but when you talk in this way a strange feeling passes over the minds of your hearers They fancy that they are led astray a little at each step in the argument, owing to their own want of skill in asking and answering questions these little accumulate, and at the end of the discussion they are found to have sustained a mighty overthrow and all their former notions appear to be turned upside down. And as unskilful players of draughts are at last shut up by their more skilful adversaries and have no piece to move, so they too find themselves shut up at last for they have nothing to say in this new game of which words are the counters and yet all the time they are in the right The observation is suggested to me by what is now occurring For any one of us might say that although in words he is not able to meet you at each step of the argument, he sees as a fact that the votaries of philosophy when they carry on the study not only in youth as a part of education, but as the pursuit of their maturer years most of them become strange monsters, not to say utter rogues, and that those who may be considered the best of them are made useless to the world by the very study which you extol

Well and do you think that those who say so are wrong?

I cannot tell he replied but I should like to know what is your opinion

Hear my answer I am of opinion that they are quite right.

Then how can you be justified in saying that cities will not cease from evil until philosophers rule in them, when philosophers are acknowledged by us to be of no use to them?

You ask a question, I said, to which a reply can only be given in a parable.

Yes, Socrates and that is a way of speaking to which you are not at all accustomed I suppose.

I perceive, I said, that you are vastly amused at having plunged me into such a hopeless discussion but now hear the parable, [488] and then you will be still more amused at the meagreness of my imagination for the manner in which the best men are treated in their own States is so grievous that no single thing on earth is comparable to it and therefore, if I am to plead their cause, I must have recourse to fiction, and put together a figure made up of many things, like the fabulous unions of goats and stags which are found in pictures Imagine then fleet or a ship in which there is a captain who is taller and stronger than any of the crew but he is a little deaf and has a similar infirmity in sight, and his knowledge of navigation is not much better The sailors are quarrelling with one another about the steering—every one is of opinion that he has a right to steer though he has never learned the art of navigation and cannot tell who taught him or when he learned, and will further assert that it cannot be taught, and they are ready to cut in pieces any one who says the contrary They throng about the captain, begging and praying him to commit the helm to them and if at any time they do not prevail but others are preferred to them they kill the others or throw them overboard and having first chained up the noble captain s senses with drink or some narcotic drug they mutiny and take possession of the ship and make free with the stores thus eating and drinking they proceed on their voyage in such a manner as might be expected of them Him who is their partisan and cleverly aids them in their plot for getting the ship out of the cap tain s hands into their own whether by force or persuasion they compliment with the name of sailor pilot able seaman and abuse the other sort of man whom they call a good for nothing but that the true pilot must pay attention to the year and seasons and sky and stars and winds and whatever else belongs to his art if he in tends to be really qualified for the command of a ship and that he must and will be the steerer whether other people like or not—the possi bility of this union of authority with the steerer s art has never seriously entered into their thoughts or been made part of their calling [489] Now in vessels which are in a state of mutiny and by sailors who are mutineers how will the true pilot be regarded? Will he not be called by them a prater a star gazer a good for nothing?

Of course said Adeimantus

Then you will hardly need I said to hear the interpretation of the figure which describes the true philosopher in his relation to the State for you understand already

Certainly

Then suppose you now take this parable to the gentleman who is surprised at finding that philosophers have no honour in their cities ex plain it to him and try to convince him that their having honour would be far more extra ordinary

I will

Say to him that in deeming the best votaries of philosophy to be useless to the rest of the world he is right but also tell him to attribute their uselessness to the fault of those who will not use them and not to themselves The pilot should not humbly beg the sailors to be com manded by him—that is not the order of na ture neither are the wise to go to the doors of the rich —the ingenious author of this saying told a lie—but the truth is that when a man is ill, whether he be rich or poor to the physician he must go and he who wants to be governed to him who is able to govern The ruler who is good for anything ought not to beg his subjects to be ruled by him, although the present gov ernors of mankind are of a different stamp; they may be justly compared to the mutinous sailors and the true helmsmen to those who are called by them good for nothings and star gazers.

Precisely so he said

For these reasons and among men like these, philosophy the noblest pursuit of all is not likely to be much esteemed by those of the op posite faction not that the greatest and most lasting injury is done to her by her opponents, but by her own professing followers the same of whom you suppose the accuser to say that the greater number of them are arrant rogues, and the best are useless in which opinion I agreed

Yes

And the reason why the good are useless has now been explained?

True

Then shall we proceed to show that the cor ruption of the majority is also unavoidable, and that this is not to be laid to the charge of philos ophy any more than the other?

By all means

And let us ask and answer in turn first go ing back to the description of the gentle and noble nature [490] Truth as you will remem ber was his leader whom he followed always and in all things failing in this he was an im postor and had no part or lot in true philoso phy

Yes that was said

Well and is not this one quality to mention no others greatly at variance with present no tions of him?

Certainly he said

And have we not a right to say in his defence, that the true lover of knowledge is always striv ing after being—that is his nature he will not rest in the multiplicity of individuals which is an appearance only but will go on—the keen edge will not be blunted nor the force of his desire abate until he have attained the knowl edge of the true nature of every essence by a sympathetic and kindred power in the soul and by that power drawing near and mingling and becoming incorporate with very being having begotten mind and truth he will have knowl edge and will live and grow truly and then, and not till then will he cease from his travail.

Nothing he said can be more just than such a description of him

And will the love of a lie be any part of a philosopher s nature? Will he not utterly hate a lie?

He will.

And when truth is the captain, we cannot suspect any evil of the band which he leads?

Impossible.

Justice and health of mind will be of the company and temperance will follow after?

True, he replied.

Neither is there any reason why I should again set in array the philosopher's virtues, as you will doubtless remember that courage, magnificence, apprehension, memory were his natural gifts. And you objected that, although no one could deny what I then said, still, if you leave words and look at facts, the persons who are thus described are some of them manifestly useless, and the greater number utterly depraved; we were then led to enquire into the grounds of these accusations, and have now arrived at the point of asking why are the majority bad, which question of necessity brought us back to the examination and definition of the true philosopher.

Exactly.

And we have next to consider the corruptions of the philosophic nature, why so many are spoiled and so few escape spoiling—I am speaking of those who were said to be useless but not wicked—and, [491] when we have done with them, we will speak of the imitators of philosophy, what manner of men are they who aspire after a profession which is above them and of which they are unworthy, and then, by their manifold inconsistencies, bring upon philosophy and upon all philosophers, that universal reprobation of which we speak.

What are these corruptions? he said.

I will see if I can explain them to you. Every one will admit that a nature having in perfection all the qualities which we required in a philosopher, is a rare plant which is seldom seen among men.

Rare indeed.

And what numberless and powerful causes tend to destroy these rare natures!

What causes?

In the first place there are their own virtues, their courage, temperance, and the rest of them, every one of which praiseworthy qualities (and this is a most singular circumstance) destroys and distracts from philosophy the soul which is the possessor of them.

That is very singular, he replied.

Then there are all the ordinary goods of life—beauty, wealth, strength, rank, and great connections in the State—you understand the sort of things—these also have a corrupting and distracting effect.

I understand; but I should like to know more precisely what you mean about them.

Grasp the truth as a whole, I said, and in the right way; you will then have no difficulty in apprehending the preceding remarks, and they will no longer appear strange to you.

And how am I to do so? he asked.

Why, I said, we know that all germs or seeds, whether vegetable or animal, when they fail to meet with proper nutriment or climate or soil, in proportion to their vigour, are all the more sensitive to the want of a suitable environment, for evil is a greater enemy to what is good than what is not.

Very true.

There is reason in supposing that the finest natures, when under alien conditions, receive more injury than the inferior, because the contrast is greater.

Certainly.

And may we not say, Adeimantus, that the most gifted minds, when they are ill-educated, become pre-eminently bad? Do not great crimes and the spirit of pure evil spring out of a fulness of nature ruined by education rather than from any inferiority, whereas weak natures are scarcely capable of any very great good or very great evil?

There I think that you are right.

[492] And our philosopher follows the same analogy—he is like a plant which, having proper nurture, must necessarily grow and mature into all virtue, but, if sown and planted in an alien soil, becomes the most noxious of all weeds, unless he be preserved by some divine power. Do you really think, as people so often say, that our youth are corrupted by Sophists, or that private teachers of the art corrupt them in any degree worth speaking of? Are not the public who say these things the greatest of all Sophists? And do they not educate to perfection young and old, men and women alike, and fashion them after their own hearts?

When is this accomplished? he said.

When they meet together, and the world sits down at an assembly, or in a court of law, or a theatre, or a camp, or in any other popular resort, and there is a great uproar, and they praise some things which are being said or done, and blame other things, equally exaggerating both, shouting and clapping their hands, and the echo of the rocks and the place in which they are assembled redoubles the sound of the praise or blame—at such a time will not a young prevail, but others are preferred to them they kill the others or throw them overboard and having first chained up the noble captain s senses with drink or some narcotic drug they mutiny and take possession of the ship and make free with the stores thus, eating and drinking they proceed on their voyage in such a manner as might be expected of them Him who is their partisan and cleverly aids them in their plot for getting the ship out of the captain s hands into their own whether by force or persuasion they compliment with the name of sailor pilot, able seaman and abuse the other sort of man whom they call a good for nothing but that the true pilot must pay attention to the year and seasons and sky and stars and winds and whatever else belongs to his art if he intends to be really qualified for the command of a ship and that he must and will be the steerer whether other people like or not—the possibility of this union of authority with the steerer s art has never seriously entered into their thoughts or been made part of their calling [489] Now in vessels which are in a state of mutiny and by sailors who are mutineers how will the true pilot be regarded? Will he not be called by them a prater a star gazer a good for nothing?

Of course, said Adeimantus

Then you will hardly need I said to hear the interpretation of the figure which describes the true philosopher in his relation to the State for you understand already

Certainly

Then suppose you now take this parable to the gentleman who is surprised at finding that philosophers have no honour in their cities explain it to him and try to convince him that their having honour would be far more extraordinary

I will

Say to him that in deeming the best votaries of philosophy to be useless to the rest of the world he is right but also tell him to attribute their uselessness to the fault of those who will not use them and not to themselves The pilot should not humbly beg the sailors to be commanded by him—that is not the order of nature neither are the wise to go to the doors of the rich —the ingenious author of this saying told a lie—but the truth is that when a man is ill whether he be rich or poor to the physician he must go, and he who wants to be governed to him who is able to govern The ruler who is good for anything ought not to beg his subjects to be ruled by him, although the present governors of mankind are of a different stamp; they may be justly compared to the mutinous sailors and the true helmsmen to those who are called by them good for nothings and star gazers

Precisely so he said

For these reasons and among men like these, philosophy, the noblest pursuit of all, is not likely to be much esteemed by those of the opposite faction not that the greatest and most lasting injury is done to her by her opponents, but by her own professing followers, the same of whom you suppose the accuser to say that the greater number of them are arrant rogues, and the best are useless in which opinion I agreed

Yes

And the reason why the good are useless has now been explained?

True

Then shall we proceed to show that the corruption of the majority is also unavoidable, and that this is not to be laid to the charge of philosophy any more than the other?

By all means

And let us ask and answer in turn first going back to the description of the gentle and noble nature [490] Truth as you will remember was his leader whom he followed always and in all things failing in this he was an impostor and had no part or lot in true philosophy

Yes that was said

Well and is not this one quality to mention no others greatly at variance with present notions of him?

Certainly he said

And have we not a right to say in his defence, that the true lover of knowledge is always striving after being—that is his nature he will not rest in the multiplicity of individuals which is an appearance only but will go on—the keen edge will not be blunted nor the force of his desire abate until he have attained the knowledge of the true nature of every essence by a sympathetic and kindred power in the soul and by that power drawing near and mingling and becoming incorporate with very being having begotten mind and truth he will have knowledge and will live and grow truly and then, and not till then will he cease from his travail.

Nothing he said can be more just than such a description of him

And will the love of a lie be any part of a philosopher s nature? Will he not utterly hate a lie?

f his bodily endowments are like his mental ones?

Certainly he said

And his friends and fellow-citizens will want to use him as he gets older for their own purposes?

No question

Falling at his feet, they will make requests to him and do him honour and flatter him because they want to get into their hands now the power which he will one day possess

That often happens he said

And what will a man such as he is be likely to do under such circumstances, especially if he be a citizen of a great city rich and noble, and a tall proper youth? Will he not be full of boundless aspirations, and fancy himself able to manage the affairs of Hellenes and of barbarians, and having got such notions into his head will he not dilate and elevate himself in the fulness of vain pomp and senseless pride?

To be sure he will

Now when he is in this state of mind if some one gently comes to him and tells him that he is a fool and must get understanding which can only be got by slaving for it, do you think that, under such adverse circumstances, he will be easily induced to listen?

Far otherwise

And even if there be some one who through inherent goodness or natural reasonableness has had his eyes opened a little and is humbled and taken captive by philosophy how will his friends behave when they think that they are likely to lose the advantage which they were hoping to reap from his companionship? Will they not do and say anything to prevent him from yielding to his better nature and to render his teacher powerless, using to this end private intrigues as well as public prosecutions?

[495] There can be no doubt of it.

And how can one who is thus circumstanced ever become a philosopher?

Impossible

Then were we not right in saying that even the very qualities which make a man a philosopher may if he be ill-educated divert him from philosophy no less than riches and their accompaniments and the other so-called goods of life?

We were quite right

Thus my excellent friend, is brought about all that ruin and failure which I have been describing of the natures best adapted to the best of all pursuits they are natures which we maintain to be rare at any time this being the class out of which come the men who are the authors of the greatest evil to States and individuals and also of the greatest good when the tide carries them in that direction but a small man never was the doer of any great thing either to individuals or to States

That is most true he said

And so philosophy is left desolate, with her marriage rite incomplete for her own have fallen away and forsaken her and while they are leading a false and unbecoming life other unworthy persons, seeing that she has no kinsmen to be her protectors enter in and dishonour her and fasten upon her the reproaches which, as you say her reprovers utter who affirm of her votaries that some are good for nothing and that the greater number deserve the severest punishment.

That is certainly what people say

Yes and what else would you expect, I said when you think of the puny creatures who seeing this land open to them—a land well stocked with fair names and showy titles—like prisoners running out of prison into a sanctuary take a leap out of their trades into philosophy those who do so being probably the cleverest hands at their own miserable crafts? For although philosophy be in this evil case, still there remains a dignity about her which is not to be found in the arts And many are thus attracted by her whose natures are imperfect and whose souls are maimed and disfigured by their meannesses, as their bodies are by their trades and crafts Is not this unavoidable?

Yes

Are they not exactly like a bald little tinker who has just got out of durance and come into a fortune he takes a bath and puts on a new coat, and is decked out as a bridegroom going to marry his master's daughter who is left poor and desolate?

[496] A most exact parallel.

What will be the issue of such marriages? Will they not be vile and bastard?

There can be no question of it

And when persons who are unworthy of education approach philosophy and make an alliance with her who is a rank above them what sort of ideas and opinions are likely to be generated? Will they not be sophisms captivating to the ear having nothing in them genuine, or worthy of or akin to true wisdom?

No doubt, he said

Then, Adeimantus, I said the worthy disciples of philosophy will be but a small remnant perchance some noble and well-educated man s heart, as they say leap within him? Will any private training enable him to stand firm against the overwhelming flood of popular opinion? or will he be carried away by the stream? Will he not have the notions of good and evil which the public in general have—he will do as they do and as they are such will he be?

Yes Socrates necessity will compel him.

And yet I said there is a still greater necessity which has not been mentioned

What is that?

The gentle force of attainder or confiscation or death which, as you are aware these new Sophists and educators who are the public, apply when their words are powerless

Indeed they do and in right good earnest

Now what opinion of any other Sophist or of any private person can be expected to overcome in such an unequal contest?

None he replied

No indeed I said even to make the attempt is a great piece of folly there neither is nor has been nor is ever likely to be any different type of character which has had no other training in virtue but that which is supplied by public opinion—I speak my friend of human virtue only what is more than human as the proverb says is not included for I would not have you ignorant that in the present evil state of governments whatever is saved and comes to good is saved by the power of God [493] as we may truly say

I quite assent he replied

Then let me crave your assent also to a further observation

What are you going to say?

Why that all those mercenary individuals whom the many call Sophists and whom they deem to be their adversaries, do in fact teach nothing but the opinion of the many that is to say the opinions of their assemblies and this is their wisdom I might compare them to a man who should study the tempers and desires of a mighty strong beast who is fed by him—he would learn how to approach and handle him also at what times and from what causes he is dangerous or the reverse, and what is the meaning of his several cries and by what sounds when another utters them he is soothed or infuriated and you may suppose further that when by continually attending upon him he has become perfect in all this he calls his knowledge wisdom, and makes of it a system or art which he proceeds to teach although he has no real notion of what he means by the principles or passions of which he is speaking but calls this honourable and that dishonourable, or good or evil or just or unjust, all in accordance with the tastes and tempers of the great brute. Good he pronounces to be that in which the beast delights and evil to be that which he dislikes and he can give no other account of them except that the just and noble are the necessary having never himself seen and having no power of explaining to others the nature of either or the difference between them which is immense. By heaven, would not such an one be a rare educator?

Indeed he would

And in what way does he who thinks that wisdom is the discernment of the tempers and tastes of the motley multitude whether in painting or music or finally in politics, differ from him whom I have been describing? For when a man consorts with the many and exhibits to them his poem or other work of art or the service which he has done the State making them his judges when he is not obliged the so-called necessity of Diomede will oblige him to produce whatever they praise And yet the reasons are utterly ludicrous which they give in confirmation of their own notions about the honourable and good Did you ever hear any of them which were not?

No nor am I likely to hear

You recognise the truth of what I have been saying? Then let me ask you to consider further whether the world will ever be induced to believe in the existence of absolute beauty rather than of the many beautiful [494] or of the absolute in each kind rather than of the many in each kind?

Certainly not

Then the world cannot possibly be a philosopher?

Impossible

And therefore philosophers must inevitably fall under the censure of the world?

They must

And of individuals who consort with the mob and seek to please them?

That is evident.

Then do you see any way in which the philosopher can be preserved in his calling to the end? and remember what we were saying of him that he was to have quickness and memory and courage and magnificence—these were admitted by us to be the true philosopher s gifts.

Yes

Will not such an one from his early childhood be in all things first among all especially

-ld, in most cases they are extinguished more -ruly than Heracleitus sun inasmuch as they ever light up again

But what ought to be their course?

Just the opposite. In childhood and youth heir study and what philosophy they learn, hould be suited to their tender years during his period while they are growing up towards manhood, the chief and special care should be given to their bodies that they may have them to use in the service of philosophy as life advances and the intellect begins to mature, let them increase the gymnastics of the soul but when the strength of our citizens fails and is past civil and military duties, then let them range at will and engage in no serious labour as we intend them to live happily here, and to crown this life with a similar happ ness in another

How truly in earnest you are Socrates! he said I am sure of that and yet most of your hearers, if I am not mistaken, are likely to be still more earnest in their opposition to you and will never be convinced Thrasymachus least of all.

Do not make a quarrel, I said between Thrasymachus and me, who have recently become friends although indeed, we were never enemies for I shall go on striving to the utmost until I either convert him and other men or do something which may profit them against the day when they li e again and hold the like discourse in another state of existence

You are speaking of a time wh ch s not very near

Rather I replied of a time h ch is as nothing in comparison w th eternity Nevertheless, I do not wonder that the many refuse to be lie e for they have ne er seen that of wh ch we are now speaking realized they have seen only a conventional im tation of philosophy consisting of words artificially brought together not like these of ours having a natural unity But a human being who in word and work is perfectly moulded, as far as he can be, into the proportion and likeness of virtue—such a man ruling in a city which bears the same mage, [499] they ha e ne er yet seen neither one nor many of them—do you think that they ever did?

No ndeed

No my fr end, and they have seldom, if ever hea d free and noble sentim nts such as men utter when they are earnestly and by every means n their power seeking fter truth for the sake of knowledge, while they look coldly on the subtleties of controversy of which the end is opinion and strife whether they meet with them in the courts of law or in society

They are strangers, he said to the words of which you speak

And this was what we foresaw and this was the reason why truth forced us to admit not without fear and hesitation that neither cities nor States nor individuals will ever attain per*fection* until the small class of philosophers whom we termed useless but not corrupt are providentially compelled whether they will or not, to take care of the State, and until a like necessity be laid on the State to obey them or until kings, or if not kings, the sons of kings or princes, are divinely inspired with a true love of true philosophy That either or both of these alternatives are impossible, I see no reason to affirm if they were so we might indeed be justly ridiculed as dreamers and visionaries Am I not right?

Quite right.

If then in the countless ages of the past, or at the present hour in some foreign clime which is far away and beyond our ken the perfected philosopher is or has been or hereafter shall be compelled by a superior power to have the charge of the State, we are ready to assert to the death, that this our constitution has been and is—yea and will be whenever the Muse of Philosophy is queen. There is no impossibility *in all this that there is a difficulty we ackno vl*edge ourselves

My opinion agrees with yours, he said

But do you mean to say that this is not the opinion of the multitude?

I should imagine not, he replied

O my friend I said, do not attack the multitude they will change their minds if not in an aggressi e spirit, but gently and with the v ew of soothing them and removing their dislike of overeducation you show them your philosophers as they really are and describe as you were just now doing their character and profession, [500] and then mankind w ll see that he of whom you are speaking is not such s they supposed—if they v ew him in this new light, they will surely change their notion of him, and answer in another strain Who can be at enmity with one who lo es them, who that is himself gentle and free from envy will be jealous of one in whom there is no jealousy? Nay let me answer for you, that in a few this harsh temper may be found but not in the majority of mankind

I quite ag ee with you he said.

person, detained by exile in her service who in the absence of corrupting influences remains devoted to her or some lofty soul born in a mean city the politics of which he contemns and neglects and there may be a gifted few who leave the arts which they justly despise and come to her—or peradventure there are some who are restrained by our friend Theages bridle for everything in the life of Theages conspired to divert him from philosophy but ill health kept him away from politics My own case of the internal sign is hardly worth mentioning for rarely, if ever has such a monitor been given to any other man Those who belong to this small class have tasted how sweet and blessed a possession philosophy is, and have also seen enough of the madness of the multitude and they know that no politician is honest nor is there any champion of justice at whose side they may fight and be saved Such an one may be compared to a man who has fallen among wild beasts—he will not join in the wickedness of his fellows but neither is he able singly to resist all their fierce natures and therefore seeing that he would be of no use to the State or to his friends and reflecting that he would have to throw away his life without doing any good either to himself or others he holds his peace and goes his own way He is like one who in the storm of dust and sleet which the driving wind hurries along retires under the shelter of a wall and seeing the rest of mankind full of wickedness he is content if only he can live his own life and be pure from evil or unrighteousness and depart in peace and good will with bright hopes

Yes he said and he will have done a great work before he departs

A great work—yes but not the greatest unless he find a State suitable to him [497] for in a State which is suitable to him he will have a larger growth and be the saviour of his country as well as of himself

The causes why philosophy is in such an evil name have now been sufficiently explained the injustice of the charges against her has been shown—is there anything more which you wish to say?

Nothing more on that subject he replied but I should like to know which of the governments now existing is in your opinion the one adapted to her

Not any of them I said and that is precisely the accusation which I bring against them—not one of them is worthy of the philosophic nature, and hence that nature is warped and enstranged—as the exotic seed which is sown in a foreign land becomes denaturalized and is wont to be overpowered and to lose itself in the new soil even so this growth of philosophy instead of persisting degenerates and receives another character But if philosophy ever finds in the State that perfection which she herself is, then will be seen that she is in truth divine, and that all other things whether natures of men or institutions are but human—and now I know that you are going to ask What that State is

No he said there you are wrong for I was going to ask another question—whether it is the State of which we are the founders and inventors or some other?

Yes I replied ours in most respects but you may remember my saying before that some living authority would always be required in the State having the same idea of the constitution which guided you when as legislator you were laying down the laws

That was said he replied

Yes but not in a satisfactory manner you frightened us by interposing objections which certainly showed that the discussion would be long and difficult and what still remains is the reverse of easy

What is there remaining?

The question how the study of philosophy may be so ordered as not to be the ruin of the State All great attempts are attended with risk hard is the good as men say

Still he said let the point be cleared up and the enquiry will then be complete

I shall not be hindered I said by any want of will but if at all by a want of power my zeal you may see for yourselves and please to remark in what I am about to say how boldly and unhesitatingly I declare that States should pursue philosophy not as they do now but in a different spirit

In what manner?

[498] At present I said the students of philosophy are quite young beginning when they are hardly past childhood they devote only the time saved from money making and housekeeping to such pursuits and even those of them who are reputed to have most of the philosophic spirit when they come within sight of the great difficulty of the subject, I mean dialectic take themselves off In after life when invited by some one else they may perhaps go and hear a lecture, and about this they make much ado for philosophy is not considered by them to be their proper business at last when they grow

ed, in most cases they are extinguished more truly than Heracleitus' sun, inasmuch as they never light up again.

But what ought to be their course?

Just the opposite. In childhood and youth their study, and what philosophy they learn, should be suited to their tender years: during this period while they are growing up towards manhood, the chief and special care should be given to their bodies that they may have them to use in the service of philosophy; as life advances and the intellect begins to mature, let them increase the gymnastics of the soul; but when the strength of our citizens fails and is past civil and military duties, then let them range at will and engage in no serious labour, as we intend them to live happily here, and to crown this life with a similar happiness in another.

stroyed that they can hardly be saved is not denied even by us but that in the whole course of ages no single one of them can escape—who will venture to affirm this?

Who indeed!

But, said I one is enough let there be one man who has a city obedient to his will and he might bring in existence the ideal polity about which the world is so incredulous

Yes, one is enough

The ruler may impose the laws and institutions which we have been describing and the citizens may possibly be willing to obey them?

Certainly

And that others should approve, of what we approve, is no miracle or impossibility?

I think not.

But we have sufficiently shown in what has preceded, that all this, if only possible, is assuredly for the best.

We have.

And now we say not only that our laws, if they could be enacted, would be for the best, but also that the enactment of them though difficult, is not impossible.

Very good

And so with pain and toil we have reached the end of one subject, but more remains to be discussed—how and by what studies and pursuits will the saviours of the constitution be created, and at what ages are they to apply themselves to their several studies?

Certainly

I omitted the troublesome business of the possession of women and the procreation of children and the appointment of the rulers, because I knew that the perfect State would be eyed with jealousy and was difficult of attainment but that piece of cleverness was not of much service to me, for I had to discuss them all the same The women and children are now disposed of but the other question of the rulers must be investigated from the very beginning. We were saying as you will remember that they were to be lovers of their country [503] tried by the test of pleasures and pains and neither in hardships, nor in dangers, nor at any other critical moment were to lose their patriotism—he was to be rejected who failed but he who always came forth pure, like gold tried in the refiner's fire was to be made a ruler and to receive honours and rewards in life and after death This was the sort of thing which was being said and then the argument turned aside and veiled her face not liking to stir the question which has now arisen.

I perfectly remember he said

Yes, my friend, I said and I then shrank from hazarding the bold word but now let me dare to say—that the perfect guardian must be a philosopher

Yes, he said, let that be affirmed

And do not suppose that there will be many of them for the gifts which were deemed by us to be essential rarely grow together they are mostly found in shreds and patches.

What do you mean? he said

You are aware, I replied that quick intelligence, memory sagacity cleverness, and similar qualities, do not often grow together and that persons who possess them and are at the same time high spirited and magnanimous are not so constituted by nature as to live orderly and in a peaceful and settled manner they are driven any way by their impulses, and all solid principle goes out of them.

Very true, he said

On the other hand those steadfast natures which can better be depended upon which in a battle are impregnable to fear and immovable, are equally immovable when there is anything to be learned they are always in a torpid state, and are apt to yawn and go to sleep over any intellectual toil

Quite true

And yet we were saying that both qualities were necessary in those to whom the higher education is to be imparted and who are to share in any office or command

Certainly he said.

And will they be a class which is rarely found?

Yes, indeed

Then the aspirant must not only be tested in those labours and dangers and pleasures which we mentioned before, but there is another kind of probation which we did not mention—he must be exercised also in many kinds of knowledge to see whether the soul will be able to endure the highest of all [504] or will faint under them as in any other studies and exercises.

Yes he said you are quite right in testing him But what do you mean by the highest of all knowledge?

You may remember I said that we divided the soul into three parts and distinguished the several natures of justice, temperance, courage, and wisdom?

Indeed he said if I had forgotten, I should not deserve to hear more

And do you remember the word of caution which preceded the discussion of them?

Cf. v 435.

And do you not also think as I do, that the harsh feeling which the many entertain towards philosophy originates in the pretenders, who rush in uninvited and are always abusing them and finding fault with them who make persons instead of things the theme of their conversation? and nothing can be more unbecoming in philosophers than this

It is most unbecoming

For he Adeimantus whose mind is fixed upon true being has surely no time to look down upon the affairs of earth or to be filled with malice and envy, contending against men his eye is ever directed towards things fixed and immutable which he sees neither injuring nor injured by one another but all in order moving according to reason these he imitates and to these he will as far as he can conform himself Can a man help imitating that with which he holds reverential converse?

Impossible

And the philosopher holding converse with the divine order becomes orderly and divine as far as the nature of man allows but like every one else he will suffer from detraction

Of course

And if a necessity be laid upon him of fashioning, not only himself but human nature generally whether in States or individuals into that which he beholds elsewhere will he think you be an unskilful artificer of justice temperance and every civil virtue?

Anything but unskilful

And if the world perceives that what we are saying about him is the truth will they be angry with philosophy? Will they disbelieve us when we tell them that no State can be happy which is not designed by artists who imitate the heavenly pattern?

They will not be angry if they understand he said But how will they draw out the plan of which you are speaking? [501]

They will begin by taking the State and the manners of men from which as from a tablet they will rub out the picture and leave a clean surface This is no easy task But whether easy or not herein will lie the difference between them and every other legislator—they will have nothing to do either with individual or State and will inscribe no laws until they have either found or themselves made a clean surface

They will be very right, he said

Having effected this they will proceed to trace an outline of the constitution?

No doubt

And when they are filling in the work, as I conceive they will often turn their eyes upwards and downwards I mean that they will first look at absolute justice and beauty and temperance, and again at the human copy and will mingle and temper the various elements of life into the image of a man and thus they will conceive according to that other image, which, when existing among men Homer calls the form and likeness of God

Very true he said

And one feature they will erase, and another they will put in until they have made the ways of men as far as possible, agreeable to the ways of God?

Indeed he said in no way could they make a fairer picture

And now I said are we beginning to persuade those whom you described as rushing at us with might and main that the painter of constitutions is such an one as we are praising at whom they were so very indignant because to his hands we committed the State and are they growing a little calmer at what they have just heard?

Much calmer if there is any sense in them

Why where can they still find any ground for objection? Will they doubt that the philosopher is a lover of truth and being?

They would not be so unreasonable.

Or that his nature being such as we have delineated is akin to the highest good?

Neither can they doubt this

But again will they tell us that such a nature, placed under favourable circumstances will not be perfectly good and wise if any ever was? Or will they prefer those whom we have rejected?

Surely not

Then will they still be angry at our saying that until philosophers bear rule States and individuals will have no rest from evil nor will this our imaginary State ever be realized?

I think that they will be less angry

Shall we assume that they are not only less angry but quite gentle [502] and that they have been converted and for very shame, if for no other reason cannot refuse to come to terms?

By all means he said

Then let us suppose that the reconciliation has been effected Will any one deny the other point that there may be sons of kings or princes who are by nature philosophers?

Surely no man he said

And when they have come into being will any one say that they must of necessity be de-

That, he said, is a shrewd suspicion of yours

And if we only have a guardian who has this knowledge our State will be perfectly ordered?

Of course, he repl ed but I wish that you would tell me whether you conceive this su preme principle of the good to be knowledge or pleasure, or different from either?

Aye, I said, I knew all along that a fastidious gentleman l ke you would not be contented with the thoughts of other people about these mat ters.

True, Socrates but I must say that one w ho l ke you has passed a lifetime in the study of philosophy should not be al ways repeating the opinions of others, and never telling his o n

Well but has any one a right to say positive- y what he does not know?

Not, he said, with the assurance of pos tive ertainty he has no right to do that but he may ay what he thinks, as a matter of opinion

And do you not know I said that all mere opin ons are bad, and the best of them blind? You would not deny that those who have any true not on without intelligence are only like blind men who feel their way along the road?

Very true.

And do you wish to behold what is blind and crooked and base, when others will tell you of brightness and beauty?

Still I must implore you Socrates sa d Glau con, not to turn away just as you are reaching the goal if you will only give such an expla nation of the good as you have already given of justice and temperance and the other virtues, we shall be satisfied

Yes, my friend and I shall be at least equally satisfied, but I cannot help fearing that I shall fail, and that my indiscreet zeal will bring ridi cule upon me. No, s eet sirs let us not at pres ent ask what is the actual nature of the good, for to reach what is now in my thoughts would be an effort too great for me. But of the child of the good who is likest him I would fain speak, if I could be sure that you wished to hear—oth erw se not

By all means, he sa d, tell us about the child, and you shall remain n our debt for the account of the parent.

[507] I do indeed wish, I repl ed that I could pay and you recei e, the account of the parent, and not, as now of the offspring only take, however th s latter by way of interest and at the same time ha e a care that I do not render a false account, although I ha e no intention of deceiving you.

Yes, we will take all the care that we can proceed

Yes, I said but I must first come to an under standing with you and remind you of what I have mentioned in the course of this discussion and at many other times

What?

The old story that there is a many beautiful and a many good, and so of other things which we describe and define to all of them many is applied

True he said

And there is an absolute beauty and an abso lute good and of other things to which the term many is applied there is an absolute for they may be brought under a single idea which is called the essence of each

Very true

The many as we say are seen but not known and the ideas are kno n but not seen

Exactly

And what is the organ with which we see the vis ble things?

The sight he said

And with the hearing I sa d we hear and with the other senses perceive the other objects of sense?

True.

But have you remarked that sight is by far the most costly and complex piece of workmanship which the artificer of the senses ever contrived?

No I never have he said

Then reflect has the ear or voice need of any third or additional nature in order that the one may be able to hear and the other to be heard?

Nothing of the sort.

No indeed I replied and the same is true of mo t, if not all the other senses—you would not say that any of them requ res such an addi tion?

Certainly not.

But you see that without the addition of some other nature there is no seeing or being seen?

How do you mean?

Sight being as I conceive in the eyes and he who has eyes wanting to see colour being also present in them, still unless there be a third na ture specially adapted to the purpose, the o n er of the eyes will see nothing and the colours will be n isible

Of what nature are you speaking?

Of that whi h you term l ght, I replied

True, he said

[508] Noble, then is the bond w h ch links

A pla upon wh h means both off pr g and interest.

To what do you refer?

We were saying if I am not mistaken that he who wanted to see them in their perfect beauty must take a longer and more circuitous way at the end of which they would appear, but that we could add on a popular exposition of them on a level with the discussion which had preceded And you replied that such an exposition would be enough for you and so the enquiry was continued in what to me seemed to be a very inaccurate manner whether you were satisfied or not it is for you to say

Yes he said I thought and the others thought that you gave us a fair measure of truth

But, my friend I said a measure of such things which in any degree falls short of the whole truth is not fair measure for nothing imperfect is the measure of anything although persons are too apt to be contented and think that they need search no further

Not an uncommon case when people are indolent

Yes I said and there cannot be any worse fault in a guardian of the State and of the laws

True

The guardian then I said must be required to take the longer circuit, and toil at learning as well as at gymnastics or he will never reach the highest knowledge of all which as we were just now saying is his proper calling

What he said is there a knowledge still higher than this—higher than justice and the other virtues?

Yes I said there is And of the virtues too we must behold not the outline merely as at present—nothing short of the most finished picture should satisfy us When little things are elaborated with an infinity of pains in order that they may appear in their full beauty and utmost clearness how ridiculous that we should not think the highest truths worthy of attaining the highest accuracy!

A right noble thought but do you suppose that we shall refrain from asking you what is this highest knowledge?

Nay I said ask if you will but I am certain that you have heard the answer many times and now you either do not understand me or as I rather think you are disposed to be troublesome for you have often been told that the idea of good is the highest [505] knowledge, and that all other things become useful and advantageous only by their use of this You can hardly be ignorant that of this I was about to speak concerning which as you have often heard me say we know so little and without which any other knowledge or possession of any kind will profit us nothing Do you think that the possession of all other things is of any value if we do not possess the good? or the knowledge of all other things if we have no knowledge of beauty and goodness?

Assuredly not

You are further aware that most people affirm pleasure to be the good but the finer sort of wits say it is knowledge?

Yes

And you are aware too that the latter cannot explain what they mean by knowledge, but are obliged after all to say knowledge of the good?

How ridiculous!

Yes I said that they should begin by reproaching us with our ignorance of the good, and then presume our knowledge of it—for the good they define to be knowledge of the good, just as if we understood them when they use the term good —this is of course ridiculous

Most true, he said

And those who make pleasure their good are in equal perplexity for they are compelled to admit that there are bad pleasures as well as good

Certainly

And therefore to acknowledge that bad and good are the same?

True

There can be no doubt about the numerous difficulties in which this question is involved

There can be none

Further do we not see that many are willing to do or to have or to seem to be what is just and honourable without the reality but no one is satisfied with the appearance of good—the reality is what they seek in the case of the good appearance is despised by every one.

Very true he said

Of this then which every soul of man pursues and makes the end of all his actions having a presentiment that there is such an end [506] and yet hesitating because neither knowing the nature nor having the same assurance of this as of other things and therefore losing whatever good there is in other things —of a principle such and so great as this ought the best men in our State to whom everything is entrusted to be in the darkness of ignorance?

Certainly not, he said

I am sure I said that he who does not know how the beautiful and the just are likewise good will be but a sorry guardian of them and I suspect that no one who is ignorant of the good will have a true knowledge of them the first section in the sphere of the visible consists of images. [510] And by images I mean, in the first place, shadows, and in the second place, reflections in water and in solid, smooth and polished bodies and the like. Do you understand?

Yes, I understand.

Imagine, now, the other section, of which this is only the resemblance, to include the animals which we see, and everything that grows or is made.

Very good.

Would you not admit that both the sections of this division have different degrees of truth, and that the copy is to the original as the sphere of opinion is to the sphere of knowledge?

Most undoubtedly.

Next proceed to consider the manner in which the sphere of the intellectual is to be divided.

In what manner?

Thus:—There are two subdivisions, in the lower of which the soul uses the figures given by the former division as images; the enquiry can only be hypothetical, and instead of going upwards to a principle descends to the other end; in the higher of the two, the soul passes out of hypotheses, and goes up to a principle which is above hypotheses, making no use of images as in the former case, but proceeding only in and through the ideas themselves.

I do not quite understand your meaning, he said.

Then I will try again; you will understand me better when I have made some preliminary remarks. You are aware that students of geometry, arithmetic, and the kindred sciences assume the odd and the even and the figures and three kinds of angles and the like in their several branches of science; these are their hypotheses, which they and everybody are supposed to know, and therefore they do not deign to give any account of them either to themselves or others; but they begin with them, and go on until they arrive at last, and in a consistent manner, at their conclusion?

Yes, he said, I know.

And do you not know also that although they make use of the visible forms and reason about them, they are thinking not of these, but of the ideals which they resemble; not of the figures which they draw, but of the absolute square and the absolute diameter, and so on—the forms which they draw or make, and which have shadows and reflections in water of their own, are converted by them into images, but they are really seeking to behold the things themselves, which can only be seen with the eye of the mind?

[511] That is true.

And of this kind I spoke as the intelligible, although in the search after it the soul is compelled to use hypotheses; not ascending to a first principle, because she is unable to rise above the region of hypothesis, but employing the objects of which the shadows below are resemblances in their turn as images, they having in relation to the shadows and reflections of them a greater distinctness, and therefore a higher value.

I understand, he said, that you are speaking of the province of geometry and the sister arts.

And when I speak of the other division of the intelligible, you will understand me to speak of that other sort of knowledge which reason herself attains by the power of dialectic, using the hypotheses not as first principles, but only as hypotheses—that is to say, as steps and points of departure into a world which is above hypotheses, in order that she may soar beyond them to the first principle of the whole; and clinging to this and then to that which depends on this, by successive steps she descends again without the aid of any sensible object, from ideas, through ideas, and in ideas she ends.

I understand you, he replied; not perfectly, for you seem to me to be describing a task which is really tremendous; but, at any rate, I understand you to say that knowledge and being, which the science of dialectic contemplates, are clearer than the notions of the arts, as they are termed, which proceed from hypotheses only: these are also contemplated by the understanding, and not by the senses: yet, because they start from hypotheses and do not ascend to a principle, those who contemplate them appear to you not to exercise the higher reason upon them, although when a first principle is added to them they are cognizable by the higher reason. And the habit which is concerned with geometry and the cognate sciences I suppose that you would term understanding and not reason, as being intermediate between opinion and reason.

You have quite conceived my meaning, I said; and now, corresponding to these four divisions, let there be four faculties in the soul—reason answering to the highest, understanding to the second, faith (or conviction) to the third, and perception of shadows to the last—and let there be a scale of them, and let us suppose that the several faculties have clearness in the same degree that their objects have truth.

together sight and visibility and great beyond other bonds by no small difference of nature for light is their bond, and light is no ignoble thing?

Nay he said the reverse of ignoble

And which I said of the gods in heaven would you say was the lord of this element? Whose is that light which makes the eye to see perfectly and the visible to appear?

You mean the sun, as you and all mankind say

May not the relation of sight to this deity be described as follows?

How?

Neither sight nor the eye in which sight resides is the sun?

No

Yet of all the organs of sense the eye is the most like the sun?

By far the most like

And the power which the eye possesses is a sort of effluence which is dispensed from the sun?

Exactly

Then the sun is not sight but the author of sight who is recognized by sight

True he said

And this is he whom I call the child of the good whom the good begat in his own likeness, to be in the visible world in relation to sight and the things of sight what the good is in the intellectual world in relation to mind and the things of mind

Will you be a little more explicit? he said

Why you know I said that the eyes when a person directs them towards objects on which the light of day is no longer shining but the moon and stars only see dimly and are nearly blind they seem to have no clearness of vision in them?

Very true

But when they are directed towards objects on which the sun shines they see clearly and there is sight in them?

Certainly

And the soul is like the eye when resting upon that on which truth and being shine, the soul perceives and understands and is radiant with intelligence but when turned towards the twilight of becoming and perishing then she has opinion only and goes blinking about and is first of one opinion and then of another and seems to have no intelligence?

Just so

Now that which imparts truth to the known and the power of knowing to the knower is what I would have you term the idea of good, and this you will deem to be the cause of science, and of truth in so far as the latter becomes the subject of knowledge beautiful too, as are both truth and knowledge, you will be right in esteeming this other nature as more beautiful than either [509] and as in the previous instance light and sight may be truly said to be like the sun and yet not to be the sun so in this other sphere science and truth may be deemed to be like the good but not the good the good has a place of honour yet higher

What a wonder of beauty that must be, he said which is the author of science and truth, and yet surpasses them in beauty for you surely cannot mean to say that pleasure is the good?

God forbid I replied, but may I ask you to consider the image in another point of view?

In what point of view?

You would say would you not, that the sun is not only the author of visibility in all visible things but of generation and nourishment and growth though he himself is not generation?

Certainly

In like manner the good may be said to be not only the author of knowledge to all things known but of their being and essence and yet the good is not essence but far exceeds essence in dignity and power

Glaucon said with a ludicrous earnestness By the light of heaven how amazing!

Yes I said and the exaggeration may be set down to you for you made me utter my fancies

And pray continue to utter them at any rate let us hear if there is anything more to be said about the similitude of the sun

Yes I said there is a great deal more

Then omit nothing however slight.

I will do my best I said but I should think that a great deal will have to be omitted

You have to imagine then that there are two ruling powers and that one of them is set over the intellectual world the other over the visible. I do not say heaven lest you should fancy that I am playing upon the name (ο ρανος ορατος) May I suppose that you have this distinction of the visible and intelligible fixed in your mind?

I have

Now take a line which has been cut into two unequal parts and divide each of them again in the same proportion and suppose the two main divisions to answer one to the visible and the other to the intelligible and then compare the subdivisions in respect of their clearness and want of clearness and you will find that the first section in the sphere of the visible consists of images. [510] And by images I mean, in the first place, shadows, and in the second place, reflections in water and in solid, smooth and polished bodies and the like Do you understand?

Now take a line which has been cut into two unequal parts and divide each of them again in the same proportion and suppose the two main divisions to answer one to the visible and the other to the intelligible and then compare the subdivisions in respect of their clearness and want of clearness and you will find that

Clearly he said, he would first see the sun and then reason about him

And when he remembered his old habitation, and the wisdom of the den and his fellow prisoners, do you not suppose that he would felicitate himself on the change, and pity them?

Certainly he would

And if they were in the habit of conferring honours among themselves on those who were quickest to observe the pass ng shadows and to remark wh ch of them went before and which followed after and which were together and who were therefore best able to draw con clusions as to the future do you think that he would care for such honours and glories, or envy the possessors of them? Would he not say with Homer

Better to be th poo ser ant of a poor master and to endure anything, rather than think as they do and li e after their manner?

Yes, he said, I think that he would rather suffer anything than entertain these false notions and live in th s miserable manner

Imagine once more I said such an one coming suddenly out of the sun to be replaced in his old s tuation would he not be certain to ha e h s eyes full of darkness?

To be sure, he sa d

And if there were a contest and he had to compete in measuring the shadows with the prisoners who had ne er moved out of the [517] den wh le his sight was still weak and bef re his eyes had become steady (and the time wh ch would be needed to acquire this new hab t of s ght m ght be ery considerable) would he not be ridiculous? Men would say of him that up he went and down he came w th out his eyes and that it was better not even to think of ascending and if any one tried to loose another and lead h m up to the l ght let them only catch the offender and they would put him to death

No question he said

Th s ent re allegory I said, you may now append dear Glau on, to the previous argument the pr son house is the wo ld of sight, the l ght of the fi e is the sun, and you will not misapprehend me if you interpret th journey upwards to be the ascent of the soul into the intellectual world acco ding to my poor be l ef which, at your desire I have expressed—whether r ghtly or ongly God knows. But, whether true or false, my opinion is th t in the world o knowledge the dea of good appears last of all and is seen only with an effort and, when seen, is also inferred to be the universal author of all things beautiful and right, parent of light and of the lord of light in this visible world, and the immediate source of reason and truth in the intellectual and that this is the power upon which he who would act rationally either in public or private life must have his eye fixed

I agree, he said, as far as I am able to under stand you.

Moreover I said you must not wonder that those who attain to this beatific vis on are un willing to descend to human affairs for their souls are ever hastening into the upper world where they desire to dwell which desire of theirs is very natural if our allegory may be trusted

Yes, very natural

And is there anything surprising in one who passes from divine contemplations to the evil state of man misbehaving himself in a ridicu lous manner if while his eyes are blinking and before he has become accustomed to the surrounding darkness, he is compelled to fight in courts of law or in other places about the images or the shadows of images of justice, and is endeavouring to meet the conceptions of those who have never yet seen absolute justice?

Anything but surprising he replied

[518] Any one who has common sense will remember that the bewilderments of the eyes are of two kinds, and arise from two causes ei ther from coming out of the light or from going into the light, which is true of the mind s eye, qu te as much as of the bodily eye and he who remembers this when he sees any one whose v sion is perplexed and weak will not be too ready to laugh he will first ask whether that soul of man has come out of the brighter life, and is unable to see because unaccustomed to the dark, or having turned from darkness to the day is dazzled by excess of light. And he will count the one happy in his cond tion and state of being and he will pity the other or if he have a mind to laugh at the soul which comes from below into the l ght, there will be more reason in this than in the laugh which greets him who returns from abo e out of the light into the den

That, he said is a very just distinction

But then if I am right, certa n professors of education must be wrong when they say that they can put a knowledge into the soul which was not there before, like sight into blind eyes.

They undoubtedly say this, he repl ed

Whereas, our argument shows that the power

I understand, he replied and give my assent, and accept your arrangement

BOOK VII

[514] AND now I said let me show in a figure how far our nature is enlightened or unenlightened —Behold! human beings living in an underground den which has a mouth open towards the light and reaching all along the den here they have been from their childhood and have their legs and necks chained so that they cannot move and can only see before them being prevented by the chains from turning round their heads Above and behind them a fire is blazing at a distance and between the fire and the prisoners there is a raised way and you will see if you look a low wall built along the way like the screen which marionette players have in front of them over which they show the puppets

I see

And do you see I said men passing along the wall carrying all sorts of vessels [515] and statues and figures of animals made of wood and stone and various materials which appear over the wall? Some of them are talking others silent

You have shown me a strange image, and they are strange prisoners

Like ourselves I replied and they see only their own shadows or the shadows of one another which the fire throws on the opposite wall of the cave?

True he said how could they see anything but the shadows if they were never allowed to move their heads?

And of the objects which are being carried in like manner they would only see the shadows?

Yes he said

And if they were able to converse with one another would they not suppose that they were naming what was actually before them?

Very true

And suppose further that the prison had an echo which came from the other side, would they not be sure to fancy when one of the passers-by spoke that the voice which they heard came from the passing shadow?

No question he replied

To them I said the truth would be literally nothing but the shadows of the images

That is certain

And now look again and see what will naturally follow if the prisoners are released and disabused of their error At first, when any of them is liberated and compelled suddenly to stand up and turn his neck round and walk and look towards the light he will suffer sharp pains the glare will distress him and he will be unable to see the realities of which in his former state he had seen the shadows and then conceive some one saying to him that what he saw before was an illusion but that now when he is approaching nearer to being and his eye is turned towards more real existence, he has a clearer vision—what will be his reply? And you may further imagine that his instructor is pointing to the objects as they pass and requiring him to name them—will he not be perplexed? Will he not fancy that the shadows which he formerly saw are truer than the objects which are now shown to him?

Far truer

And if he is compelled to look straight at the light will he not have a pain in his eyes which will make him turn away to take refuge in the objects of vision which he can see, and which he will conceive to be in reality clearer than the things which are now being shown to him?

True he said

And suppose once more that he is reluctantly dragged up a steep and rugged ascent, and held fast until he is forced into the presence of the sun himself [516] is he not likely to be pained and irritated? When he approaches the light his eyes will be dazzled and he will not be able to see anything at all of what are now called realities

Not all in a moment he said

He will require to grow accustomed to the sight of the upper world And first he will see the shadows best next the reflections of men and other objects in the water and then the objects themselves then he will gaze upon the light of the moon and the stars and the spangled heaven and he will see the sky and the stars by night better than the sun or the light of the sun by day?

Certainly

Last of all he will be able to see the sun and not mere reflections of him in the water but he will see him in his own proper place, and not in another and he will contemplate him as he is

Certainly

He will then proceed to argue that this is he who gives the season and the years and is the guardian of all that is in the visible world and in a certain way the cause of all things which he and his fellows have been accustomed to behold?

dream only, and will be administered in a spirit unlike that of other States, in which men fight with one another about shadows only and are distracted in the struggle for power, which in their eyes is a great good. Whereas the truth is that the State in which the rulers are most reluctant to govern is always the best and most quietly governed, and the State in which they are most eager, the worst.

Quite true, he replied.

And will our pupils, when they hear this, refuse to take their turn at the toils of State, when they are allowed to spend the greater part of their time with one another in the heavenly light?

Impossible, he answered; for they are just men, and the commands which we impose upon them are just; there can be no doubt that every one of them will take office as a stern necessity, and not after the fashion of our present rulers of State.

Yes, my friend, I said; and there lies the point. You must contrive for your future rulers another and a better life than that of [521] a ruler, and then you may have a well-ordered State; for only in the State which offers this, will they rule who are truly rich, not in silver and gold, but in virtue and wisdom, which are the true blessings of life. Whereas if they go to the administration of public affairs, poor and hungering after their own private advantage, thinking that hence they are to snatch the chief good, order there can never be; for they will be fighting about office, and the civil and domestic broils which thus arise will be the ruin of the rulers themselves and of the whole State.

Most true, he replied.

And the only life which looks down upon the life of political ambition is that of true philosophy. Do you know of any other?

Indeed, I do not, he said.

And those who govern ought not to be lovers of the task? For, if they are, there will be rival lovers, and they will fight.

No question.

Who then are those whom we shall compel to be guardians? Surely they will be the men who are wisest about affairs of State, and by whom the State is best administered, and who at the same time have other honours and another and a better life than that of politics?

They are the men, and I will choose them, he replied.

And now shall we consider in what way such guardians will be produced, and how they are to be brought from darkness to light—as some are said to have ascended from the world below to the gods?

By all means, he replied.

The process, I said, is not the turning over of an oyster shell,[1] but the turning round of a soul passing from a day which is little better than night to the true day of being, that is, the ascent from below, which we affirm to be true philosophy?

Quite so.

And should we not enquire what sort of knowledge has the power of effecting such a change?

Certainly.

What sort of knowledge is there which would draw the soul from becoming to being? And another consideration has just occurred to me. You will remember that our young men are to be warrior athletes?

Yes, that was said.

Then this new kind of knowledge must have an additional quality?

What quality?

Usefulness in war.

Yes, if possible.

There were two parts in our former scheme of education, were there not?

Just so.

There was gymnastic which presided over the growth and decay of the body, and may therefore be regarded as having to do with generation and corruption?

True.

[522] Then that is not the knowledge which we are seeking to discover?

No.

But what do you say of music, what also entered to a certain extent into our former scheme?

Music, he said, as you will remember, was the counterpart of gymnastic, and trained the guardians by the influences of habit, by harmony making them harmonious, by rhythm rhythmical, but not giving them science; and the words, whether fabulous or possibly true, had kindred elements of rhythm and harmony in them. But in music there was nothing which tended to that good which you are now seeking.

You are most accurate, I said, in your recollection; in music there certainly was nothing of the kind. But what branch of knowledge is there, my dear Glaucon, which is of the desired nature; since all the useful arts were

[1] In allusion to a game in which two parties fled or pursued according as an oyster-shell which was thrown into the air fell with the dark or light side uppermost.

and capacity of learning exists in the soul already and that just as the eye was unable to turn from darkness to light without the whole body so too the instrument of knowledge can only by the movement of the whole soul be turned from the world of becoming into that of being and learn by degrees to endure the sight of being and of the brightest and best of being or in other words of the good

Very true

And must there not be some art which will effect conversion in the easiest and quickest manner not implanting the faculty of sight, for that exists already but has been turned in the wrong direction and is looking away from the truth?

Yes he said such an art may be presumed

And whereas the other so-called virtues of the soul seem to be akin to bodily qualities for even when they are not originally innate they can be implanted later by habit and exercise the virtue of wisdom more than anything else contains a divine element which always remains and by this conversion is rendered useful and profitable [519] or on the other hand hurtful and useless Did you never observe the narrow intelligence flashing from the keen eye of a clever rogue—how eager he is how clearly his paltry soul sees the way to his end he is the reverse of blind but his keen eye sight is forced into the service of evil and he is mischievous in proportion to his cleverness?

Very true he said

But what if there had been a circumcision of such natures in the days of their youth and they had been severed from those sensual pleasures such as eating and drinking which like leaden weights were attached to them at their birth and which drag them down and turn the vision of their souls upon the things that are below—if I say they had been released from these impediments and turned in the opposite direction the very same faculty in them would have seen the truth as keenly as they see what their eyes are turned to now

Yes I said and there is another thing which is likely or rather a necessary inference from what has preceded that neither the uneducated and uninformed of the truth nor yet those who never make an end of their education will be able ministers of State not the former because they have no single aim of duty which is the rule of all their actions private as well as public nor the latter because they will not act at all except upon compulsion fancying that they are already dwelling apart in the islands of the blest

Very true he replied

Then I said the business of us who are the founders of the State will be to compel the best minds to attain that knowledge which we have already shown to be the greatest of all—they must continue to ascend until they arrive at the good but when they have ascended and seen enough we must not allow them to do as they do now

What do you mean?

I mean that they remain in the upper world but this must not be allowed they must be made to descend again among the prisoners in the den and partake of their labours and honours, whether they are worth having or not

But is not this unjust? he said ought we to give them a worse life when they might have a better?

You have again forgotten my friend I said, the intention of the legislator who did not aim at making any one class in the State happy above the rest the happiness was to be in the whole State and he held the citizens together by persuasion and necessity making them benefactors of the State [520] and therefore benefactors of one another to this end he created them not to please themselves but to be his instruments in binding up the State

True he said I had forgotten

Observe Glaucon that there will be no injustice in compelling our philosophers to have a care and providence of others we shall explain to them that in other States men of their class are not obliged to share in the toils of politics and this is reasonable for they grow up at their own sweet will and the government would rather not have them Being self taught they cannot be expected to show any gratitude for a culture which they have never received But we have brought you into the world to be rulers of the hive kings of yourselves and of the other citizens and have educated you far better and more perfectly than they have been educated, and you are better able to share in the double duty Wherefore each of you when his turn comes must go down to the general underground abode and get the habit of seeing in the dark When you have acquired the habit you will see ten thousand times better than the inhabitants of the den and you will know what the several images are and what they represent, because you have seen the beautiful and just and good in their truth And thus our State which is also yours will be a reality and not a intimation which the sense gives of a hard which is also soft? What, again, is the meaning of light and heavy, if that which is light is also heavy, and that which is heavy, light?

Yes, he said, these intimations which the soul receives are very curious and require to be explained.

Yes, I said, and in these perplexities the soul naturally summons to her aid calculation and intelligence, that she may see whether the several objects announced to her are one or two.

True.

And if they turn out to be two, is not each of them one and different?

Certainly.

And if each is one, and both are two, she will conceive the two as in a state of division, for if they were undivided they could only be conceived of as one?

True.

The eye certainly did see both small and great, but only in a confused manner; they were not distinguished.

Yes.

Whereas the thinking mind, intending to light up the chaos, was compelled to reverse the process, and look at small and great as separate and not confused.

Very true.

Was not this the beginning of the enquiry "What is great?" and "What is small?"

Exactly so.

And thus arose the distinction of the visible and the intelligible.

Most true.

This was what I meant when I spoke of impressions which invited the intellect, or the reverse—those which are simultaneous with opposite impressions, invite thought; those which are not simultaneous do not.

I understand, he said, and agree with you.

And to which class do unity and number belong?

I do not know, he replied.

Think a little and you will see that what has preceded will supply the answer; for if simple unity could be adequately perceived by the sight or by any other sense, then, as we were saying in the case of the finger, there would be nothing to attract towards being; but when there is some contradiction always present, and one is the reverse of one and involves the conception of plurality, then thought begins to be aroused within us, and the soul perplexed and wanting to arrive at a decision asks "What is absolute unity?" This is the way in which the study of the one has a power of drawing [525] and converting the mind to the contemplation of true being.

And surely, he said, this occurs notably in the case of one; for we see the same thing to be both one and infinite in multitude?

Yes, I said; and this being true of one must be equally true of all numbers?

Certainly.

And all arithmetic and calculation have to do with number?

Yes.

And they appear to lead the mind towards truth?

Yes, in a very remarkable manner.

Then this is knowledge of the kind for which we are seeking, having a double use, military and philosophical; for the man of war must learn the art of number or he will not know how to array his troops, and the philosopher also, because he has to rise out of the sea of change and lay hold of true being, and therefore he must be an arithmetician.

That is true.

And our guardian is both warrior and philosopher?

Certainly.

Then this is a kind of knowledge which legislation may fitly prescribe; and we must endeavour to persuade those who are to be the principal men of our State to go and learn arithmetic, not as amateurs, but they must carry on the study until they see the nature of numbers with the mind only; nor again, like merchants or retail-traders, with a view to buying or selling, but for the sake of their military use, and of the soul herself; and because this will be the easiest way for her to pass from becoming to truth and being.

That is excellent, he said.

Yes, I said, and now having spoken of it, I must add how charming the science is! and in how many ways it conduces to our desired end, if pursued in the spirit of a philosopher, and not of a shopkeeper!

How do you mean?

I mean, as I was saying, that arithmetic has a very great and elevating effect, compelling the soul to reason about abstract number, and rebelling against the introduction of visible or tangible objects into the argument. You know how steadily the masters of the art repel and ridicule any one who attempts to divide absolute unity when he is calculating, and if you divide, they multiply, taking care that one shall continue one and not become lost in fractions.

That is very true.

reckoned mean by us?

Undoubtedly and yet if music and gymnastic are excluded and the arts are also excluded, what remains?

Well, I said there may be nothing left of our special subjects and then we shall have to take something which is not special but of universal application

What may that be?

A something which all arts and sciences and intelligences use in common, and which every one first has to learn among the elements of education

What is that?

The little matter of distinguishing one two and three—in a word number and calculation —do not all arts and sciences necessarily partake of them?

Yes

Then the art of war partakes of them?

To be sure

Then Palamedes whenever he appears in tragedy proves Agamemnon ridiculously unfit to be a general Did you never remark how he declares that he had invented number and had numbered the ships and set in array the ranks of the army at Troy which implies that they had never been numbered before and Agamemnon must be supposed literally to have been incapable of counting his own feet—how could he if he was ignorant of number? And if that is true what sort of general must he have been?

I should say a very strange one if this was as you say

Can we deny that a warrior should have a knowledge of arithmetic?

Certainly he should if he is to have the smallest understanding of military tactics or indeed I should rather say if he is to be a man at all

I should like to know whether you have the same notion whi h I have of this study?

What is your notion?

It appears to me to be a study of the kind which we are seeking and which leads naturally to reflection [523] but never to have been rightly used for the true use of it is simply to draw the soul towards being

Will you explain your meaning? he said

I will try I said and I wish you would share the enquiry with me and say yes or no when I attempt to distinguish in my own mind what branches of knowledge have this attract ing power in order that we may have clearer proof that arithmetic is as I suspect, one of them

Explain he said

I mean to say that objects of sense are of tw kinds some of them do not invite thought be cause the sense is an adequate judge of them while in the case of other objects sense is so un trustworthy that further enquiry is imperativ ly demanded

You are clearly referring he said to the man ner in which the senses are imposed upon by distance and by painting in light and shade.

No I said that is not at all my meaning

Then what is your meaning?

When speaking of uninviting objects, I mean those which do not pass from one sensation to the opposite inviting objects are those which do in this latter case the sense coming upon the object, whether at a distance or near, gives no more vivid idea of anything in particular than of its opposite An illustration will make my meaning clearer —here are three fingers—a little finger a second finger and a middle finger

Very good

You may suppose that they are seen quite close And here comes the point

What is it?

Each of them equally appears a finger whether seen in the middle or at the extremity whether white or black or thick or thin—it makes no difference a finger is a finger all the same In these cases a man is not compelled to ask of thought the question what is a finger? for the sight never intimates to the mind that a finger is other than a finger

True

And therefore I said as we might expect, there is nothing here which invites or excites intelligence

There is not he said

But is this equally true of the greatness and smallness of the fingers? Can sight adequately perceive them? and is no difference made by the circumstance that one of the fingers is in the middle and another at the extremity? And in like manner does the touch adequately perceive the qualities of thickness or thinness of softness or hardness? And so of the other senses, do they give perfect intimations of such matters? [524] Is not their mode of operation on this wise—the sense which is concerned with the quality of hardness is necessarily concerned also with the quality of softness and only intimates to the soul that the same thing is felt to be both hard and soft?

You are quite right he said

And must not the soul be perplexed at this intimation which the sense gives of a hard which is also soft? What, again, is the meaning of light and heavy, if that which is light is also heavy, and that which is heavy, light?

Yes, he said, these intimations which the soul receives are very curious and require to be explained.

I should like to know whether you have the same notion which I have of this study?

What is your notion?

It appears to me to be a study of the kind which we are seeking and which leads naturally to reflection [523] but never to have been rightly used for the true use of it is simply to draw the soul towards being

Will you explain your meaning? he said

I will try I said and I wish you would share the enquiry with me and say yes or no when I attempt to distinguish in my own mind what branches of knowledge have this attracting power in order that we may have clearer proof that arithmetic is as I suspect, one of them

Explain, he said

I mean to say that objects of sense are of two kinds some of them do not invite thought because the sense is an adequate judge of them while in the case of other objects sense is so untrustworthy that further enquiry is imperatively demanded

You are clearly referring he said to the manner in which the senses are imposed upon by distance and by painting in light and shade

No I said that is not at all my meaning

Then what is your meaning?

When speaking of uninviting objects, I mean those which do not pass from one sensation to the opposite inviting objects are those which do in this latter case the sense coming upon the object, whether at a distance or near gives no more vivid idea of anything in particular than of its opposite An illustration will make my meaning clearer —here are three fingers—a little finger a second finger and a middle finger

Very good

You may suppose that they are seen quite close And here comes the point

What is it?

Each of them equally appears a finger whether seen in the middle or at the extremity whether white or black or thick or thin—it makes no difference a finger is a finger all the same In these cases a man is not compelled to ask of thought the question what is a finger? for the sight never intimates to the mind that a finger is other than a finger

True

And therefore I said as we might expect, there is nothing here which invites or excites intelligence

There is not, he said

But is this equally true of the greatness and smallness of the fingers? Can sight adequately perceive them? and is no difference made by the circumstance that one of the fingers is in the middle and another at the extremity? And in like manner does the touch adequately perceive the qualities of thickness or thinness of softness or hardness? And so of the other senses do they give perfect intimations of such matters? [524] Is not their mode of operation on this wise—the sense which is concerned with the quality of hardness is necessarily concerned also with the quality of softness and only intimates to the soul that the same thing is felt to be both hard and soft?

You are quite right he said

And must not the soul be perplexed at this

intimation which the sense gives of a hard which is also soft? What, again is the mean ing of light and heavy if that which is light is also heavy and that which is heavy light?

Yes, he said, these intimations which the soul receives are very curious and require to be ex plained.

Yes, I said, and in these perplexities the soul naturally summons to her aid calculation and intelligence, that she may see whether the sev eral objects announced to her are one or two.

True.

And if they turn out to be two is not each of them one and different?

Certainly

And if each is one, and both are two, she will conceive the two as in a state of division, for if they were undivided they could only be conceived of as one?

True.

The eye certainly did see both small and great, but only in a confused manner they were not distinguished

Yes

Whereas the thinking mind, intending to light up the chaos was compelled to reverse the process, and look at small and great as sep arate and not confused

Very true

Was not this the beginning of the enquiry "What is great? and What is small?"

Exactly so

And thus arose the distinction of the visible and the intelligible

Most true.

This was what I meant when I spoke of im pressions which invited the intellect, or the re verse—those which are simultaneous with op posite impressions invite thought those which are not simultaneous do not.

I understand he said, and agree with you

And to which class do unity and number be long?

I do not know he replied

Think a little and you will see that what has preceded will supply the answer for if simple unity could be adequately perceived by the sight or by any other sense, then, as we were saying in the case of the finger there would be nothing to attract towards being but when there is some contradiction always present, and one is the re verse of one and involves the conception of plu rality then thought begins to be aroused within us, and the soul perplexed and wanting to arrive at a decision asks What is absolute unity? This is the way in which the study of the one has a power of drawing [525] and converting the mind to the contemplation of true being

And surely he said this occurs notably in the case of one for we see the same thing to be both one and infinite in multitude?

Yes I said and this being true of one must be equally true of all number?

Certainly

And all arithmetic and calculation have to do with number?

Yes

And they appear to lead the mind towards truth?

Yes in a very remarkable manner

Then this is knowledge of the kind for which we are seeking having a double use, military and philosophical for the man of war must learn the art of number or he will not know how to array his troops and the philosopher also, because he has to rise out of the sea of change and lay hold of true being and therefore he must be an arithmetician

That is true

And our guardian is both warrior and philos opher?

Certainly

Then this is a kind of knowledge which leg islation may fitly prescribe and we must en deavour to persuade those who are to be the principal men of our State to go and learn arithmetic, not as amateurs but they must carry on the study until they see the nature of num bers with the mind only nor again, like mer chants or retail-traders with a view to buying or selling but for the sake of their military use, and of the soul herself and because this will be the easiest way for her to pass from be coming to truth and being

That is excellent, he said

Yes, I said, and now having spoken of it, I must add how charming the science is! and in how many ways it conduces to our desired end if pursued in the spirit of a philosopher and not of a shopkeeper!

How do you mean?

I mean as I was saying, that arithmetic has a very great and elevating effect, compelling the soul to reason about abstract number and re belling against the introduction of visible or tangible objects into the argument You know how steadily the masters of the art repel and ridicule any one who attempts to divide abso lute unity when he is calculating and if you divide, they multiply taking care that one shall continue one and not become lost in fractions.

That is very true.

[526] Now suppose a person were to say to them O my friends what are these wonderful numbers about which you are reasoning in which as you say there is a unity such as you demand and each unit is equal invariable indivisible—what would they answer?

They would answer as I should conceive, that they were speaking of those numbers which can only be realized in thought

Then you see that this knowledge may be truly called necessary necessitating as it clearly does the use of the pure intelligence in the attainment of pure truth?

Yes that is a marked characteristic of it

And have you further observed, that those who have a natural talent for calculation are generally quick at every other kind of knowledge, and even the dull, if they have had an arithmetical training although they may derive no other advantage from it, always become much quicker than they would otherwise have been

Very true he said

And indeed you will not easily find a more difficult study and not many as difficult

You will not

And for all these reasons arithmetic is a kind of knowledge in which the best natures should be trained and which must not be given up

I agree

Let this then be made one of our subjects of education And next shall we enquire whether the kindred science also concerns us?

You mean geometry?

Exactly so

Clearly he said we are concerned with that part of geometry which relates to war for in pitching a camp or taking up a position or closing or extending the lines of an army or any other military manœuvre whether in actual battle or on a march it will make all the difference whether a general is or is not a geometrician

Yes I said but for that purpose a very little of either geometry or calculation will be enough the question relates rather to the greater and more advanced part of geometry—whether that tends in any degree to make more easy the vision of the idea of good and thither as I was saying all things tend which compel the soul to turn her gaze towards that place where is the full perfection of being which she ought, by all means to behold

True he said

Then if geometry compels us to view being it concerns us, if becoming only, it does not concern us?

[527] Yes that is what we assert.

Yet anybody who has the least acquaintance with geometry will not deny that such a conception of the science is in flat contradiction to the ordinary language of geometricians.

How so?

They have in view practice only and are always speaking in a narrow and ridiculous manner of squaring and extending and applying and the like—they confuse the necessities of geometry with those of daily life whereas knowledge is the real object of the whole science.

Certainly he said

Then must not a further admission be made?

What admission?

That the knowledge at which geometry aims is knowledge of the eternal and not of aught perishing and transient

That, he replied may be readily allowed and is true

Then my noble friend geometry will draw the soul towards truth and create the spirit of philosophy and raise up that which is now unhappily allowed to fall down

Nothing will be more likely to have such an effect

Then nothing should be more sternly laid down than that the inhabitants of your fair city should by all means learn geometry Moreover the science has indirect effects which are not small

Of what kind? he said

There are the military advantages of which you spoke I said and in all departments of knowledge as experience proves any one who has studied geometry is infinitely quicker of apprehension than one who has not

Yes indeed he said there is an infinite difference between them

Then shall we propose this as a second branch of knowledge which our youth will study?

Let us do so he replied

And suppose we make astronomy the third—what do you say?

I am strongly inclined to it, he said the observation of the seasons and of months and years is as essential to the general as it is to the farmer or sailor

I am amused I said at your fear of the world which makes you guard against the appearance of insisting upon useless studies and I quite admit the difficulty of believing that in every man there is an eye of the soul which when by other pursuits lost and dimmed is by these purified and re illumined and is more precious far than ten thousand bodily eyes, for by it alone is truth seen Now there are two classes of persons one class of those who will agree with you and will take your words as a revelation another class to whom they will be utterly unmeaning [528] and who will naturally deem them to be idle tales, for they see no sort of profit which is to be obtained from them. And therefore you had better decide at once with which of the two you are proposing to argue. You will very likely say with neither and that your chief aim in carrying on the argument is your own improvement at the same time you do not grudge to others any benefit which they may receive.

I think that I should prefer to carry on the argument mainly on my own behalf.

Then take a step backward, for we have gone wrong in the order of the sciences.

What was the mistake? he said

After plane geometry I said, we proceeded at once to solids in revolution, instead of taking solids in themselves whereas after the second dimension the third, which is concerned with cubes and dimensions of depth, ought to have followed.

That is true, Socrates but so little seems to be known as yet about these subjects

Why yes, I said and for two reasons —in the first place, no government patronises them this leads to a want of energy in the pursuit of them, and they are difficult in the second place, students cannot learn them unless they have a director But then a director can hardly be found, and e en if he could as matters now stand, the students, who are very conceited, would not attend to him. That, however would be otherwise if the who e Sta e became the director of these stud es and gave honour to them then d sciples would want to come, and there w uld be continuous and earnest search, and d sco eries would be made since even now disr garded as they are by the world and maimed of their fair proportions, and although none of their otar es can tell the use of them, still these studies fo ce their way by their natural charm, and very likely if they had the help of the State, they would some day emerge into l ght.

Yes, he said, there is a remarkable charm in them. But I do not clearly understand the change in the order First you began with a geometry of plane surfaces?

Yes, I said.

And you placed astr nomy next, and then you made a step ba kward?

Yes, and I have delayed you by my hurry the ludicrous state of solid geometry which, in natural order should have followed made me pass over this branch and go on to astronomy or motion of solids.

True, he said

Then assuming that the science no v omitted would come into existence if encouraged by the State, let us go on to astronomy which will be fourth.

The right order he replied And now Socrates, as you rebuked the vulgar manner in which I praised astronomy before, [529] my praise shall be given in your own spirit. For every one, as I think, must see that astronomy compels the soul to look upwards and leads us from this world to another

Every one but myself, I said to every one else this may be clear but not to me.

And what then would you say?

I should rather say that those who elevate astronomy into philosophy appear to me to make us look downwards and not upwards.

What do you mean? he asked.

You, I repl ed, have in your mind a truly sublime conception of our knowledge of the things above. And I dare say that if a person were to thro v his head back and study the fretted ceiling you v ould still think that his mind was the percipient, and not his eyes And you are ery likely right, and I may be a simpleton but, in my opinion, that knov ledge only which is of being and of the unseen can make the soul look upwards, and whether a man gapes at the heavens or blinks on the ground, seeking to learn some particular of sense, I would deny that he can learn, for nothing of that sort is matter of science his soul is looking downwards, not upv ards, whether his way to knowledge is by water or by land, whether he floats, or only lies on his back.

I acknowledge, he said, the justice of your rebuke. Still I should like to ascertain how astronomy can be learned in any manner more conducive to that knowledge of which we are speaking?

I v ill tell you, I said The starry heaven which we behold is wrought upon a visible ground, and therefore, although the fairest and most perfect of visible things, must necessarily be deemed inferior far to the true motions of absolute swiftness and absolute slowness, which are relative to each other and carry with them that which is contained in them, in the true number and in every true figure. Now these are to be apprehended by reason and intelligence, but not by sight

True he replied

The spangled heavens should be used as a pattern and with a view to that higher knowledge, their beauty is like the beauty of figures or pictures excellently wrought by the hand of Daedalus or some other great artist which we may chance to behold any geometrician who saw them would appreciate the exquisiteness of their workmanship, but he would never dream of thinking that in them he could find the true equal or the true double or the truth of any other proportion [530]

No he replied such an idea would be ridiculous

And will not a true astronomer have the same feeling when he looks at the movements of the stars? Will he not think that heaven and the things in heaven are framed by the Creator of them in the most perfect manner? But he will never imagine that the proportions of night and day or of both to the month, or of the month to the year or of the stars to these and to one another and any other things that are material and visible can also be eternal and subject to no deviation—that would be absurd, and it is equally absurd to take so much pains in investigating their exact truth

I quite agree though I never thought of this before

Then I said in astronomy as in geometry we should employ problems and let the heavens alone if we would approach the subject in the right way and so make the natural gift of reason to be of any real use

That he said is a work infinitely beyond our present astronomers

Yes I said and there are many other things which must also have a similar extension given to them if our legislation is to be of any value But can you tell me of any other suitable study?

No he said not without thinking

Motion I said has many forms and not one only two of them are obvious enough even to wits no better than ours and there are others as I imagine which may be left to wiser persons

But where are the two?

There is a second I said which is the counterpart of the one already named

And what may that be?

The second I said would seem relatively to the ears to be what the first is to the eyes for I conceive that as the eyes are designed to look up at the stars so are the ears to hear harmonious motions, and these are sister sciences—as the Pythagoreans say and we Glaucon agree with them?

Yes, he replied

But this, I said, is a laborious study and therefore we had better go and learn of them and they will tell us whether there are any other applications of these sciences At the same time, we must not lose sight of our own higher object

What is that?

There is a perfection which all knowledge ought to reach, and which our pupils ought also to attain and not to fall short of as I was saying that they did in astronomy [531] For in the science of harmony as you probably know the same thing happens The teachers of harmony compare the sounds and consonances which are heard only, and their labour like that of the astronomers is in vain

Yes by heaven! he said and tis as good as a play to hear them talking about their condensed notes as they call them they put their ears close alongside of the strings like persons catching a sound from their neighbour s wall—one set of them declaring that they distinguish an intermediate note and have found the least interval which should be the unit of measurement the others insisting that the two sounds have passed into the same—either party setting their ears before their understanding

You mean I said those gentlemen who tease and torture the strings and rack them on the pegs of the instrument I might carry on the metaphor and speak after their manner of the blows which the plectrum gives and make accusations against the strings both of backwardness and forwardness to sound but this would be tedious and therefore I will only say that these are not the men and that I am referring to the Pythagoreans of whom I was just now proposing to enquire about harmony For they too are in error like the astronomers they investigate the numbers of the harmonies which are heard but they never attain to problems—that is to say they never reach the natural harmonies of number or reflect why some numbers are harmonious and others not

That he said is a thing of more than mortal knowledge

A thing I replied which I would rather call useful that is if sought after with a view to the beautiful and good but if pursued in any other spirit useless

Very true he said

Now when all these studies reach the point of inter-communion and connection with one another and come to be considered in their mutual affinities, then I think, but not till then will the pursuit of them have a value for our objects otherwise there is no profit in them.

I suspect so but you are speaking, Socrates, of a vast work.

What do you mean? I said the prelude or what? Do you not know that all this is but the prelude to the actual strain which we have to learn? For you surely would not regard the skilled mathematician as a dialectician?

Assuredly not, he said I have hardly ever known a mathematician who was capable of reasoning

But do you imagine that men who are unable to give and take a reason will have the knowledge which we require of them? [532]

Neither can this be supposed

And so, Glaucon, I said, we have at last arrived at the hymn of dialectic. This is that strain which is of the intellect only but which the faculty of sight will nevertheless be found to imitate for sight, as you may remember was imagined by us after a while to behold the real animals and stars, and last of all the sun himself. And so with dialectic when a person starts on the discovery of the absolute by the light of reason only and without any assistance of sense, and perseveres until by pure intelligence he arrives at the perception of the absolute good, he at last finds himself at the end of the intellectual world, as in the case of sight at the end of the visible.

Exactly he said.

Then this is the progress which you call dialectic?

True.

But the release of the prisoners from chains, and their translation from the shadows to the images and to the light, and the ascent from the underground den to the sun, while in his presence they are vainly trying to look on animals and plants and the light of the sun, but are able to perceive even with their weak eyes the images in the water [which are divine] and are the shadows of true existence (not shadows of images cast by a light of fire, which compared with the sun is only an image)—this power of elevating the highest principle in the soul to the contemplation of that which is best in existence, with which we may compare the raising of that faculty which is the very light of the body to the sight of that which is brightest in the material and visible world—this power is given, as I was saying by all that study and pursuit of the arts which has been described.

I agree in what you are saying he replied which may be hard to believe, yet, from another point of view is harder still to deny This however is not a theme to be treated of in passing only but will have to be discussed again and again. And so, whether our conclusion be true or false, let us assume all this, and proceed at once from the prelude or preamble to the chief strain and describe that in like manner Say then what is the nature and what are the divisions of dialectic, and what are the paths which lead thither for these paths will also lead to our final rest.

[533] Dear Glaucon, I said, you will not be able to follow me here, though I would do my best, and you should behold not an image only but the absolute truth according to my notion Whether what I told you would or would not have been a reality I cannot venture to say but you would have seen something like reality of that I am confident.

Doubtless, he replied

But I must also remind you, that the power of dialectic alone can reveal this, and only to one who is a disciple of the previous sciences.

Of that assertion you may be as confident as of the last.

And assuredly no one will argue that there is any other method of comprehending by any regular process all true existence or of ascertaining what each thing is in its own nature for the arts in general are concerned with the desires or opinions of men, or are cultivated with a view to production and construction, or for the preservation of such productions and constructions; and as to the mathematical sciences which, as we were saying have some apprehension of true being—geometry and the like—they only dream about being but never can they behold the waking reality so long as they leave the hypotheses which they use unexamined, and are unable to give an account of them. For when a man knows not his own first principle, and when the conclusion and intermediate steps are also constructed out of he knows not what, how can he imagine that such a fabric of convention can ever become science?

Impossible, he said

Then dialectic, and dialectic alone, goes directly to the first principle and is the only science which does away with hypotheses in order to make her ground secure the eye of the soul which is literally buried in an outlandish slough,

A play upon the word νόμος which means both law and strain.

is by her gentle aid lifted upwards and she uses as handmaids and helpers in the work of conversion the sciences which we have been discussing Custom terms them sciences but they ought to have some other name implying greater clearness than opinion and less clearness than science and this in our previous sketch was called understanding But why should we dispute about names when we have realities of such importance to consider?

Why indeed he said when any name will do which expresses the thought of the mind with clearness?

At any rate we are satisfied as before to have four divisions two for intellect and two for opinion and to call the first division science the second understanding the third belief and the fourth perception of shadows [534] opinion being concerned with becoming and intellect with being and so to make a proportion As being is to becoming so is pure intellect to opinion And as intellect is to opinion so is science to belief and understanding to the perception of shadows But let us defer the further correlation and subdivision of the subjects of opinion and of intellect for it will be a long enquiry many times longer than this has been

As far as I understand he said I agree

And do you also agree, I said in describing the dialectician as one who attains a conception of the essence of each thing? And he who does not possess and is therefore unable to impart this conception in whatever degree he fails, may in that degree also be said to fail in intelligence? Will you admit so much?

Yes he said how can I deny it?

And you would say the same of the conception of the good? Until the person is able to abstract and define rationally the idea of good and unless he can run the gauntlet of all objections and is ready to disprove them not by appeals to opinion but to absolute truth never faltering at any step of the argument—unless he can do all this you would say that he knows neither the idea of good nor any other good he apprehends only a shadow if anything at all, which is given by opinion and not by science —dreaming and slumbering in this life before he is well awake here he arrives at the world below and has his final quietus

In all that I should most certainly agree with you

And surely you would not have the children of your ideal State whom you are nurturing and educating—if the ideal ever becomes a reality—you would not allow the future rulers to be like posts having no reason in them and yet to be set in authority over the highest matters?

Certainly not

Then you will make a law that they shall have such an education as will enable them to attain the greatest skill in asking and answering questions?

Yes he said you and I together will make it.

Dialectic, then as you will agree is the coping stone of the sciences and is set over them, no other science can be placed higher—the nature of knowledge can no further go?

I agree, he said

[535] But to whom we are to assign these studies and in what way they are to be assigned are questions which remain to be considered

Yes, clearly

You remember I said how the rulers were chosen before?

Certainly he said

The same natures must still be chosen and the preference again given to the surest and the bravest, and if possible to the fairest and, having noble and generous tempers they should also have the natural gifts which will facilitate their education

And what are these?

Such gifts as keenness and ready powers of acquisition for the mind more often faints from the severity of study than from the severity of gymnastics the toil is more entirely the mind s own and is not shared with the body

Very true he replied

Further he of whom we are in search should have a good memory and be an unwearied solid man who is a lover of labour in any line or he will never be able to endure the great amount of bodily exercise and to go through all the intellectual discipline and study which we require of him

Certainly he said he must have natural gifts.

The mistake at present is that those who study philosophy have no vocation and this, as I was before saying is the reason why she has fallen into disrepute her true sons should take her by the hand and not bastards

What do you mean?

In the first place her votary should not have a lame or halting industry—I mean, that he should not be half industrious and half idle as, for example when a man is a lover of gymnastic and hunting and all other bodily exercises, but a hater rather than a lover of the labour of learning or listening or enquiring Or the occupation to which he devotes himself may be of an opposite kind, and he may have the other sort of lameness.

Literally lines probably the starting-point of a race-course.

Certainly he said

And as to truth, I said, is not a soul equally to be deemed halt and lame which hates voluntary falsehood and is extremely indignant at herself and others when they tell lies, but is patient of involuntary falsehood, and does not mind wallowing like a swinish beast in the mire of ignorance, and has no shame at being detected?

To be sure

[536] And, again, in respect of temperance, courage, magnificence, and every other virtue, should we not carefully distinguish between the true son and the bastard? for where there is no discernment of such qualities states and individuals unconsciously err and the state makes a ruler and the individual a friend of one who, being defective in some part of virtue, is in a figure lame or a bastard

That is very true, he said

All these things, then will have to be carefully considered by us and if only those whom we introduce to this vast system of education and training are sound in body and mind, justice herself will have nothing to say against us, and we shall be the saviours of the constitution and of the State but, if our pupils are men of another stamp the reverse will happen, and we shall pour a still greater flood of ridicule on philosophy than she has to endure at present.

That would not be creditable

Certainly not, I said and yet perhaps, in thus turning jest into earnest I am equally ridiculous

In what respect?

I had forgotten, I said, that we were not serious, and spoke with too much excitement. For when I saw philosophy so undeservedly trampled under foot of men I could not help feeling a sort of indignation at the authors of her disgrace and my anger made me too vehement.

Indeed I was listening and did not think so.

But I who am the speaker felt that I was And now let me remind you that, although in our former selection we chose old men, we must not do so in this. Solon was under a delusion when he said that a man when he grows old may learn many things—for he can no more learn much than he can run much youth is the time for any extraordinary toil.

Of course.

And therefore, calculation and geometry and all the other elements of instruction, which are a preparation for dialectic, should be presented to the mind in childhood not, however under any notion of forcing our system of education.

Why not?

Because a freeman ought not to be a slave in the acquisition of knowledge of any kind Bodily exercise, when compulsory does no harm to the body but knowledge which is acquired under compulsion obtains no hold on the mind.

Very true
